Practice—Parties—Addition of defendants—Ex parte application—Notice—R. S. C., 1875, ord. 16, rr. 2, 13—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11.

An application to add a defendant to an action must not be made ex parte.

Motion.

An order had been made on an ex parte application by the plaintiff, giving him leave to add a defendant; but the registrar refused to draw up the order, on the ground that it ought not to have been made ex parte. He relied on Tildesley v. Harper, 3 Ch. D. 277, 25 W. R. Dig. 201.

Tanner, for the plaintiff, now asked the court to direct that the order should be drawn up. He contended that Tildesley v. Harper, which was under ord. 16, r. 2, of the old Rules of Court of 1875, did not apply to an application under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11: Ann. Pr., pp. 214, 226.

Kay, J.—The present rule does not say that it can be done without notice to the other side. [His lordship read ord. 16, r. 11, and continued:—] The plaintiff must give notice of his intention to add a party before the order can be made.

Company—Shares—Certificates—Negotiable instrument—Blank transfer and blank power of attorney—Estoppel.

The mode of transfer of share certificates in an American railroad company was as follows:—The transfer and a power of attorney were signed by the registered shareholder. When the blank transfer reached the hand of a holder desiring to be registered, his name was filled in by himself or by someone on his behalf, and the certificate was left with the company and then cancelled, the transferee registered, and a new certificate issued in his name.

Held, that every prior holder of the certificates with blank transfers duly signed by the registered holders conferred on each subsequent bonâ fide holder for value of the certificates for the time being an authority to fill in the name of the transferee, and was estopped from denying such authority, and to that extent, but no further, was estopped from denying the title of such holder for the time being. By delivery an inchoate legal title in the shares passes, but a title by unregistered transfer is not equivalent to the legal estate in the shares, or to the complete dominion over them.

Trial of action.

This was an action which raised questions respecting the negotiability of shares in the New York Central Railroad Co. under the circumstances stated in the judgment of the court, where the facts and arguments will be found very fully stated.

Chitty, J.—This action relates to 240 shares in the New York Central Railroad Co. The company is an American corporation, constituted according to the law of the State of New York, and having its principal seat at New York. It has a register of shareholders at New York, and also, for the convenience of European transactions, a register in London. The only persons entitled to receive dividends and to vote are the shareholders whose names appear on the register.

It is clear, then, that, in order to assert a title as against all the world, or, in other words, to acquire a complete and perfect title to the shares, the name of the shareholder must be inscribed on the register.

The company issue to the registered shareholders, and to them alone, certificates duly authenticated by the signatures of the president and treasurer. The name of the registered shareholder is written in before the certificate is issued by the company. The shares are not specifically numbered, but the certificates bear on the face of them definitive numbers. Each certificate is for ten shares. The certificate states that the person named is entitled to ten shares of the company's capital stock. It states also that the shares are "transferable in person or by attorney on the books of the company only on the surrender and cancellation of the certificate in the form and manner which may at the time be required by the transfer regulations of the company." For the transfer of shares a deed is not required; an instrument in writing is sufficient. This must be signed by the registered holder. On the back of the certificate there is a blank form of transfer of the stock or shares mentioned on the face of the certificate and a blank form of power of attorney to execute a surrender and cancellation of the certificate and to do all things requisite to transfer the stock on the books of the company. The transfer and power of attorney do not require a stamp.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by V. de S. Bowen, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The normal mode of transfer, as appears from the documents themselves and the evidence, is as follows:—The transfer and power of attorney are signed by the registered shareholder whose name appears on the face of the certificate, and his signature is attested by a witness. The name of the transferee is filled in and the documents are taken to the office of the company; the certificates are surrendered and cancelled and a new certificate is issued to the transferee whose name has been entered on the register. According to a practice which has extensively prevailed and has been recognized and acted upon by the company, the transferor signs the transfer and power of attorney without filling in the names of the transferee and attorney; and these blank transfers readily pass on the market from hand to hand by delivery only until the documents reach the hands of some holder who desires to be registered. His name is then filled in by himself or on his behalf. The documents are then left with the company, the certificates are cancelled, the transferee is registered, and new certificates in his name are issued in the manner already described.

The plain legal effect of this recognized practice is that the transferor who executes the transfer in blank confers on the holder of the documents for the time being an authority to fill in the name of the transferee, and each successive holder for the time being, when the documents pass through several hands, passes on this authority. The holders must, of course, be bonâ fide holders for value without notice.

At the commencement of this action the defendant was the registered holder of the shares in question, and certificates had been issued by the company certifying that he was entitled to the shares. Notwithstanding these facts, the plaintiffs contend that they have a legal title to the shares. For the defendant, it is contended that the plaintiffs have no title to the shares, or if the plaintiffs have any right to them it is only an equitable right, and that this equitable right cannot prevail against the defendant who had the first equitable right, and has acquired the legal right for value in good faith and without notice of the plaintiff's claim.

The case arises out of the frauds committed by some member of the late firm of Thomas, Son, & Co., brokers, of the City of London. Mr. Blakeway, a member of that firm, absconded about the 30th of January, 1884, and, presumably, the frauds were committed by him. Mr. Thomas, another member of the firm, is still in England, and might have been called as a witness; but while neither side has imputed fraud to him, neither side has thought fit to run the risk of calling him or any person in the employ of the firm as a witness—on the facts, so far as they are in dispute, each side has endeavoured to gain some advantage in the argument by reason of the omission of the other side to call Mr. Thomas, or any one in the employment of the firm, as a witness.

Having regard to the disputes as to some of the facts, it is necessary to state the facts as I find them.

The defendant is a country clergyman, Vicar of Shepshed, in Leicestershire. In August, 1883, he was desirous of investing a sum of between £5,000 and £6,000, and he applied to Messrs. Thomas, Son, & Co. for advice on the subject. They had for some years previously acted occasionally for him as brokers in similar matters. He had no reason to doubt their integrity. All the communications between him and them during the transaction in question were by letter or postcard only. On the 27th of August they informed him that, pursuant to his instructions, they had bought for him 230 shares in the New York Central Railroad, and asked him for his full name and address, in order that they might register his name in the company's books. They enclosed the usual bought note, showing that they had bought for him on the Stock Exchange on the 27th of August 230 New York Central Railroad shares at 119dols. per share, and that the purchase-money and commission amounted to £5,502 15s. The bought note stated that the 30th of August was the settlement day. He duly forwarded to them the amount by cheque, which was cashed. They acknowledged the receipt by letter of the 29th of August, in which they stated that they would forward the share certificates, when delivered to them, to New York for registration in his name.

On the 27th of August Messrs. Thomas bought 230 New York Central shares on the Stock Exchange at £119 per share of Messrs. Medley & Co., jobbers, for delivery on the 13th of September. As is usual in such cases the contract was by word of mouth, and the defendant's name was not passed. The contract was checked or verified on the Stock Exchange on the following day in the usual manner. The transaction was completed between the jobbers and the brokers on the 13th of September. The purchase-money was paid or settled on account, and the jobbers delivered to the brokers certificates for 230 shares in the New York Central Railroad. The transfer and powers of attorney on the back of the certificates had been duly signed by the persons whose names appeared on the face of the certificates as entitled to the shares, and who were, in fact, the registered holders of the shares, but the blanks left for the names of the transferees and the attorneys were not filled in. For brevity I will call these documents certificates with blank transfers. The documents were produced in court, and were identified by the jobbers' clerk as those which were delivered on the 13th of September; the identity was clearly made out by the definitive numbers on the face of the certificates. At the time of the completion a dividend amounting to £92 18s. had accrued on the shares, and the buyer was entitled to this dividend. On the settlement the jobbers paid or allowed on account to Messrs. Thomas the amount of this dividend. On the 28th of September the defendant asked Messrs. Thomas when the dividends were due and how he was to obtain them, and on the 3rd of October they stated they had been unable to register his New York Central shares in time for this dividend but had collected it of the sellers, and they enclosed a cheque for the amount—viz., £92 18s. In the same letter they stated that the books of the company would re-open on the 13th of that month, when they would at once proceed with registration of his shares, and that from thenceforth the dividends would be sent to him direct from the office of the company as they fell due.

In these circumstances it is contended for the plaintiffs that the contract entered into on the 27th of August by the brokers, Messrs. Thomas, with the jobbers was not a contract entered into by the brokers as agents for the defendant, but was an independent contract entered into by Messrs. Thomas to enable them to deliver the shares to the defendant, and the argument was pushed so far as to contend that Messrs. Thomas were sellers of 230 shares to the defendant. This contention is founded solely on the slight discrepancy as to the date of completion. Having regard to the other facts proved, I hold this discrepancy to be immaterial. The only contract shown by the evidence to have been entered into by Messrs. Thomas on the 27th of August for New York Central shares was the contract with Medley & Co. It was said for the plaintiffs that some other contract may have been entered into; but no one was called to prove that there was any other contract, and there is no ground for drawing any inference that there was. The contract with Medley & Co. tallies as to price and the number of shares and in all other respects save the date of completion with the bought note sent to the defendant. The discrepancy is fairly attributable to some error, at all events it is but a slight discrepancy, and it is a circumstance of no weight as against the other facts, including the correspondence down to the 1st of October and the payment of the £92 18s. in respect of the dividend.

The result, then, thus far is this, that, on the delivery to Messrs. Thomas of the certificates with blank transfers for 230 shares, the property in those documents and all the rights which attached to them or passed under them vested in the defendant, and that the documents were left or permitted by him to remain in the hands of Messrs. Thomas as his brokers, and solely for the purpose of their procuring the shares to be registered in his name. It was proved by one of the plaintiff's witnesses that it was the duty of the broker, when such shares were bought for investment, to see to the transfer, and that the broker's commission covered the registration of the shares and the obtaining of new certificates.

Subsequently, on the 4th of October, 1883, Messrs. Thomas bought ten more shares for the defendant. This transaction was duly completed on the 12th of October. It was similar in all respects to the transaction as to the 230 shares, except that it is free from the question as to the discrepancy of date. The certificate with blank transfer for the ten shares was delivered to Messrs. Thomas on the 12th of October, who had previously received the purchase-money and commission from the defendant. The documents remained in Messrs. Thomas' hands solely for the purpose of their procuring the shares to be registered in the defendant's name.

In January, 1884, the defendant applied to Messrs. Thomas for information in regard to his shares, and was informed by them, in reply, that his shares were still in course of registration, but that, the books of the company being closed for dividends, the certificates had not yet been issued. Messrs. Thomas, in the same letter, told him that the dividend would be sent to him direct by the company when it fell due, which would not be till the 15th of January. On that day the defendant received the January dividend on the 240 shares from Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co., the agents of the company in England. The cheque was accompanied by a letter stating that it was for the dividend on 240 shares standing in his name in the books of the company.

It was not contended for the plaintiffs, and it could not have been successfully contended, that the defendant was guilty of any negligence in leaving the documents in the hands of Messrs. Thomas for registration of the shares.

I now proceed to state the facts on which the plaintiffs found their claim to the shares.

On the 29th of November, 1883, Messrs. Thomas borrowed from the plaintiffs, the Colonial Bank, £50,000, and pursuant to the contract for the loan they deposited, later on the same day, certificates with blank transfers of 230 New York Central shares and other securities. It is immaterial, in the conclusion I have arrived at, to consider whether those securities were deposited as security merely for the £50,000 loan, or for the floating balance of Messrs. Thomas's loan from the bank, which amounted, with the £50,000, to £220,000. The plaintiffs' securities clerks, Mr. White and Mr. Proctor, who were called as witnesses, were unable to identify the particular securities deposited. The bank books contain no entries identifying the certificates by the definitive numbers or other description, and there was no direct evidence that the certificates deposited were the certificates of the defendant's shares. But I think that the reasonable and proper inference to be drawn from the facts proved is that the batch of certificates deposited with the plaintiffs was the batch of certificates for 230 shares delivered to Messrs. Thomas on the 13th of September. On the 11th of December following the bank redelivered to Messrs. Thomas the certificates of the 230 shares. This was done pursuant to a request in writing made to the bank by Messrs. Thomas, in which they stated that they were desirous of sending them "in for registration before the books closed" on the next day, and that they would hand to the bank their receipt that afternoon. In their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that this delivery was made for the purpose of having the shares registered in their own names. But the evidence adduced on the part of the plaintiffs did not prove this allegation. The evidence of their securities clerks, who were the only witnesses on the subject, went to prove that they understood that the shares were to be registered in the names of Messrs. Thomas. I hold as a fact that the clerks had no clear view on the subject, but that the plaintiffs, when they thus parted with the certificates, did not intend that the registration should be otherwise than for their benefit. This, I think, was the meaning conveyed, and intended by Messrs. Thomas to be conveyed, by their written request. On the same 11th of December Messrs. Thomas filled in the name and address of the defendant in the blank transfers for 240 shares. The certificates with blank transfers of these shares are clearly identified by the evidence as being the certificates with blank transfers of the 240 shares bought by them for the defendant. On the same day Messrs. Thomas also filled in a form of surrender of the same certificates, giving the name and address of the defendant as the name and address of the person in whose name the shares were to be registered. They handed in these certificates and the transfers and surrender then filled in to Messrs. J. S. Morgan and to the fiscal agents of the company in England for registration in the defendant's name. The fiscal agents, in the usual course of business, passed the documents to the London registrars of the railroad company, by whom the certificates were cancelled. The cancelled certificates were transmitted by the London registrars to New York. The 240 shares were duly registered in the defendant's name on or as on the 11th of December in the register in London, and subsequently in the New York register. The new certificates for the same shares were made out in the defendant's name, and were ready for issue on the 20th of December. The blank transfers on the back of these new certificates were never signed by the defendant.

On the 11th of December Messrs. Thomas, when they handed in the certificates and surrender to Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co., received from them a ticket or receipt for the surrender, on which receipt there was a number referring to the surrender and a statement to the effect that the new certificates would be ready on the 20th of December. This ticket or receipt Messrs. Thomas delivered on the 11th of December to the plaintiffs, with a memorandum stating that they begged to hand a receipt for 240 New York Central shares sent in for registration. The plaintiffs kept this ticket until the beginning of February, 1884. At the end of January or beginning of February, 1884, they learnt that Blakeway had absconded, and they sent a clerk (who has since died) to the office of Messrs. J. S. Morgan with the ticket to obtain the new certificates. As the clerk was apparently a respectable person coming from a well-known bank and produced the ticket, Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co. delivered the new certificates to him without inquiring whether he came for them on behalf of the defendant, whose name, as already stated, appeared on the certificates. These new certificates have ever since remained in the possession of the plaintiffs. As a matter of fact I hold, on the evidence, that Messrs. Morgan handed the certificates to the plaintiffs' clerk in the erroneous belief that he was authorised to obtain delivery of them on behalf of the defendant.

On these facts the claim of the plaintiffs to ten of the shares in question clearly fails. They never had in their possession certificates for ten of the 240 shares. For the defendant it was contended that the plaintiffs' claim must entirely fail because they had not proved what particular certificates came into their possession. But as already stated, I think the right conclusion of fact is that the plaintiffs had possession from the 29th of November to the 11th of December of the twenty-three certificates delivered to Messrs. Thomas on the 13th of September. The result, then, thus far, is that the plaintiffs' claim fails as to the ten shares bought for the defendant in October. The question of the plaintiffs' claim to the 230 shares remains for consideration.

The plaintiffs adduced evidence for the purpose of showing a general mercantile custom, first in the State of New York (the domicile of the railroad company) that the shares passed by delivery of the certificates with blank transfers from hand to hand as negotiable instruments; and, secondly, a similar custom in the City of London, where the transactions in question took place. Having regard to the mode in which the plaintiffs' counsel ultimately shaped their argument, it is unnecessary to say more on this evidence than that it did not prove any such general custom; and for a similar reason it is unnecessary to consider whether any legal effect could have been given to any such customs if proved. The plaintiffs also adduced evidence to show what legal effect was attributed by the law of the State of New York to the delivery from hand to hand of the certificates with blank transfers.

The ultimate shape in which the plaintiffs' counsel put their argument was this. They did not contend, and, indeed, they could not have successfully contended, that the certificates with blank transfers were negotiable instruments in the strict sense of the term; but they urged that these documents were what they termed negotiable by estoppel. They contended that the effect of the mere delivery of the document to a bonâ fide purchaser operated as a legal as well as equitable transfer of the shares, whatever might be the defect in the title of the vendor, and that every prior holder was estopped from denying the title of such bonâ fide purchaser. They founded this argument on the first proposition relied on by Lord Cairns in Goodwin v. Robarts.

Now, assuming this argument to be correct, and assuming as a matter of fact that the plaintiffs were purchasers for value without notice, the plaintiffs acquired a legal and equitable title to 230 shares on the deposit of the certificates with them in November, notwithstanding the fraud committed by Messrs. Thomas on the defendant. The defendant thus loses his title to the shares simply by reason of his having left the certificates in his broker's custody, having in this manner, and in this manner alone, put it in the power of Messrs. Thomas to dispose of his shares. But when the plaintiffs redelivered the certificates to Messrs. Thomas they equally put it into their power to make a fraudulent disposition of the shares, which are assumed to have been theirs at the time of such redelivery; and Messrs. Thomas, in turn, made a fraudulent disposition of the shares as against the plaintiffs by dealing with the documents in the manner already described for the benefit of the defendant. Why is not the defendant in turn a purchaser for value of the shares without notice? It is said that he is not, because he was thus taking through the fraud of his own agents, Messrs. Thomas. But when they obtained delivery of the certificates from the bank they did not purport to act, nor were they, in fact, acting, as agents for the defendant. According to the plaintiffs' witnesses, Messrs. Thomas asked for the certificates in order to register the shares in their (Messrs. Thomas') own names. The defendant was wholly ignorant of the fraud which had been committed on himself and of the fraud committed on the plaintiffs. Messrs. Thomas were under an obligation to cause these particular shares to be registered in his name. They filled in his name as transferee, surrendered the certificates, and caused his name to be registered. If they had sold the shares to him or deposited them with him for an advance, or as security for an existing debt, it is admitted that he would have acquired a complete title. It was not necessary that he should go to Messrs. Thomas's office and demand performance of their obligation to procure the shares to be registered in his name. In the correspondence he was pressing them to register the shares in his name. It was this pressure and the fear of their fraud being discovered which induced Messrs. Thomas to obtain the redelivery of the certificates. The performance of the obligation which Messrs. Thomas were under towards him was a valuable consideration for the transfer and registration, which they in fact made and he has in fact accepted. It appears to me that he stands, in reference to the plaintiffs, in as good a position as he would have been in if he had bought the shares of them and paid for them and the certificates had been handed to him on the 11th of December.

But I think that this case does not fall within the principle of estoppel on which Lord Cairns acted in Goodwin v. Robarts. In that case the instrument in question was simply scrip purporting on the face of it that the bearer would be entitled to receive the definitive bond from the foreign government in exchange for the scrip. The scrip, as Lord Cairns stated, virtually represented that the paper would pass from hand to hand by delivery only, and that anyone who became bonâ fide the holder might claim for his own benefit the fulfilment of its terms by the foreign government. Each prior holder was deemed to have concurred in that representation in favour of the ultimate holder in good faith for value. The certificates with blank transfers do not contain any such representation. On the contrary, they contemplate transfer by getting in the name of the transferee and by registration on the books of the company. Adopting the language of Lord Selborne in the Société Générale de Paris v. Walker to these certificates, there is on the face of them an engagement that the shares thereby represented are tranferable only on the surrender and cancellation of the certificates; and the printed form on the back (which is issued by the company) shows that a complete transfer is a transfer on the books of the company—that is, by registration. Estoppels cannot be manufactured arbitrarily; no estoppel can be raised on a document inconsistent with the terms of the document itself. What, then, is the estoppel here? Having regard to the practice proved and the condition in which these documents are when they pass from hand to hand, the right principle to adopt with reference to them is to hold that where (as is the case before me) the transfers are duly signed by the registered holders of the shares, each prior holder confers upon the bonâ fide holder for value of the certificates for the time being an authority to fill in the name of the transferee and is estopped from denying such authority, and to this extent, and in this manner, but not farther, is estopped from denying the title of such holder for the time being. By the delivery an inchoate legal title passes, but a title by unregistered transfer is not equivalent to what has been termed "the legal estate" in the shares or to the complete dominion over them. Had the plaintiffs filled in their own names or the name of some nominee of their own in the blank transfers while in their possession, the case would have stood differently; the defendant would not have been registered as the holders of the shares. As it is, the plaintiffs never had a present absolute unconditional right to register. Their inchoate title was liable to be defeated, and has been defeated, by the defendant acquiring in good faith for value a complete legal title by transfer filled in with his name as transferee and by registration.

On cross-examination the plaintiffs' witnesses gave evidence to the effect that when Messrs. Thomas made the deposit with the bank the officers of the bank did not suppose that Messrs. Thomas were dealing only with securities belonging to themselves. It is unnecessary to express any opinion on the question, which the plaintiffs say is covered by the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Easton v. London Joint-Stock Bank, whether, having regard to the evidence, the plaintiffs are bonâ fide purchasers without notice.

As to the counter-claim, the defendant is entitled to have the new certificates delivered to him. He is the legal owner of the shares, the certificates are in his name, and they were delivered to the bank's clerk in error.

I therefore dismiss the action, with costs, and give judgment for the defendant on his counter-claim, with costs.

UNION ELECTRICAL POWER AND LIGHT CO. v. ELECTRICAL POWER STORAGE CO. (a.)

Practice—Action to restrain threats—Discovery—Particulars of objection—List of patents—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

In an action to restrain threats of legal proceedings for infringements of patents, the plaintiffs alleged that the patents upon which the defendants relied in making threats were bad. Upon a motion by the defendants, an order was made in chambers directing the plaintiffs to give particulars of their objections to the defendants' patents upon the defendants giving to the plaintiffs on oath a list of the patents on which they intended to rely.

Held, that the order in chambers was right, except that the list of patents should not be given upon oath by the defendants.

Motion.

The action was brought by the plaintiff company, who are manufacturers of electrical batteries, against the defendant company, who are also manufacturers of electrical batteries, under section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883, for an injunction restraining the defendant company from threatening the customers of the plaintiff company and other persons with legal proceedings in respect of the use and sale of electrical batteries manufactured by the plaintiff company and of which the defendant company claimed to be the patentees by assignment, and for damages sustained in consequence of such threats.

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that the patents of the defendants, upon which they based their threats, were invalid.

Upon the application of the defendants an order was made in chambers that the plaintiffs should, within fourteen days, deliver to the defendants particulars in writing of the batteries which the plaintiffs alleged to be the subject of threats and of the damage which the plaintiffs alleged to have suffered from the threats, and that "upon the defendant company giving to the plaintiffs on oath a list of the letters patent on which they intended to rely," the plaintiffs should, within three weeks after the giving of such list, deliver to the defendants particulars in writing of the objections of the plaintiffs to the validity of the letters patent contained in the list.

This was a motion by the defendants that the words "upon the defendants giving to the plaintiffs on oath a list of the patents on which they intended to rely" might be struck out of the order made in chambers as a condition precedent to the defendants' obtaining particulars of the plaintiffs' objections.

J. C. Graham, for the motion.—The defendants ought not to be ordered to give a list of their patents on which they intend to rely as a condition precedent to their getting particulars of the plaintiffs' objections.

Robert Wallace, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are prepared to give particulars of objection to the defendants' patents when they know what the patents are upon which the defendants are going to rely. They have several, and if particulars of the plaintiffs' objections to some were given, might state that they relied upon others.

He referred to Wren v. Weild, L. R. 4 Q. B. 213, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 99; Patents Act, 1883, ss. 26, 29, 32.

NORTH, J.—I think that the order in chambers is right, and that the defendants ought to give a list of their patents upon which they rely before the plaintiffs give particulars of their objections to the defendants' patents, except that the list should not be upon oath; and the order must be without prejudice to the question whether the alleged threats were actually made by the defendants.

CHALK, WEBB, & Co. v. TENNENT. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contributory—Balance order—Action to enforce balance order—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 75.

By a balance order made in the winding up of a company a contributory was ordered to pay a certain sum to the liquidator of the company. The sum was not paid, and the liquidator commenced an action in the name of the company against the contributory to enforce the balance order.

Held that an action could not be brought to enforce a balance order.

Trial of action.

The question to be decided was whether the liquidator of a company in liquidation can enforce payment of the amount due under a balance order for calls by bringing an action against the contributory.

By an order dated the 28th of March, 1885, and made in the winding up of the plaintiff company, R. B. Tennent was ordered to pay to W. L. Grimwade, the official liquidator of the company, the sum of £272 10s. and interest at £5 per cent. from the 26th of July, 1884.

The sum of £272 10s. was made up of calls made against Tennent, who was a shareholder and director of the company, and who had on his part established a claim against the company of £285 17s. for director's fees and rent of premises.

On the 15th of March, 1886, Grimwade issued a bankruptcy notice against Tennent, but the court, in Ex parte Grimwade, 17 Q. B. D. 357, 34 W. R. Dig. 14, set aside the notice on the ground that the balance order was not a "final judgment" within sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that a notice could not be issued in respect of such order. Grimwade afterwards took out a fi. fa. to enforce the balance order, but the sheriff made a return of nulla bona. He then commenced the present action in the name of the company against Tennent for £272 10s. the amount of the balance order, the writ in the action being specially indorsed under rule 6 of order 3 of the Rules of Court, 1883, and the balance order being set forth in the indorsed particulars.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Herbert Reed, for the plaintiffs.—The liquidator is entitled to bring an action for the amount of the balance order, which constitutes a debt due to the company: Companies Act, 1862, s. 75. The defendant cannot set off his claim for fees: Companies Act, 1862, s. 38 (7), In re Overend, Gurney, & Co., Ex parte Grissell, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528.

Emden, for the defendant.—The liquidator cannot bring an action upon a balance order, but he must enforce payment of the amount of the order without further action: ord. 42, r. 24. In the same way an action cannot be brought to enforce an order to pay alimony: Bailey v. Bailey, 32 W. R. 856, 13 Q. B. D. 855. This action is brought with the view of commencing bankruptcy proceedings.

Herbert Reed, in reply.—The case of Bailey v. Bailey differs from the present, because there there was no debt except under the balance order. Here there was a debt due for calls. If necessary, I ask leave to amend so as to ask for judgment for the debt, and not on the balance order.

NORTH, J.—In this case the liquidator of the company has obtained a balance order against a contributory. He tried to enforce the order by means of a bankruptcy notice, but failed, and now brings the present action, in the name of the company, against the contributory, for judgment for the amount of the balance order, with the view of commencing bankruptcy proceedings against him. It is clear from the cases of Carpenter v. Thornton, 3 B. and Ald. 52, and Bailey v. Bailey that he cannot bring this action to enforce the balance order. If I thought him reasonably right in bringing the action, I might have allowed an amendment, but I do not think so; and, under the circumstances, I must dismiss the action, with costs.

In re COLLINGE'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Undivided moiety—Tenant for life—Power of sale—Concurrence of purchaser of other undivided moiety—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections (3), (5), (6); ss. 3, 19.

A testator devised real estate upon trust for his two sons, James and John, in equal shares, for their respective lives, and after the death of either on trust for the survivor and the issue of the deceased son, such issue to take their parent's share, and after the death of the survivor upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds into two equal shares and pay one such share to the issue of each of his said sons, and if the sons or either of them should die without issue, then to pay one of such shares to such person or persons as the son or sons so dying should by will appoint. There was no gift over in default of appointment. The testator's son John died without having been married and without having exercised the power of appointment, and his undivided share passed to his brother James as heir-at-law of the testator, who sold the undivided share to E. James then obtained the appointment of two trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and gave them notice of his intention to sell, under the powers given by the Act, the undivided share devised upon trust for him for life.

Held, on a summons by the trustees, that James, being only tenant for life of an undivided share, and not of the whole settled property, had no power to sell his undivided share without the concurrence of E., the purchaser of the other undivided share.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 22nd of April, 1852, J. Collinge devised (inter alia) the White Lion Inn and three cottages situate at Rawtenstall, in Lancashire, to trustees upon trust to pay the rents and profits to his wife and two sons, James and John, in equal shares during their respective lives, and after the death of his wife to pay the income to his two sons, James and John, in equal shares during their respective lives, and after the death of either of his two sons upon trust to divide the rents and profits unto and equally between the testator's surviving son and the issue then living of the deceased son, such issue to take the parent's share only, and after the decease of the survivor of the testator's two sons upon trust to sell and to divide the proceeds of sale and the rents and profits until sale into two equal parts and to pay one of such parts to the issue of the testator's son James in equal shares and the other of such parts to the issue of the testator's son John in equal shares, but in case the testator's sons or either of them should die without leaving issue, then upon trust to pay one moiety of the proceeds of sale and of the rents and profits until sale to such person or persons as such son or sons so dying without issue should by will appoint.

The will did not contain any disposition of either moiety of the proceeds of sale and of the rents and profits until sale in the event of the testator's sons or either of them dying without issue and without exercising the power of appointment given by the will.

The testator died on the 30th of April, 1852, and his wife died on the 21st of April, 1876.

On the 19th of January, 1876, shortly before the death of the widow, the testator's son John Collinge died without having been married and without having exercised the power of appointment given to him by the will, and thereupon the share devised upon trust for him and his issue, being undisposed of by the will, descended to his brother James Collinge as the heir-at-law of the testator.

In June, 1880, James Collinge sold and conveyed to James Entwistle the share devised upon trust for John Collinge and his issue to which he became entitled as heir-at-law of the testator.

In August, 1886, upon the application of James Collinge, to which the surviving trustee of the testator's will and James Entwistle were parties, the court appointed J. Taylor and R. H. Whittaker trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

In September, 1886, James Collinge gave to the trustees notice of his intention to sell the undivided share of which he was tenant for life of the White Lion public-house and cottages under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

This was a summons taken out by J. Taylor and R. H. Whittaker to determine whether James Collinge was entitled to sell the undivided share in accordance with his notice without James Entwistle joining in the sale.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, enacts, by section 2 (3), that "land, and any estate or interest therein, which is the subject of a settlement, is for purposes of this Act settled land. . . ."

And by section 2 (5) that "The person who is for the time being, under a settlement, beneficially entitled to possession of settled land for his life, is, for purposes of this Act, the tenant for life of that land, and the tenant for life under that settlement."

And by section 2 (6) that "If, in any case, there are two or more persons so entitled as tenants in common, or as joint tenants, or for other concurrent estates or interests, they together constitute the tenant for life for the purposes of this Act."

And by section 3 that "A tenant for life (1) may sell the settled land or any part thereof. . . ."

And by section 19 that, "Where the settled land comprises an undivided share in land, or, under the settlement, the settled land has come to be held in undivided shares, the tenant for life of an undivided share may join or concur, in any manner, and to any extent necessary or proper for any purpose of this Act, with any person entitled to or having power or right of disposition of or over another undivided share."

Upjohn, for J. Taylor and R. H. Whittaker.—James Collinge, as tenant for life of an undivided share of the settled land, cannot sell without the concurrence of the owner of the other undivided share. The settlement comprises the whole land. The undivided share sold to Mr. Entwistle is not taken out of the settlement, and is still subject to the trust for sale on the death of the survivor of the testator's two sons. James Collinge is not tenant for life of the whole land subject to the settlement, and the Settled Land Act does not empower a tenant for life of an undivided moiety of the land to sell the undivided moiety alone.

He referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2 (5) (6), 3, 19; Atkinson v. Bruce, 33 W. R. 899, 34 Ibid. 445, 30 Ch. D. 605, 31 Ibid. 577.

Ryland, for James Collinge.—James Collinge is tenant for life, and, as such, can exercise the power of sale over his undivided moiety: Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 2 (5), 3. He is not prevented by section 2 (6), which refers to cases where there are two persons "so entitled"—that is, entitled as tenants for life, but here Mr. Entwistle, the owner of the other undivided share, is not a tenant for life: Atkinson v. Bruce. He is not affected by section 19, which only confers on the tenant for life the additional power of concurring with the owner of another undivided share of the settled land in selling where advisable.

North, J.—I do not think that Mr. James Collinge has power to sell his undivided share. He is not beneficially entitled to settled land for his life, but only to an undivided share of settled land. The property settled was the whole of the land, and not an undivided share of it. But upon the death of John Collinge his undivided share passed to his brother, James Collinge, who sold it to James Entwistle. The beneficial interest in that undivided share is taken out of the settlement, but the share is still subject to the trust for sale of the whole settled property upon the death of James Collinge, the survivor of the testator's two sons, and cannot therefore be regarded as taken out of the settlement for all purposes.

If James Collinge had been tenant for life of the whole subject of the settlement he could have sold, even if the subject of the settlement had been only an undivided share of land; but he cannot sell his undivided share under the circumstances of this case. Section 3 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, gives to the tenant for life power to sell "the settled land or any part thereof," but if the Legislature had intended these words to include an undivided share I think it would have specially mentioned an undivided share, as the Act in several sections specially deals with undivided shares. The definition of the words "settled land" in section 2, sub-section 3, shows that in this case the term "settled land" means the whole land included in the settlement. Sub-section 5 of that section defines the tenant for life as the person beneficially entitled to possession of settled land for his life. But here James Collinge is not entitled to the possession of settled land, but only of an undivided share of it; and he is not, therefore, the tenant for life of settled land. Then sub-section 6 of that section deals with the case of tenants in common and for other concurrent interests, but it does not say that each of them shall be a tenant for life. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] That shows that where there are two or more tenants in common or for other concurrent interests they together make a tenant for life under the Act. During the joint lives of James and John Collinge neither of them alone could have sold his undivided share, and if James Collinge alone could not have sold his undivided share while the other undivided share was vested in John Collinge, it is not easy to see why he can sell alone now that the other undivided share is vested in James Entwistle. Then section 19 provides that the tenant for life of an undivided share may, not sell, but "join or concur" with any person entitled to another undivided share in selling. [His lordship read the section, and continued:—] It was contended that that section does not prevent the tenant for life of an undivided share of settled land from acting alone in selling that undivided share, but gives him an additional power to concur in selling it, and does not interfere with the power of sale previously given. I think if that had been intended it would have said may either sell his undivided share or concur with any person entitled to another undivided share in selling. The Legislature has taken care to protect the interests of persons entitled in remainder, and it is obvious that there may be reasons why it would not be for the interest of such persons that a tenant for life of an undivided share should have power to sell his undivided share alone. There must be a declaration that James Collinge has no power to sell according to the notice given by him or otherwise under the Settled Land Act, 1882, except by concurring with the owner of the other undivided share under the 19th section of the Act.

Upjohn.—I ask that the costs of the trustees may come out of the whole estate.

North, J.—I cannot order costs to be paid out of Mr. Entwistle's share in his absence; and as the trustees are only trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and have no estate, I cannot direct them to retain their costs out of moneys coming to their hands under section 43. I can only give them liberty to apply for their costs on the realization of any part of the estate. There will be no costs of the tenant for life.

In re Ball.

Slattery v. Ball. (a.)

Will—Construction—Die without leaving issue male.

A testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon trust for W. K. B. and his issue male, and in default of such issue for R. B. and his issue male, "and in case the said R. B. shall die without leaving issue male," then over to J. B.

(a.) Reported by J. Trustram, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. B. died in the lifetime of W. K. B., having had one child, a son, who predeceased him. W. K. B. afterwards died without issue.

Held, that the words "die without leaving issue male" must be construed as "die without leaving issue male living at his death," and not as "die without having had issue male"; and that the gift over to J. B. took effect.

White v. Hight, 12 Ch. D. 751, 27 W. R. Dig. 245, not followed.

Adjourned summons.

The action was brought for the determination of the construction of the will of Sir Alexander John Ball, and, if necessary, for administration.

Sir A. J. Ball, by his will, made in 1809, bequeathed his money, chattels, stocks, funds, securities, and all other his personal estate, to trustees, upon trust, for sale and conversion, and to invest the proceeds in the purchase of real estate or upon Parliamentary or real securities, or in the purchase of stock in any of the public funds, and to pay his wife an annuity of £1,300 for life, and to pay the residue of the income to his eldest son, William Keith Ball, for life on attaining twenty-five; and the testator declared that in case William Keith Ball should marry and have children the testator declared that the whole of the interest of his trust estates should, after the death of William Keith Ball, go to the use of his first son and the heirs male of his body, and for default of issue to the use of the other sons of William Keith Ball and their heirs male successively, and in default of such issue male that the whole of the interest of his trust estates should go to Robert Ball and his heirs male, and the will provided: "And in case the said Robert Ball shall die without leaving issue male lawfully to be begotten," then the interest of the testator's trust estates was to go to John Ball and the heirs male of his body successively.

The testator died in 1809, and his widow died in 1832. William Robert Ball (in the will called Robert Ball) died in 1844, having had one child, a son, who died in 1841. William Keith Ball died in 1874, without issue. John Ball died in 1876, leaving the defendant, George Keith Ball, and several children him surviving.

It had been decided by the House of Lords in another action of Ball v. Ball (1875, E. 13a) that, according to the true construction of the will, the testator's estate was not converted in equity into real estate, but retained its quality of personalty.

The statement of claim in the present action alleged that, as the property remained personalty, and in the event which had happened, that William Robert Ball had had a son who predeceased him, the estate of William Robert Ball, although in form an estate tail, was an absolute one, and that the words of the gift over "die without leaving issue male" must be construed as "die without having had issue male," so that the gift over to John Ball and his heirs male failed.

This was a summons under the Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4, by the defendant, George Keith Ball, to strike out the statement of claim in the action, on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

Cookson, Q.C., and Dauney, for the summons.—The gift over to John Ball and his heirs male took effect in consequence of the death of William Robert Ball "without leaving issue male." Those words, as applied to personalty, must, in the absence of special circumstances, be construed literally as without leaving issue male living at his death: Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663; Crooke v. De Vandes, 9 Ves. 197.

Kenyon Parker, for the plaintiff.—The gift to William Robert Ball in the event which happened became absolute and the gift over failed. The words "die without leaving issue male" must be construed "die without having had issue male": White v. Hight, 12 Ch. D. 751, 27 W. R. Dig. 245; Treharne v. Layton, 23 W. R. 799, L. R. 10 Q. B. 459; In re Jackson's Will, 28 W. R. 209, 13 Ch. D. 189; White v. Hill, L. R. 4 Eq. 265; Marshall v. Hill, 2 M. & S. 608; Casamajor v. Strode, 8 Jur. 14; Ex parte Hooper, 1 Drew. 264.

Cookson, Q.C., in reply.—The case of White v. Hight is peculiar. In all other cases where the court has construed "leaving" as "having had" issue, it has only done so to prevent the divesting of clearly vested prior estates.

NORTH, J.—The question for consideration is the meaning of the words "in case the said Robert Ball shall die without leaving issue male." I do not think it makes any difference that the will in this case is prior to the Wills Act, as the estate is personal estate. According to numerous decisions, of which Forth v. Chapman is referred to as the leading authority, if the gift had been "if he should die without issue," it would have meant without issue living at his death; and all doubt on that point is removed by the fact that the words here are "shall die without leaving issue male," which, unless those words are read in some secondary sense, would mean without leaving issue male living at his death. It is clear that the testator's intention was that the previous gift should be divested in the event of W. R. Ball dying without leaving issue male living at his death, whatever these words may mean; and taking those words literally, that has actually happened. He died without leaving any issue living at his death because, though he had one child, that child died before him, and without issue.

The plaintiff contends that the words "shall die without leaving issue male" are to be read "without having had issue male," and reliance is placed on a series of cases where, for certain reasons, the word "leaving" has been construed as equivalent to "without having had." The first case cited, Ex parte Hooper, is not much in point. The words were different. The decision might stand on totally different grounds, and, as was pointed out in the note in Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 466, the decision of the Vice-Chancellor on that point has been misunderstood on several occasions; and it does not seem to me to bear very much on the point in question. The proposition in Jarman on Wills is laid down thus:—[His lordship then read the reference to Maitland v. Chalie from vol. 2, p. 823, and continued:—]

The rule was clearly laid down in White v. Hill. There property was given in trust for the daughter for life, and after her death between all her children, if more than one, their heirs and assigns; if but one, to his or her heirs and assigns; in case the daughter should depart this life under twenty-one or afterwards without leaving any child or children, then the property was given over. It was held that the children took at their births indefeasible interests in fee in remainder expectant on the death of their mother. The Vice-Chancellor says:—"The case of Ex parte Hooper is rather weaker than the present, because the principle which has prevailed in all these cases is that, where you find an intention that a child shall take a vested interest at a particular period, and words introduced which would divest the interest in the event of the parent dying without leaving the child surviving, if the interest has once vested, the court, considering that the testator has intended to make provision for the child, will, unless the testator has too clearly expressed his opinion to admit a doubt, struggle to maintain the vested gift rather than take it away from the issue in favour of some collateral objects." Then he says:—"In the other case that has been cited, of Kennedy v. Sedgwick, there was found an additional circumstance which strengthened the case—namely, that it should vest in the children at twenty-one, and then there was a gift over in the event of the parent dying without leaving children. In that case 'leaving' was construed 'having.' The intent to vest was plain and manifest; the intent to divest was not so plain and manifest. 'Leaving' is a word that may be construed, in its primary sense, as leaving on the decease of the person to whom the word applies; but it has been construed as 'having rather than that a child should be deprived of a vested interest which seems to have been made as a provision for it." And further on he says:—"The circumstances of this case fully justify me in applying the principle, originally founded on marriage settlements, that the court will favour a plain intention to provide for children where the contest is between surviving children and the representatives of deceased children. The testator has here made careful arrangements for the division of his property among his children, and the contest at this moment is between a son of the tenant for life, who may be living at her death (she is now living), and her brother." Therefore he extended the case of settlement to wills. Then, a little further on, he said:—"The only question I have to consider is, whether the word 'leaving' can be construed here as 'having,' and I find that it has been so construed in like cases. I can find no substantial difference between vesting at twenty-one and vesting at birth; and then all the cases say if there is a vested interest it shall not be divested by the simple word 'leaving' in a case of this kind, where a parent is providing for children by his will. It cannot deprive the family of one of the children of that provision because the child does not survive the tenant for life." The same principle was followed in Treherne v. Layton. There the facts were that the property was given to the granddaughter of the testatrix for life, and after her death to her children in equal shares, and if she died leaving no issue, the whole of the property was to go over to the next of kin. There the words "leaving no issue" were construed "having had no issue"; and Cleasby, B., who delivered the judgment of the court, says:—"We think that the authorities applicable to this case are so clear and so strong that we should not be justified in saying that they are wrong. The position they lay down is that, where an estate is vested in children after a gift to a parent, then the gift over in case of the parent dying without leaving issue must be read 'having had no issue,' in order to carry into effect the intention of the testator; and this rests upon the highest authority, and goes back further than the case of Maitland v. Chalie, which was a decision of Vice-Chancellor Leach." Then he quotes what I have already stated from Jarman on Wills.

The case of White v. Hight, most relied on by Mr. Parker, is distinguishable from the cases which have been referred to. There the testator gave real estate to his granddaughter absolutely, and then proceeded: "In case the said Alice White, my granddaughter, shall happen to depart this life before the decease of her said mother, or after her decease without leaving any issue," which may be read shall die without leaving any issue, "then and in such case I give and bequeath and devise" the property over. That was not a gift for a limited interest with remainder over to other persons, in default of any of whom being living at the death of the first taker the gift over was to take effect; but there was an absolute gift to the first taker subject to being divested, and it is more like the present case than some of those to which I have referred. There the Vice-Chancellor came to the same conclusion as was come to in the other cases, that there was a vested gift that could not be divested. I have a difficulty in seeing what was the ground on which he went; but it is clear that he purported to follow the previous decisions. Now the principle of those decisions is that the court will read the words "without leaving" as equivalent to "without having had" if the result is to make the whole instrument consistent, to make a gift over fit in with the intention of the testator as previously expressed, and avoid divesting a previously vested gift. But unless that result is attained the reason fails, and I have been unable to find any case except White v. Hight in which the effect of the construction adopted has been, not to avoid divesting a vested gift, but to leave a vested gift liable to be divested, in a different event from that in which the divesting would have taken place if the word "leaving" were construed literally. If the word "leaving" be construed literally in the present case, the absolute interest of William Robert Ball would be divested by his death without leaving issue then living. If the word "leaving" be construed as "having had," the absolute interest of William Robert Ball would be divested by his death without having had any child. Whichever view is adopted the will clearly contemplates the divesting in some event of the previously vested gift to William Robert Ball. I find no case except White v. Hight in which the word "leaving" is read as "having had" with the result merely of altering the event upon which the divesting of a gift previously vested is to take place, and I do not find this point dealt with in the judgment. It makes that case a new one; but the Vice-Chancellor treats it as covered by the old cases, and decides it on the ground that he is following them. I feel bound by those authorities; but I should go beyond them if I acceded to the plaintiff's contention, and I cannot find any principle laid down in White v. Hight to warrant it. So far as I am aware White v. Hight has not been followed by any other judge. In In re Jackson's Will, it was not cited, and the passage relied on in the judgment of Sir George Jessel has no bearing on the present case. Under those circumstances I accede to the application, and the statement of claim must be struck out.

Foster v. Wheeler. (a.)

Contract—Agreement to enter into agreement—Specific performance—Damages.

The defendant agreed with the plaintiff that the defendant would enter into an agreement with O. for a lease from O. at a certain rent for such a term and subject to such covenants as O. should approve.

Held, that the plaintiff could recover damages from the defendant for refusing to carry out the agreement made between them.

This was the hearing of an action brought to obtain specific performance of an agreement, or, in the alternative, damages, and the question was whether the agreement was one which the law could recognize as a legal contract.

On the 9th of April, 1886, an agreement was made between the plaintiff and the defendant containing the following terms:—"Within seven days from the date hereof Miss Wheeler [the defendant] is to enter into a binding agreement with Dr. G. B. Ord, the lessor of Cedar Lodge, Queen's-road, Clapham-park, for a lease from Dr. Ord of the said premises at a rental of £140 per annum for such a term (to commence from the 24th day of June next) and subject to such covenants as Dr. Ord shall approve; and Miss Wheeler shall accept and take up such lease when ready, and execute a counterpart thereof."

(a.) Reported by P. F. Wheeler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant ultimately refused to perform this agreement, and the plaintiff thereupon brought this action, alleging that Dr. Ord was willing to grant a lease to the defendant, and that he had suffered damage from the defendant's refusal to accept a lease.

Barber, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the plaintiff.—Even if specific performance cannot be granted, the plaintiff is entitled to damages.

Warmington, Q.C., and Job Bradford, for the defendant.—An agreement to make an agreement cannot be enforced. There is nothing here to ground an action: Pearce v. Watts, 23 W. R. 771, L. R. 20 Eq. 492.

Barber, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case I am asked to enforce a contract of a peculiar character. In April, 1886, the defendant wished to rent and occupy a house then in possession of the plaintiff, as tenant under a Dr. Ord. There is some inaccuracy in the written agreement touching the reference to this gentleman, but he is sufficiently identified with the lessor of the house, and the inaccuracy is not material. The plaintiff was willing that the defendant should have the house, and was prepared to facilitate her taking his place. The defendant had reasons to believe that Dr. Ord would accept her as tenant and grant her such a lease as she required, and the plaintiff stipulated that she should procure this to be done.

These facts sufficiently appear from the correspondence (which, whether strictly admissible in evidence or not, was read without objection), but, apart from the correspondence, may fairly be inferred from the written agreement of the 9th of April, 1886, which has given rise to the litigation. The point for decision arises on the first paragraph of that agreement, which is in the following terms. [His lordship read the paragraph.]

It is not expressed in a form usually adopted by lawyers, and some discussion might have been avoided if it had been expressed differently; but I think that, when examined in connection with the rest of the agreement, it is sufficiently plain. Some of the other clauses specify what is to be done by the plaintiff, or by both plaintiff and defendant, but this clause is restricted to what is to be done by the defendant alone without the plaintiff's intervention, and she thereby binds herself, first, to enter into an agreement with Dr. Ord for a lease at a certain rent, but otherwise according to his own conditions, and, secondly, to accept such a lease, and, if need be, execute a counterpart. It may be that if Dr. Ord had declined to enter into any agreement at all, or had imposed conditions of an unreasonable character, the defendant might have pleaded this as an excuse for non-performance of the agreement, but that question does not arise, and I will not enter into it. Nor is there any question whether the time, "seven days," within which the defendant bound herself to enter into an agreement is of the essence of the contract; for the complaint against her is not that she did not fulfil her obligation within seven days, but that she has not fulfilled it at all—that is, after the lapse of a considerable time, and after every opportunity of fulfilling it has been given her.

The defence is that such an agreement as this cannot be enforced. This defence rests, I think, on a confusion, not by any means uncommon, between enforcing a contract and ordering a contract to be specifically performed. A decree (to use the old chancery term) for specific performance was and is one method of enforcing a contract, but it was not and is not the only method. A contract might equally, though often not so effectually, be enforced by a judgment for damages. There are many contracts which were and are enforceable in one way, but not in the other, and until recent times the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was limited to the more effectual remedy and failed when that could not be applied. I assent to the proposition on behalf of the defendant that an agreement (such as occurs here) to enter into an agreement cannot be ordered to be specifically performed, on the ground that before the court can properly make a decree of that character it must be satisfied that the parties have contracted to do something of a definite character, something ascertained, or which can be readily ascertained, and something, too, which can be done by simple methods within the control of the court, and which the court can supervise and, if need be, aid.

But the proposition of the defendant goes beyond this. It is insisted broadly that an agreement to enter into an agreement is not a contract recognized by law—that is, is not enforceable. An agreement between two persons, A. and B., that one of them will either immediately or at some future time, or subject to the performance of some condition, enter into an agreement with the other is, I think, not enforceable, because it does not fall within the term "contract" as defined by law. Definitions of "contract" are to be found in the text books, and I have consulted several of them, including an American one, that of Mr. Parsons. They are all founded on, and many of them simply adopt, the definition given by Pothier in part 1, chapter 1, section 1, of his work on Contracts. This is his definition which I take from the English translation of Mr. W. D. Evans—"An agreement by which two parties reciprocally promise and engage or one of them singly promises and engages to the other to give some particular thing or to do or abstain from doing some particular act." Mr. Pollock's definition in his work on the same subject slightly differs from this, and is, in my opinion, more complete and more accurate. He defines a contract, or rather an agreement, to be "an act in the law whereby two or more persons declare their consent as to any act or thing to be done or forborne by some or one of those persons for the use of the others or other of them"; and in commenting on this definition he explains what is intended by an act in the law saying that it must be on the face of the matter capable of having legal effect and concerned with duties and rights which can be dealt with by a court of justice. Accepting this definition, I think that such a promise or engagement as I have above suggested does not fall within it, for I do not see how a court of justice can deal with a matter so uncertain, or how, in other words, legal effect can be given to a promise or engagement as an agreement when the parties have not yet themselves determined what the agreement is to be.

These remarks would not necessarily be applicable to a promise or engagement to sign a particular document, or even to a promise or engagement to sign a document to be prepared by a certain person or on defined lines. They are not, I think, at all applicable to a promise or engagement by one or two parties to enter into an agreement of a character ascertained or capable of being ascertained with a third, and I see nothing in a promise or engagement of that character to prevent its being a contract capable on its face of having legal effect and concerned with duties and rights which can be dealt with by a court of justice. The breach, therefore, by the defendant of the contract into which she entered with the plaintiff by the first clause of the agreement of the 9th of April, 1886, constitutes a cause of action.

It is not asked that the defendant shall be ordered specifically to perform the contract. If she had in fact entered into a binding agreement with Dr. Ord, he might, of course, demand specific performance of that agreement, and as at present advised I think that the plaintiff might require the defendant to accept a lease pursuant to such agreement under the contract of April, 1886, in the presence of or possibly even without the presence of Dr. Ord as a party to the action. But it is common ground that no concluded agreement has been entered into with Dr. Ord; and the action is necessarily rested on that basis. It follows that the plaintiff's remedy is in damages only, and his case was opened in that manner.

I must hold the defendant to blame for failing to enter into an agreement with Dr. Ord. Two difficulties arose in the course of the negotiations; one about an allowance of £200 for repairs, and the other about the expense of obtaining the consent of the ground landlord. As regards each of these difficulties the defendant has had conceded to her all that she insisted on, and the plaintiff has met her liberally. She nevertheless, and notwithstanding that practically everything was at length settled, declines to perform her contract. It is not for me to discuss her motives, or to consider whether her conduct has been perfect or otherwise. Suffice it to say that, after expressing some doubt whether she would continue what was styled the arrangement or negotiations, she ultimately determined to have no more to do with the matter. This she was entitled to do at the risk of being held liable in a court of justice, and I hold her liable.

The admitted facts of the case point to the conclusion that the plaintiff has sustained appreciable damage by endeavouring to fulfil his part of the agreement when the defendant has not fulfilled hers. But I have no means of assessing the amount, and I can only direct an inquiry.

Pilley v. Robinson. (a.)

Practice—Adding a defendant—Pleas in abatement—Partnership—Joint and separate liability—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11.

In an action for a partnership debt the defendant has a right, under ord. 16, r. 11, to add as defendant a person who is jointly liable with himself for the money claimed, although the plaintiff objects to the addition.

Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504, followed.

This was an appeal from Field, J., at chambers. The action was brought to recover money from a solicitor who had been employed by the plaintiff. At the date of the retainer, and during the employment, one Edmunds was a partner in the defendant's firm, and, as such, jointly liable with him to the plaintiff. The defendant applied under ord. 16, r. 11, to have Edmunds added as defendant. Both Edmunds and the plaintiff objected, and Field, J., refused the order.

The defendant appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the defendant.—The liability of partners is not joint and several, although when the contract has passed into a judgment it is so. If, therefore, one co-contractor is sued the others should be joined. This could have been done before the Judicature Acts by plea in abatement. The Judicature Acts, however, do not alter the rights of parties, they only regulate procedure. Therefore, although pleas in abatement are abolished by those Acts, the right remains. This is laid down in the case of Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W.R. 97, 4 App. Cas., at p. 515, where Lord Cairns says: "It is the right of persons jointly liable to pay to insist on being sued together." The cases on the subject are collected in 1 Wms. Saund. 291. In Werdermann v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 246, Jessel, M.R., at p. 251, said that a demurrer at common law for want of parties would not lie, though you could in some cases plead in abatement, which was the only remedy; and that ord. 16, r. 11, now provides for such a case. There are grave objections in this case to proceeding by a third party notice.

A. Walker, for the plaintiff. — This application is made solely for delay. The plaintiff is content with the present defendant, and is not at all sure that he has a claim against the partnership. At all events, a third party notice would be sufficient for all practical purposes.

Douglas Walker, for Edmunds.—It is contrary to all ordinary principles of justice that a plaintiff should be forced to sue a defendant whom he does not wish to sue. Pleas in abatement are abolished by the Judicature Act, and there is no new remedy of the kind in that Act. The proper course, therefore, is a third party notice. In the case of Norris v. Beazley, 25 W.R. 320, 2 C. P. D. 80, Lord Coleridge, at p. 84, says:—"The defendant to be added must be a defendant against whom the plaintiff has some cause of complaint, which ought to be determined in the action, and it—i.e., the rule in question—was never intended to apply when the person to be added as a defendant is a person against whom the plaintiff has no claim, and does not desire to prosecute any." In Kendall v. Hamilton the dicta must be read with regard to the case. That case arose while the Common Law Procedure Act was in force, and under the Judicature Act the rights are the same, but the procedure has been altered, and if Edmunds were to be added as a third party the defendant would have all the rights against him which he would have had under the Common Law Procedure Act.

Stephen, J.—This case has been argued at some length. The matters in dispute in the action arose while Edmunds was a member of the defendant's firm; and the difficulty arises from his interest in the matter. Edmunds does not deny that he was a member of the firm, and therefore primâ facie that he is a joint debtor with the defendant.

The defendant now asks that Edmunds may be added as a defendant, as there was a joint contract and a joint debt. But the plaintiff says, "I do not want Edmunds at all," and Edmunds objects to being made a defendant. Mr. Douglas Walker has contended that the proper course to adopt is to make Edmunds a third party. I must confess that we were both struck by that argument, and I do not hesitate to say that were I to follow my own views on the matter I should so decide. But the case of Kendall v. Hamilton has been cited, and I feel bound by that case. In that case the House of Lords decided that they would allow the plaintiff to add a defendant. The case, therefore, does not exactly cover the present one, yet the ratio decidendi is in point. Lord Cairns lays down the law very clearly, and at p. 516 he says: "Although the form of objecting by means of a plea in abatement, to the non-joinder of a defendant who ought to be included in the action is abolished, yet I conceive that the application to have the person so omitted included as a defendant ought to be granted or refused on the same principles as those on which a plea in abatement would have succeeded or failed." And Lord Blackburn, who, at p. 542, goes into the whole history of pleas in abatement, gives judgment to the same effect.

On the other hand, Lord Penzance takes a view of the effect of the Judicature Act which, if it applied, would justify Mr. D. Walker's contention; and I confess that if the matter were new I should be inclined to follow him. Having regard, however, to what was said by

(a.) Reported by Cecil Chapman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lords Cairns and Blackburn, I think that an order must be made to join Edmunds as a defendant.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I own that I have altered my opinion on this point during the progress of the argument in deference to the decision and the opinions expressed by the House of Lords in Kendall v. Hamilton. Ord. 16, r. 11, gives power to join any parties who ought to be joined. There is also under the Judicature Act a procedure for making a person not a defendant a third party.

Now it has been decided in Kendall v. Hamilton, in accordance with King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, that an action and judgment against two of three contractors constitutes a bar to another action against the third contractor. Why a bar? Surely because the third co-contractor could have been brought in by a plea in abatement. But pleas in abatement are abolished by the Judicature Act; and it was contended in that case that now you could sue a co-contractor after having obtained judgment against his fellow co-contractors. But Lord Cairns, in the passages which have been already cited, thought that the right of the defendant to bring in a co-contractor as defendant is a right which the Judicature Act does not take away from him.

That being the effect of Kendall v. Hamilton, it is worth while to notice the opinion of Jessel, M.R., with reference to the abolition of demurrers—that a person who objects to the action for want of parties ought to take out a summons under order 16 asking that the necessary parties may be added.

Therefore, under ord. 16, r. 11, it appears to me that we can add a co-defendant; and I think that Edmunds must accordingly be added.

Q. B. Div. (Stephen and Wills, JJ.) July 21.

REG. v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway Commissioners—Jurisdiction—Arbitration—Agreement "confirmed and made binding" by private Act—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 8—Prohibition.

By a private Act between two railway companies an agreement made between them was set out verbatim as a schedule, which contained a clause providing that all questions of difference arising between them should be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859; and this was "confirmed and made binding" by a clause of the private Act. Differences having arisen, one company desired to refer the dispute to the Railway Commissioners under section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873.

Held, that the right to refer differences to arbitration was derived from the agreement itself, and that, as the difference was not "required or authorized to be referred to arbitration under the provisions of any general or special Act" within section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, the Railway Commissioners had no jurisdiction to undertake the arbitration.

Application for a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition to be made absolute.

Under a private Act (26 & 27 Vict. c. cxiii.) the Midland Railway Co. was amalgamated with the Great Western Railway Co. for certain purposes, to which Act a schedule (B) was attached of certain heads of agreement. By the 29th article of those heads of agreement it was agreed between the two companies that "all questions of agreement not otherwise provided for were to be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Railway Companies Arbitration Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 59)."

This agreement was confirmed by the Act, which made it binding on the parties thereto.

Differences having arisen, the Midland Railway Co. desired to refer them to the arbitration of the Railway Commissioners under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1373, s. 8, while the Great Western Railway sought to refer the matters in dispute to arbitration under the above agreement, and obtained a rule nisi to prohibit the commissioners from hearing the case.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Meysey Thompson, for the Midland Railway Co., showed cause against the rule.—This is a dispute which, by section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, can be referred to the Railway Commissioners, because "it is a difference which, under the provisions of a special Act passed before the Act of 1873, is required or authorized to be referred to arbitration." If so, it can, at the instance of either party and with the consent of the commissioners, be referred to them in lieu of the arbitration originally proposed: Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Co., L. R. 2 Sc. App. 347, 22 W. R. Dig. 13; Great Western Railway Co. v. Waterford and Limerick Railway Co., 29 W. R. 826, 17 Ch. D. 493; Great Western Railway Co. v. Halesowen Railway Co., 52 L. J. Q. B. 473.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir Henry James, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the Great Western Railway Co., supported the rule.—The word "authorized" in section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, does not cover the disputes in this case, which, by special agreement confirmed by an Act, were to be decided by arbitration. The Midland Railway Co. cannot go behind their contract.

STEPHEN, J.—Although at first sight there seemed some difficulty in this case, it has become clear that the point is comparatively a simple one. It turns solely on the language of section 8 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, as compared with the provisions of the private Act, and more especially of its schedule B. The Act of 1873 declares that when any difference between companies is, under the provisions of any special Act, required or authorized to be referred to arbitration, such difference may be referred to the commissioners. The question is, whether this agreement is "required or authorized" so to be referred by any Act of Parliament? If so, it may be referred to the commissioners. If not, then the Great Western Co. is entitled to a prohibition.

Now I think that the effect of section 8 is that the Railway Commissioners are entitled to accept a reference to them in cases where the difference is required or authorized to be referred to arbitration by any general or special Acts, but not where the companies could, by their own constitution and independent powers, do the thing for themselves; it must be a distinct requirement or authorization of such arbitration by Parliament.

Now in Caledonian Railway Co. v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Co. Lord Cairns' words seem especially applicable to the present case. He says that "it is clear beyond the possibility of argument that when an agreement between two companies is scheduled to an Act of Parliament, and when it is enacted in the Act that each company shall be required to fulfil all the provisions in the agreement, every provision and stipulation in that agreement becomes as obligatory and binding as if they had been repeated in the form of statutory sections." The words of the Act in that case seem to me to be substantially the same as the words in this private Act—namely, where, by section 63, the heads of agreement "are respectively confirmed and made binding on the several companies parties thereto." And such words undoubtedly have the effect of making these contracts good as between the parties.

From the other cases cited it appears to me that the requisition or authorisation mentioned in section 8 of the Act of 1873 is a requisition to do something which the parties were not otherwise called upon to do, and the authorisation means an authority to do that which they were not authorized to do without the Act. Looking at all the cases together, I think this application must be granted and a prohibition issue.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Broadly stated, the question is whether, in a case where an agreement between two companies to which the Act of 1873 refers, containing a reference clause, has been embodied in an Act of Parliament, the necessity or privilege, as the case may be, of having their disputes referred to arbitration has been covered by express command of the Legislature, or is the offspring of agreement between the parties: the action of Parliament having been confined to removing obstacles, actual or apprehended, to their power so to contract. The substance of the Act seems to me to be that if substantially the forum was selected and adopted by contract between them, then the Legislature does not interfere. The question, then, is under which head the form of words used in section 63 comes.

The case of the Caledonian Co. seems to me to come to this—that in that case Lord Cairns thought that the specific enactments with which he was dealing were divisible into two classes, and that the first head of the enactment was satisfied and completed by giving to the arrangement which has been made as to the agreement entered into by statutory validity; and being of opinion that the earlier words had been exhausted upon giving statutory validity to the agreement, and finding other words afterwards which made no reference to the mere contract between the parties, he came to the conclusion that these latter words were of a different order from the first, and that whereas the operation of the first was to confer that validity upon an agreement which, without assistance, it could not have, the operation of the second was to place the agreement in a different category, and to remove it from the mere category of agreement into the higher place of specific law, so that by the will of Parliament it ceased to be a mere agreement and was transferred into a substantial enactment, to be adhered to for the benefit of the public.

Now that seems to me, shortly stated, to be the explanation and summary of all that is material to observe with regard to that decision. Then, applying that, is there any ground whatever in the simple words which have been used here for dividing them into two such heads as those? I think not, either as regards the words themselves or as to the subject-matter with which they deal. The words are "that the agreement shall be confirmed and made binding between the parties." If an agreement is confirmed it is made binding between the parties. I do not think one can reject the expression "between the parties." I think the whole of that expression must be taken together. It merely means that an agreement is to be confirmed, and is to be a valid agreement, as it professes to be, between the parties. If the subject-matter of the agreement be looked at it is seen why it should have been necessary to resort to Parliament for a simple confirmation, and why it is not necessary to extend the words beyond. As to the cases cited I agree with Stephen, J.'s comments, and I will only say that I agree entirely with every word of A. L. Smith, J.'s judgment in the case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Halesowen Railway Co. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that this Act of Parliament ought to receive this construction apart from authority, and that there is strong authority beside the mere words of the Act in favour of the view we have expressed. This rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

REG. v. MARYLEBONE VESTRY AND HYDE. (a.)

Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 130), ss. 3, 5, 7, 25—"Owner"—Accrual of liability—Notice—Order for works to be done.

In July, 1886, a notice was served by the Marylebone Vestry, under sections 5 and 7 of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, upon H., notifying the report of the surveyor that certain houses were unfit for human habitation. H. at that date was lessee of the houses for a term which expired on the following Michaelmas Day, and was also assignee of a reversionary interest in the same for a lease of twenty-one years, to begin on the said Michaelmas Day. An order made on the report in October, 1886, was subsequently varied on appeal in January, 1887. Upon completion by H. of the works ordered, a charging order was made, on his application, upon the premises. On an appeal by way of certiorari against such charging order by the freeholder of the premises,

Held, that H. was, at the time when the notice was served, an "owner" within section 3 of the Act of 1868, as having a possessory interest in the premises for a term of more than twenty-one years; that the notice was, therefore, properly served on him; and that the liability or benefits under the further proceedings accrued from the date of the notice, and not from the date of the order for the works.

Appeal by motion for a writ of certiorari to remove a charging order made by the Vestry of Marylebone into the Queen's Bench Division.

The appellant in this case was Captain Berness, the owner of the freehold of certain premises in the occupation of Hyde. In July, 1886, Hyde was the assignee of the remainder of a long lease of the premises for ninety-six years, which expired at Michaelmas, 1886; he was also the assignee of a reversionary lease for twenty-one years, which was to run from the same Michaelmas. In July, 1886, Hyde was served with a notice from the Marylebone Vestry under the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, that the premises were reported as unfit for habitation, the receipt of which notice was also notified to Berners. On September 23 Hyde attended at the vestry for the consideration of the matter under section 7 of the Act; but on the application of Berness's representative the hearing was postponed until October 14, upon which day both Hyde and Berners attended, and an order was made for the demolition of the premises. Against this order Hyde appealed, and in the interval he made certain structural alterations in one of the houses complained of. This appeal was heard at the Middlesex Quarter Sessions in January, 1887, and the order of the vestry was varied to the effect that similar structural alterations to those which Hyde had carried out in the one house should be completed in the other houses in lieu of their demolition. Hyde communicated this result to Berners, and informed the latter of his intention to carry out these improvements. No answer was sent to this. Hyde completed the alterations, at a cost of about £500, and thereupon applied to the vestry for a charging order under section 25 of the Act, and an annual charge of £25 3s. 9d. for thirty years was made by the vestry on the premises in Hyde's favour. Against this order Berners now appealed.

Peile, for the appellant.—In July, 1886, when the first notice was served on Hyde, he was not an "owner" within section 3 of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, as "a lessee for a term of which twenty-one years remained unexpired." He had only an interesse termini in regard to the reversionary lease. The liability is fixed at the time when the order was made, and Hyde was not then—namely, in October, 1886, or January, 1887—a person qualified for such a liability: Reg. v. Swindon Local Board, 27 W. R. 732, 4 Q. B. D. 305. Hyde was bound under his covenant to keep the premises in repair. He chose to expend money in these improvements and has no right, as "owner" under the Act, to have a charging order made in his favour.

Channell, Q.C. (Forrest Fulton and F. M'Leod with him), for Hyde, the respondent.—Hyde was an "owner" under section 3, as being, in July, 1886, "a person, holding or entitled to the rents and profits" of these premises for more than twenty-one years. There is no limit to persons "in possession" for that time. The premises required certain "structural alterations" which would not come under Hyde's covenants "to keep in repair." The time for fixing the liability is when the notice of the defects is served; otherwise, if a change of ownership took place between the date of the notice and that of the making of the order, the whole proceedings would have to be begun de novo, and might again be evaded. Berners never disputed the right of the vestry to treat Hyde as owner, nor did he make any objection to Hyde so acting until the charging order was made, after Hyde had expended over £500. The case of Reg. v. Swindon Local Board only decides upon whom the ultimate burden shall fall.

Poland and English Harrison, for the vestry.—It is of great importance for the vestry to know at what period the liability accrues. The proper hearing would have been on September 23 had Berners attended, and Hyde was then "owner" for more than twenty-one years.

Peile replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13.—POLLOCK, B.—This is an application for an order of certiorari to bring up a charging order made by the Vestry of Marylebone under the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, s. 25. The charging order under this Act is made against the alleged owner for the time being of the premises in question. The present application is made, not by the person for whom the order was made, but by the freeholder, Berners, for whom the order might have been properly made. The question before us is whether Hyde, for whom the order was made, is an "owner" within the Act. The facts are as follows. At the time when notice was served on Hyde that the premises in question were unfit for human habitation and ought to be demolished—that is, in July, 1886—Hyde was the holder of an unexpired lease for a long term, which was to expire at Michaelmas, 1886. In that respect alone such a property was not sufficient to make him an "owner" under the Act of 1868. But he also had a reversionary interest as the grantee of a fresh lease to run for twenty-one years from Michaelmas, 1886. Was he, under these circumstances, an "owner" under this Act? The Act defines "owner" in the interpretation clause (section 3) as including all lessees, &c., "except persons holding or entitled to the rents and profits of such premises for a term of years of which twenty-one years do not remain unexpired." If, therefore, we take the two periods of time, the unexpired period of the long lease up to Michaelmas and the twenty-one years to commence from that date, and consider the words "entitled to the rents and profits for a term of which twenty-one years do not remain unexpired," Hyde would clearly be a person not coming within that exception, and if so he is to be treated as an "owner."

But Mr. Peile says that, although Hyde was a lessee under the first lease, he had only an interesse termini under the second lease. Under the Act, however, a person is not to be held as "owner" only if he holds the property as being entitled to the rents and profits; all that has to be considered is, has he such an interest as to make him "entitled to the rents and profits for a term of which twenty-one years remain unexpired"? Upon that construction I think that Hyde was, at the date of the notice, properly considered to be an "owner" under the interpretation clause of the Act of 1868.

But it is said that, although Hyde may have been an "owner" at the time the notice was served, assuming our construction of the Act to be right, that qualification ceased before any order was served in regard to these premises. The notice was served in July, and on September 23 Hyde attended at the vestry in pursuance of it. Captain Berners, however, the freeholder, was not in attendance, and to suit the latter's convenience the consideration of the matter was adjourned till October 14. An order was at that time made for the demolition of the houses. In January, 1887, another order was made varying the order of demolition into one for carrying out certain structural alterations after the manner already carried out in the interval by Hyde in respect of one of the houses in question. Now though in July Hyde was clearly, by our construction, an owner of a term of which twenty-one years remained unexpired, from Michaelmas Day that interest was diminished, and in October he had ceased to be such an owner, since less than twenty-one years remained unexpired. The question for us is whether this charging order can be maintained in favour of the owner at the time of the notice being first served, or must it be restricted to the owner at the time the order was made? Now the scheme of the whole Act seems to me to answer that question. It contemplates the finding of a person who, for the purposes of the Act, shall be an "owner" of the premises. That owner is to be served with a notice of the surveyor's report, and is allowed to attend the hearing for the consideration of that report. The same person is either to carry out the improvements ordered or to be compensated for the demolition of the premises.

It was pointed out successfully, as I think, by Mr. Channell that it could not be intended by the Legislature that a new process was to be commenced whenever there was a change of occupier. The new occupier might or might not be the owner. It would be most inconvenient for local authorities, and contrary to the spirit of the Act, if the liability was to be evaded by a mere change of occupation by the owner on whom notice had been first served. It was intended to fix the liability on that person, being the "owner," in whose hands the premises had been allowed to fall into dilapidation. Here Hyde was such a person and could not be treated as one whose interest in the premises has expired. Where the Act ex concessis is dealing with a person admittedly interested in the premises, it is impossible to suppose that such person can get rid of his liability between the receipt of the notice and the order for the work to be done, thus quashing his liability by mere efflux of time. It is clear that the person who is "owner" within the terms of the Act at the time when the notice is served is the person liable under all the future proceedings.

There is one authority which has been cited by Mr. Pelle, but which, to my mind, really tells against him—Reg. v. Swindon Local Board. The question there was not who was liable to do certain sanitary acts under an Act somewhat similar in effect to the present Act—namely, the Public Health Act, 1875—but from whom the expenses for such work were ultimately recoverable; and it was held that they could only be recovered by yearly payments from the existing owners from year to year. This is clearly stated in Cockburn, C.J.'s judgment, otherwise an owner who had first received notice as to the necessity of the work to be done, but who had subsequently sold the property and gone abroad, would remain liable to pay for improvements by which other occupiers were benefiting. I agree fully with that decision, and I think that, as illustrating the spirit in which these Acts are to be administered, it tells rather in favour of the respondent in this case, though not, perhaps, applicable to the particular point before us.

On all these grounds I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question before us is whether this charging order in favour of Hyde ought to be quashed. In July, 1886, Hyde was entitled to three months of the unexpired long lease and to re-enter on Michaelmas Day on a new lease for twenty-one years. First, was Hyde, then, at that time within the exception of section 3 applicable to lessees—namely, "A person holding or entitled to the rents and profits of such premises for a term of which twenty-one years do not remain unexpired"? Secondly, was the notice as to the premises being unfit for habitation rightly served upon him? I am of opinion that he was not then within the exception, and that he was rightly so served. I do not think that the objection that he had only an interesse termini at that time in regard to the second lease makes any difference under this interpretation clause to a person interested as lessee for a period of more than twenty-one years. His title may not have been then in all respects complete, but I am satisfied that the Legislature intended to include persons in Hyde's position. Beyond all question he was entitled to three months' possession, and was then entitled to perfect his title to possession for a further term of twenty-one years so soon as the old lease expired. Such a person is clearly, in my opinion, an owner within section 3 of the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1868, and, if so, the notice was properly served on him in July, 1886. [The learned judge here went through the dates of the various proceedings taken under the Act.] Now on the 30th of September Hyde had ceased to be an owner within the above meaning of the section, since his interest was for less than twenty-one years by one day. Was he, then, the proper person against whom the proceedings commenced by the notice were to be continued? I am of opinion that he was. The object of the Legislature was to call on persons who were owners at the time when the definite condition of the premises was discovered and reported on, and notice was served of the same. That notice was to be served on the then owners, and the subsequent proceedings are merely a continuance from the notice which was served on Hyde when he was the "owner" as we hold, and the person in whose hands the premises were found to have fallen into disrepair so as to be considered unfit for habitation. Throughout all these proceedings Berners, who now appears before us as objecting to the charging order, has made no objection to any of the proceedings of the vestry. He did not object to the order for their demolition. He did not appeal as "a person aggrieved" by any such order under section 9 of the Act. He was informed by Hyde of the variation of the order, and of the structural alterations actually carried out and to be further carried out by him under the order of the quarter sessions. He naturally made no objection to that. But now, when Hyde has expended between £500 and £600 on these works and has, as "owner" under the Act, properly obtained a charging order on the premises under section 25, Captain Berners thinks fit to come forward and endeavour to prevent Hyde from being thereby recouped. If we were bound by law to saddle Hyde with all such expenses of course we should have to do so, with, however, much regret. Happily we are able legally to prevent such a result, and I hold that both the objections—as to Hyde's not being an owner and as to the accrual of the liability only at the date of the making of the order for the work—fail.

As to the case cited, I rather think there is some section in the Public Health Act, 1875, which fixes the liability on the owner who "makes default" under the Act—i.e., the owner at the time when the money becomes due. At any rate, practically that decision has nothing to do with this case.

Lunacy—Petition under Trustee Relief Act—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 51.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in lunacy matters is not limited to petitions entitled "In Lunacy and in the matter of the Trustee Acts," but extends to all applications in Lunacy which require an exercise of the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division.

This was a petition by the personal representative of Mary Platt, deceased, a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, for payment out of court of a fund which had been paid in, under the Trustee Relief Act, to the credit of the deceased.

The petition was entitled "In Lunacy and in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice."

F. Thompson, for the petition.

The Court at first felt some doubt whether the court had any original jurisdiction under the Trustee Relief Act, but on referring to the request addressed to them some years since by the Lord Chancellor (vide 20 Solicitors' Journal, 45) to act as additional judges of the Chancery Division, it appeared that it was not limited to petitions entitled "In Lunacy and in the matter of the Trustee Acts," but that it extended to all applications in Lunacy which required also an exercise of the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division.

The terms of the request were the following:—"As it is convenient that orders should continue to be made, as heretofore, in Chancery, as well as in Lunacy, I have to request you to act as an additional judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice for the purpose of making such orders."

MINERAL WATER BOTTLE EXCHANGE AND TRADE PROTECTION SOCIETY v. BOOTH. (a.)

Restraint of trade—Trade protection society—Rule not to employ servants of other members—Validity.

One of the rules of a society established for the protection of a particular trade provided that no member of the society should employ any traveller, carman, or outdoor employé who has left the service of another member, without the consent in writing of his late employer, until after the expiration of two years from his leaving such service.

Held, that the rule imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade, and was therefore bad.

But, semble, a rule properly framed, preventing one member from injuring another by improperly acquiring information from a servant, would have been valid.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

The plaintiffs were a society incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, for the purpose of protecting the interests of mineral water manufacturers in London and elsewhere. The 44th article of the articles of association provided that no member should employ any traveller, carman, or outdoor employé who had left the service of another member, without the consent in writing of his late employer, until after the expiration of two years from his leaving such service.

The action was brought by the society and J. Cox, one of the members, against Booth & Co., who were also members, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from employing a carman who had just quitted the service of Cox.

The number of the members of the society was limited to 500, and the actual number of members was 179.

The members carried on business in various parts of the United Kingdom, and one of them carried on business in New South Wales.

Chitty, J., refused to grant an interim injunction, on the ground (inter alia) that the rule imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade, the agreement not being between an employer and his servant, but between employers as against employed, and the number of the members of the society and its field of business being practically unlimited.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Romer, Q.C., and Bradford, for the appellants.—The main question in this case is whether this is such a rule as the law will allow. The object of the rule is to prevent unfair competition by persons getting hold of the servants of others who have acquired a knowledge of their masters' businesses. Collins v. Locke, 28 W. R. 189, is an authority for the proposition that persons carrying on a particular kind of business may enter into reasonable covenants for the appropriation of that business. In that case an agreement to parcel out the stevedoring business of a port among the parties thereto was upheld, though the effect of it might be to create a partial restraint upon the parties to exercise their trade. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Hilton v Eckersley, 4 W. R. 326, 6 El. & Bl. 47, 67. FRY, L.J., referred to Gunmakers' Co. v. Fell, Willes' Rep. 384.] The rule does not operate in restraint of trade, it merely prohibits members of the society from selecting servants who have been previously employed by other members. Can it be said that an agreement between two, three, or four manufacturers that they will not employ each other's servants is bad? We submit that it is not, on the ground that it does not destroy trade, and does not stop the employment of labour.

They also referred to Jones v. North, 23 W. R. 468, L. R. 19 Eq. 426.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Hull, for the defendants, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—We are asked here, on appeal from Chitty, J., to enforce a covenant contained in the articles of association of this company. Now I do not enter at all into the question how this company is to be regarded. In my opinion the question here is simply this: can we enforce the 44th article, treating it (as it is) as a covenant between all the members? I think we cannot.

We have not to deal with the question here as to whether the members of this body might have enforced a covenant exclusively pointed to preventing the members from injuring one another in a particular way by improperly acquiring information which had been gained by the servants of one another. That matter is not before us. Therefore I think it better not to give any opinion as to how any such covenant or restriction might have been framed so as to be lawful. What we have to deal with here is not such a covenant. I only mention it so that it may not be supposed that we give any opinion as to any covenant properly framed to prevent one member from injuring another by acquiring information from a servant. The 44th article of the association provides that "No member shall employ any traveller, carman, or outdoor employé who has left the service of another member, without the consent in writing of his late employer, until after the expiration of two years from his leaving such service." That is perfectly general. It is not even limited in its application to any particular employés who, from their position, might have confidentially acquired any knowledge in their employment. It is not confined to servants who, having been put in places of confidence, have been long enough in the service to obtain any information which they ought not to disclose, and which might be used to the detriment of their employer. So that generally if any outdoor employé were in the service of any member of this society even for a week and then left he could not be employed, if this covenant is a good one, by any other member of the association. That of itself might be used most oppressively, and although in the present case (we have not heard the circumstances) it might be proper, if the covenant were aptly framed, to restrain the defendants from employing a particular individual so as to prejudice his late employer by using knowledge he had got confidentially, yet there is no restriction or limitation in this covenant at all. It is very like the case, which Bowen, L.J., referred to, of Hilton v. Eckersley, in which there was an attempt to regulate the way in which certain members of the association were to carry on their trade. That is a difficulty here. But in my opinion the great objection to this covenant is that it might be used most oppressively by preventing a man who had never been in any confidential position and never desired improperly to use the information he had then acquired from getting employment from another master in the trade which he knew most about, and which he could best carry on. In my opinion, on the ground that this covenant is one which we ought not to enforce, this motion ought to be refused.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bowen, L.J.—I agree so entirely with the judgment of the Lord Justice that I will not add anything.

Fry, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me that a covenant might have been framed which possibly might have been good, that is to say, that the masters might have contracted not to use in competition with one another knowledge confidentially obtained. It is said the object of this clause is to give effect to that intention. But it has gone far beyond it, because it applies to every traveller, every carman, and every outdoor employé, whether they have or have not acquired such knowledge. It applies to those who may have acquired knowledge, although they may have been employed in distant localities where their knowledge is of no avail. I think, therefore, the restraint of trade and of the liberty of her Majesty's subjects in gaining employment is far in excess of any legitimate purpose of the contracting parties.

Application refused.

Company—Winding up—Removal of official liquidator —"Due cause shown" — Appeal — Locus standi— Companies Act, 1862, s. 93—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 50.

The power of the court under section 93 of the Companies Act, 1862, to remove a liquidator on "due cause shown" is not confined to cases in which personal unfitness in the liquidator is shown, but extends to cases in which the court is satisfied on the evidence that it is desirable, in the interests of all those interested in the assets, that the liquidator should be removed and another person substituted.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J., in chambers.

On the 23rd of April, 1887, an order was made to wind up the above company, and on the 19th of May J. S. H. Banner was appointed official liquidator.

On the 20th of June, on the application of W. Charlesworth, who claimed to be a creditor of the company, and on "the applicant by his counsel undertaking to pay into the Bank of England," to the credit of the matter, on or before a specified day "the sum of £2,500, and to pay any further sum of money to the like credit as the court may direct in respect of claims brought in by other creditors of the company not mentioned in the schedule hereto, and also undertaking to pay any sums necessary to answer any costs properly incurred by Banner as provisional liquidator and official liquidator of the company," North, J., appointed A. W. Chalmers official liquidator of the company in the place of Banner.

From this order Banner appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Oswald, for the appellant. —The order of the 20th of June is bad on two grounds. In the first place, North, J., had no jurisdiction under section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to vary his order of the 19th of May appointing Banner official liquidator, although it had not been drawn up: In re St. Nazaire Co., 27 W. R. 854, 12 Ch. D. 88; In re Swire, Mellor v. Swire, 33 W. R. 785, 30 Ch. D. 239; In re Munns & Longden, 32 W. R. 675. In the second place, the "due cause shown" for which a liquidator can be removed under section 93 of the Companies Act, 1862, means something in the nature of a disqualification arising from his misconduct or unfitness: In re Sir John Moore Gold Mining Co., 28 W. R. 203, 12 Ch. D. 325; Chadwyck Healey's Company Law and Practice (2nd ed.), p. 523; and compare also Ex parte Sheard, In re Pooley (No. 1), 16 Ch. D. 107, 27 W. R. Dig. 27, and Ex parte Newitt, In re Mansell, 33 W. R. 142, 14 Q. B. D. 177, which were bankruptcy cases. No such allegation is here made against Banner. The order, in fact, amounts to a sale of the liquidation to the highest bidder. [Bowen, L.J., referred to In re Oxford Building Society, 49 L. T. N. S. 495.]

Higgins, Q.C., and Hatfield Green, for the respondent Charlesworth.—North J., has, in the exercise of his discretion, appointed Chalmers official liquidator of the company, and Banner therefore has no locus standi to appeal. The "due cause shown" in section 93 of the Companies Act, 1862, is not to be confined to the mere personal unfitness or incapacity of the liquidator, but the court, in making an order under that section, must have regard to the interests of all persons interested in the winding up.

C. H. Turner, Dunham, and Pochin, for other parties.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal by Mr. Banner, who at one time was liquidator of this company, against an order of North, J., in chambers, removing him from being liquidator, and appointing in his stead a Mr. Chalmers, who is also an accountant at Liverpool, as Mr. Banner is.

Several points were raised; one was this, that Mr. Banner had no locus standi to appeal. All the court entertain a strong opinion upon that point. Of course he could not have been removed without giving him an opportunity of appearing before the court and stating reasons why he should not be removed. That being so, if the court did listen to those reasons, and he was advised that the court fell into error, he has a right of appeal and has sufficient locus standi here.

We come to the question, Was the court right? Had it power under the 93rd section of the Companies Act, 1862, in the circumstances of the case, to remove him? The Act says, "Any official liquidator may resign or be removed by the court on due cause shown." Now I think the matter comes under the section for this reason, that although the order appointing the liquidator had not been drawn up, there had, in fact, been an order of the 19th of May appointing him liquidator; and this order, which is under appeal, was made on the 20th of June, and was made on the footing of its being an order to remove the liquidator; and although the order of May the 19th had not been drawn up, in my opinion he was liquidator, though he had not given security. The security is given after the liquidator is appointed, and is not a condition of his being appointed, although, of course, if anyone who is appointed a liquidator, and ordered to give security, delayed for so long a time, either in drawing up the order or in giving security, that the court might reasonably come to the conclusion that he did not desire to fill the office and had abandoned it, then it might be very material whether the order had been drawn up, or whether security had been given. But here we know that Mr. Banner was anxious to draw up the order, and that he was stopped in consequence of the summons upon which this order was made.

We must therefore consider it as a question of removing Mr. Banner. Now, in my opinion, it is not necessary, in order to justify the court under this section in removing the liquidator, that there should be anything against the individual. In my opinion, although, of course, unfitness discovered in a particular person would be a ground for removing him, yet the power of removal is not confined to that, and I do not think that the late Master of the Rolls, in the case of In re Sir John Moore Gold Mining Co., which has been cited, intended to give an exhaustive definition. In fact he points out that, and what he says is this:—"I should say that, as a general rule, they point to some unfitness of the person—it may be from personal character, or from his connection with other parties, or from circumstances in which he is mixed up—some unfitness in a wide sense of the term." He does not intend to exhaust all the grounds, but, in my opinion, and I believe the rest of the court agree with me, if the court is satisfied on the evidence before them that it is against the interest of the liquidation, by which I mean all those who are interested in the company being liquidated, that a particular person should be made liquidator, then the court has power to remove the present liquidator, and, of course, then to appoint some other person in his place.

Now what were the circumstances here? I do not in any way enter into those various questions which are raised by one side or the other; but it appears that Mr. Eyton, who is the father-in-law of Mr. Charlesworth, has large claims, as he contends, as against the company. That is disputed by another section of those who are interested in the liquidation—namely, certain creditors; and Mr. Eyton and Mr. Charlesworth also dispute the claims of certain persons who appear to claim as creditors against this company. But then we are informed by North, J., that the contest was conducted before him on the footing that if the claims of Eyton, Charlesworth, and of other persons named in the schedule to the order came into competition together, there would not be enough to pay 20s. in the pound—that is to say, that the company was insolvent and could not pay its debts in full, and that was the basis of the order upon which the matter proceeded; and on the evidence, as far as I can see here before us, I should have thought probably the parties were quite right in the mode in which they viewed the circumstances of this company. And I mention that especially for this reason—Mr. Cozens-Hardy in reply said that an order like this, where a company was solvent, would produce very great evils and be a very bad precedent. I entirely agree. In my opinion it would be wrong, where it was conceded that a company was solvent, that the court should, because a sum of money was offered by one who wishes another liquidator to be appointed, merely on that ground remove the existing liquidator. That would not be a due cause; it would be like buying the liquidation. So I should entirely dissent from that. Liquidators ought not to consider themselves partizans either on one side or the other. But here is a company which, on the evidence, must be treated as insolvent, and which was treated as insolvent when the matter was before North, J.

But Mr. Charlesworth says:—"Mr. Eyton and I are together very large creditors, and I will take the loss upon myself in this way—I will pay all the other creditors if the assets are not sufficient to pay them, and bear the loss by taking the property into my own hands and providing out of that for whatever may be due to Mr. Eyton and myself." Under those circumstances the matter bears a very different aspect. I think the order is not unreasonable under those circumstances. We have the opinion of North, J., who knows Mr. Chalmers as well as Mr. Banner, and although he is quite satisfied that Mr. Banner would conduct the matter duly and properly, and that there is no possible imputation, or ground of imputation, in this case against him, he is also satisfied that Mr. Chalmers would also conduct the liquidation fairly, and not raise any unnecessary or groundless objection to any claims which may be brought forward by those who claim to be creditors, and whose debts, if established, Mr. Charlesworth undertakes to pay. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Banner may consider that the judgment of the court is not based in any way on the possibility of any reflection upon himself, either in his conduct in this matter or in his general fitness to be liquidator of any honourable company in the kingdom. We do not decline to vary the order of North, J., because Mr. Banner is in any way implicated in anything which he has any reason to fear. On the contrary, his character is clear. With regard to the facts of the case I will say nothing. I will only add two or three words to point out what is the importance of our decision as to the law. In this case it is not necessary, in my opinion, to decide for the first time what I think always has been the law—that a liquidator, once appointed, has a locus standi to appeal to this court against his removal, and that a liquidator, when he is appointed, is not the less appointed because he has not, at the time of the appeal coming on, perfected his right to act by giving security. The security is to be given on his appointment—that is to say, immediately after his appointment. The case, therefore, is not important for that reason, but I do think it is an important case to the profession, because a contention was raised by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and based upon the language of Sir George Jessel, the late M.R., in In re Sir John Moore Gold Mining Co., to the effect that unfitness in the liquidator ought to be shown before he is removed. If anybody understands Sir George Jessel's language in that case to mean that, I think that this court ought now to lay down that such an apprehension of his meaning is incorrect, and that it is not the sole ground under the statute for which a liquidator can be removed.

In many cases, no doubt—and very likely, for anything I know, in most cases—unfitness of the liquidator will be in the general form which the cause will take upon which the court, in this class of case, acts, but that is not the definition of due cause shown. In order to define "due cause shown" you must look wider afield, and see what is the purpose for which the liquidator is appointed. To my mind, the Lord Justice has correctly intimated that the due cause is to be measured by reference to the real, substantial, honest interests of the liquidation, and to the purpose for which the liquidator is appointed. Of course, fair play to the liquidator himself is not to be left out of sight; but the measure of due cause is the substantial and real interest of the liquidation. That should be thoroughly understood, I think, as of great importance; and in that sense it seems to me this case is of interest, because it clears, once and for all, away the misconception upon which the argument of the appellant's counsel was based.

FRY, L.J.—I have nothing to add but to express my concurrence with my brethren.

EATON v. LAKE. (a.)

Copyright—Musical composition—Assignment in writing—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2—5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 20.

An assignment of copyright in a musical composition must be in writing.

So, where the plaintiff had for some years acted as musical conductor at defendant's music-hall, and had composed pieces for performance which had been performed there, and for which he had been paid,

Held, that the relations existing between the parties were no bar to an action by the plaintiff for infringement of copyright under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45.

Appeal from a divisional court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.).

The defendant was the proprietor of a music-hall at which the plaintiff had acted for some years as musical conductor at a weekly salary. The plaintiff had from time to time composed pieces of music which had been performed at the music-hall, and for which he had afterwards been paid separately by the defendant. At Christmas, 1886, he composed a ballet, which was performed for the first time on December 24 of that year under his direction. On December 27, in consequence of a dispute with the defendant, he left the defendant's service, taking with him the score and band parts of the new ballet. The defendant applied to him to return them, and he agreed to do so, and received from the defendant a cheque for £20 for them. The ballet was then performed at the music-hall for four nights, when the plaintiff, finding that the payment of the cheque had been stopped by the defendant, brought this action for infringement of copyright, The case was tried before Grantham, J., and a jury. In answer to questions left to them by the judge, the jury found that this was a substantial and independent musical composition composed by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had not sold the right of representing it to the defendant. Grantham, J., accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff. The Divisional Court set aside this judgment, and the plaintiff appealed.

Fullen, for the appellant.—The Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, is extended to musical compositions by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 20. That Act imposes a penalty of 40s. on any person representing or causing to be represented any such production without the consent of the author in writing. Here there was no consent in writing. No parol agreement, even if such were proved, would avail: Shepherd v. Conquest, 4 W. R. 283, 17 C. B. 427; Wallerstein v. Herbert, 15 W. R. 838, 16 L. T. N. S. 453; Leyland v. Stewart, 25 W. R. 225, 4 Ch. D. 419.

J. Lawson Walton, for the respondent.—The appellant is estopped from saying that this was an unauthorised representation. He stood by and allowed the respondent to incur great expense in preparing for the performance. It was part of his ordinary duty as conductor to compose such pieces, which became the property of the respondent: Hatton v. Kean, 8 W. R. 7, 7 C. B. N. S. 268.

Lord EMMA, M.R.—In this case the jury have found, and I do not think their finding can be challenged, that the plaintiff was the sole composer of this music, that is to say, that it was the production of his mind solely, and independently of anyone else. He is, therefore, the author of the composition, and as such the owner of the copyright. There was evidence that he had allowed the defendant to represent his compositions, and further there was, I think, evidence, which was not left to the jury, that he had agreed with the defendant that he would allow him to represent these pieces on condition that he paid him for them. But, even if the jury had found this to be so, it would, in my opinion, be absolutely immaterial as long as the agreement was not in writing. Assuming that the plaintiff had orally agreed to compose music for the defendant to perform, and the defendant had agreed to pay him for the right of performing it, nevertheless, unless that agreement is in writing within the terms of the Act of Parliament the plaintiff is to be considered the sole owner of the copyright, and the defendant cannot rely on the agreement. That is so by virtue of the proper construction to be put upon 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2. That construction was given to the Act in 1856 by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Shepherd v. Conquest, a case which was originally tried by Jervis, C.J., who then decided that such an agreement, although not in writing, would prevent the subsequent performance from being "contrary to the rights" of the plaintiff. But after fully considering the case in his own court he came to the conclusion, in which the other judges agreed, that his decision at Nisi Prius was wrong. He says, "Literary productions stand upon different and higher ground from that occupied by mechanical inventions. The intention of the Legislature in the enactments relating to copyright was to elevate and protect literary men. Such an intention could only be effectuated by holding that the actual composer of the work was the author and proprietor of the copyright, and that no relation existing between him and an employer who took no intellectual part in the production of the work could, without an assignment in writing, vest the proprietorship of it in the latter."

That construction of the Act has always been acted upon since 1856, and it cannot now be upset.

It is urged that there is an estoppel against the plaintiff. Is he estopped from saying that he composed this piece himself? or that he did not assign the copyright in writing? Those are the only material facts. In my opinion there is no colour for an estoppel. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on this appeal, and that the judgment must be entered accordingly.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It cannot be contended that this was not an independent musical composition or that the plaintiff did not compose it, since those contentions are negatived by the findings of the jury, which seem unassailable. Hatton v. Kean, in which the piece of music was not an independent composition, is, therefore, not in point. But, it is said, by the terms of the agreement the defendant was from the first the owner of the copyright in this production. Such a case was not considered in Shepherd v. Conquest. The jury have, however, found that the plaintiff did not sell his copyright to the defendant. I take that to mean that the terms of the agreement gave no property, either in law or equity, to the defendant in this composition.

It is further said that the performance was not "contrary to the right of the author," since the plaintiff gave a parol licence to the defendant to represent it. But the statute requires that any licence should be in writing, and no one can claim as a licensee without a licence in writing. If we held otherwise we should, I think, be defeating the intentions of the Legislature. As to the argument for estoppel, that is always a refuge for the destitute; but it would be absurd to say that any conduct of the plaintiff had led the defendant to believe either that he was himself the author of this composition or that he had a written licence to perform it. He no doubt acted on the expectation that the arrangement, which had worked harmoniously so far, would continue; but that does not amount to an estoppel.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I agree, therefore, in thinking that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case the findings of the jury were clearly right, and that brings it within Shepherd v. Conquest, as to which I will add nothing to what has been said. As to the defence of estoppel, I do not think there is a particle of evidence to support it. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff.

Appeal allowed.

KEMP v. GOLDBERG. (a.)

Mortgage—Action for reconveyance or redemption—Counter-claim admitting sums received on account—Particulars.

In an action by a mortgagor for reconveyance or redemption of the mortgaged property, the defendant by his counter-claim alleged that a certain specified sum was due to him, partly secured on bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff and partly on open account, and that he had received divers sums in respect of the bills of exchange and other sums in respect of the moneys due on open account, but that a large balance was due to him; and he claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

Held, on a summons by the mortgagor, that he was entitled to particulars from the defendant of the sums admitted to have been received by him in respect of the bills of exchange and the moneys due on open account.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in the action was mortgagor of certain real estate in Jersey, four policies of life assurance, and a bond. He alleged in his statement of claim that the mortgage debt had been repaid, and claimed reconveyance of the mortgaged property, or if the court should hold that all moneys due on the security of the mortgaged property had not been paid off, then an account and redemption.

The defendant, in his defence, stated that the mortgage debt had not been repaid, and that large sums were still owing on the security of the mortgaged property. By his counter-claim he alleged to be due to him a sum of £547 for commission on a sale effected by him and secured on the mortgaged property, and a sum of £5,063 17s. for moneys advanced, partly secured by bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff, and partly due on open account, and claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

The sixth paragraph of the counter-claim stated that "All the said bills of exchange have become due, and the defendant has, since the date of the said sale, received divers sums in respect thereof, and other sums in respect of moneys due to him on open account as aforesaid, but after giving credit for all moneys so received a large balance is still due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, together with interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on the balance from time to time owing."

This was a summons by the plaintiff asking for particulars of the payments alleged in that paragraph.

H. E. M. Stutfield (H. A. Forman with him), for the summons.—The plaintiff asks for particulars of the sums which the defendant alleges he received on account, in order that he may know the amount of the balance claimed and have an opportunity of paying it off without further proceedings.

D. L. Alexander, for the defendant.—The defendant asks for an account, and declines to anticipate the account by giving particulars. That is not the practice: Augustinus v. Nerincka, 29 W. R. 225, 16 Ch. D. 13; Blackie v. Osmaston, 33 W. R. 158, 28 Ch. D. 119.

NORTH, J.—I think that the plaintiff should have particulars of the sums admitted to have been received in the sixth paragraph of the counter-claim for this reason. The counter-claim is not for a mere balance alleged to be due, but for a definite sum; and the only ground for saying that it is not for a definite sum is that the defendant has received divers sums on account, and declines to state what those sums are. He asks for an account; but what right has he to oblige the plaintiff to have an expensive account taken. It seems to me that common sense requires that the defendant, who alone has the means of knowing, should state what he has received. The plaintiff will then have the opportunity of paying the balance claimed. The cases referred to do not apply to the present case.

It is not a matter of course that particulars should be given. If an account is asked for by a claim or counter-claim, and the court sees an account will be necessary, there may be good reasons for deciding that no particulars shall be given, so that the account shall not be given twice over. But it does not seem to me that particulars should be refused merely because an account is asked for. If in a simple foreclosure action the plaintiff had been in receipt of rents and profits, and the defendant alleged that he did not know what to pay or tender, the fact that the plaintiff asked for an account would not be a sufficient reason for his refusing to give particulars. I think this is a case in which the particulars asked for in respect of the sums mentioned as received in the 6th paragraph of the counter-claim should be given.

Summons allowed.

Bill of sale — Evidence — Certificate of registration omitting to state the filing of affidavit—Covenant to produce receipts for rent, &c.—"Without reasonable excuse"—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7 (4).

The production, at the hearing of an interpleader issue, of a bill of sale, together with a certificate of registration, is no evidence that the proper affidavit was also filed in accordance with the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, but the proper course is to adjourn the hearing for the production of evidence, and not hold the bill of sale void merely on this ground.

A bill of sale contained an unqualified covenant by the grantor to produce receipts for rent, without the addition of words corresponding to the words "without reasonable excuse" in section 7 (4) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; but contained a proviso that the chattels assigned should not be liable to seizure by the grantee for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of that Act.

Held, that the insertion of this covenant did not render the bill of sale void as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Appeal on an interpleader issue by the execution creditor from a decision of his Honour Judge Russell at the Manchester County Court, declaring a bill of sale valid.

W. E. Hume Williams, for the execution creditor.—The bill of sale is void on two grounds. It was proved at the hearing of the interpleader issue only by the production of the original bill itself, together with a certificate of registration, which certificate omits to state that the affidavit required by the Act of 1878 was filed, and that the copy of the bill filed was a true copy. Such a certificate has been held to be no evidence that an affidavit was filed, under provisions in the Bills of Sale Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), s. 1, which are practically identical with those of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 2: Mason v. Wood, 24 W. R. 41, 1 C. P. D. 63, followed in Emmett v. Marchant, 3 Q. B. D. 555, where, however, the court said that an adjournment ought to have been granted.

C. A. Russell, for the bill of sale holder, was called upon as to the first point.—The certificate of due registration involves the filing of the affidavit. Even if the certificate be not conclusive, it is primâ facie evidence that all things required by the statute have been done, and casts the burden of proving the insufficiency of the registration on the other side: Waddington v. Roberts, 16 W. R. 1040, L. R. 3 Q. B. 579. The affidavit was, in fact, filed, and I am ready to send for it now.

Mathew, J.—This is a purely technical point, and one which should not be taken unless there were some presumption that it would decide the rights of the parties. The proof of the bill of sale was insufficient; but this is not a case for a new trial, which is the most that can be asked for. The case must stand over for a week to enable the parties to examine the affidavit filed, in the event of our holding the bill of sale not void on the second ground.

A. L. Smith, J., concurred.

W. E. Hume Williams then argued the second point.—The bill of sale is void because it is not in accordance with the statutory form. It contains a covenant that the grantor will pay all rent, taxes, outgoings, &c., and take receipts, "and will, on demand in writing, produce the receipts," thus omitting the words "without reasonable excuse," which are found in section 7, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882, although it contains a proviso in accordance with the form in the schedule that there shall be no seizure for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of that Act.

It would be a breach of this covenant to fail to produce a receipt which had been accidentally lost, and though no express power to seize is contained in the bill of sale, one must be implied from the statutory proviso that there shall be no seizure except for certain specified causes: per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222. This covenant, therefore, gives a right to seizure in excess of the right given under section 7, sub-section 4, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; and a covenant which thus transgresses against the Act cannot be justified as a covenant "for the maintenance of the security" permitted by the form in the schedule: per Fry, L.J., Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423, 11 Q. B. D. 537, at p. 542, in which case, as in the present one, there was no express power to seize.

He also cited Stanford v. Barber, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259.

C. A. Russell, for the bill of sale holder.—Even if it be admitted that the bill of sale is bad on the principle laid down by Fry, L.J., in Davis v. Burton, yet a bill of sale containing an unqualified covenant to produce receipts has since been held valid by the Court of Appeal: Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, in which case Davis v. Burton was cited, though no decision on the point appears in the reports. And a covenant exactly similar to the covenant now in question has been considered good by Sir J. Hannen: Furber v. Cobb, 35 W. R. 398, 18 Q. B. D. 494, at p. 506. Assuming that a power to seize must be inserted by implication in this bill of sale, that power cannot be extended beyond the words from which it is implied—i.e., by the words of section 7, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882, which are incorporated in the bill of sale. Even if a general power to seize arises on breach of the unqualified covenant in the bill to produce receipts, yet this general power must be taken subject to the restrictions imposed by the special words contained in the proviso.

He also cited Bianchi v. Offord, 17 Q. B. D. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 27; Lumley v. Simmons, 35 W. R. 422, 34 Ch. D. 698.

Gore, as amicus curiæ, cited Real and Personal Advance Co. v. Clears, ante, p. 256.

Mathew, J.—There would seem to be abundant authority for us to decide this case either way; but in my opinion the judgment of the county court judge must be upheld. The covenant in question is certainly a covenant for the maintenance of the security, and it is one that is most useful in practice. As to the omission of the words "without reasonable excuse," it may be asked how is the bill of sale holder, who asks for the production of the receipts for rent, to know whether the excuse given for their non-production is reasonable? If he seizes the goods and is wrong in so doing, the grantor may apply, under section 7 of the Act of 1882, to a judge in chambers for an order restraining the sale, if he can satisfy the judge that there was a reasonable excuse. It was, no doubt, intended that there should be a right to seize the goods under this bill of sale, though it is not expressly given; but it must be taken to be a right as qualified by the express words of the Act. This view is supported by the authorities which would most influence us in arriving at our decision—viz., Goldstrom v. Tallerman and Furber v. Cobb.

A. L. Smith, J.—The question for us to answer is whether this bill of sale is rendered void by reason of the covenant whereby the grantor agrees to produce receipts for rent on demand in writing. Is this a covenant for the maintenance of the security? I think it is. I wish to add nothing to the remarks of Sir J. Hannen in Furber v. Cobb. It is here said that the bill is void because the covenant is absolute; but at the end of the bill there is a proviso that there shall be no seizure but for one of the five causes specified in section 7 of the Act of 1882. Therefore I think that on the true construction of this bill of sale the grantee could not seize the goods for a breach of the unqualified covenant. As to the authorities, in Davis v. Burton the bill of sale was held void because of its complex provisions. In Goldstrom v. Tallerman a bill of sale which contained the very covenant now before us was held good by the Court of Appeal, though it is true the point now taken was not argued. But in Furber v. Cobb the Court of Appeal held this very covenant good. In Stanford v. Barber the Court of Appeal thought that the insertion of such a covenant did not invalidate the bill of sale because there was no power of seizure on breach of the unqualified covenant.

Kemp v. Goldberg. (a.)

Mortgage—Action for reconveyance or redemption—Counter-claim admitting sums received on account—Particulars.

In an action by a mortgagor for reconveyance or redemption of the mortgaged property, the defendant by his counter-claim alleged that a certain specified sum was due to him, partly secured on bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff and partly on open account, and that he had received divers sums in respect of the bills of exchange and other sums in respect of the moneys due on open account, but that a large balance was due to him; and he claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

Held, on a summons by the mortgagor, that he was entitled to particulars from the defendant of the sums admitted to have been received by him in respect of the bills of exchange and the moneys due on open account.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in the action was mortgagor of certain real estate in Jersey, four policies of life assurance, and a bond. He alleged in his statement of claim that the mortgage debt had been repaid, and claimed reconveyance of the mortgaged property, or if the court should hold that all moneys due on the security of the mortgaged property had not been paid off, then an account and redemption.

The defendant, in his defence, stated that the mortgage debt had not been repaid, and that large sums were still owing on the security of the mortgaged property. By his counter-claim he alleged to be due to him a sum of £547 for commission on a sale effected by him and secured on the mortgaged property, and a sum of £5,063 17s. for moneys advanced, partly secured by bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff, and partly due on open account, and claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

The sixth paragraph of the counter-claim stated that "All the said bills of exchange have become due, and the defendant has, since the date of the said sale, received divers sums in respect thereof, and other sums in respect of moneys due to him on open account as aforesaid, but after giving credit for all moneys so received a large balance is still due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, together with interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on the balance from time to time owing."

This was a summons by the plaintiff asking for particulars of the payments alleged in that paragraph.

[illegible] his was an appeal from a decision given in the City [illegible] London Court.

[illegible] The action was brought under the Employers' [illegible] ability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42). The plaintiff [illegible] was employed by the defendant, a wharfinger and warehouseman, to take charge of a horse and trolley, it [illegible] being part of his duty to load and unload the trolley [illegible] for the delivery of goods to consignees, and to bring back the horse and trolley to the defendant's premises when his work was done. During this employment, in August, 1886, the defendant bought a new horse, which was placed under the plaintiff's control by the defendant's stable foreman. The horse proved to be a kicker and a jibber, and altogether unfit for driving. The plaintiff complained of it to the foreman and objected to driving it, but the foreman always replied that he must continue to drive and that if an accident occurred the defendant would be responsible. The plaintiff went on driving the horse for more than two months when, on November 12, while he was sitting in his proper place upon the trolley, the horse kicked out without any provocation and, striking the plaintiff on one of his legs, broke it. There was no evidence that the defendant himself knew of the horse being vicious as described.

The defendant, at the trial, maintained that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue under the Employers' Liability Act, as he was not a "workman" under the Act, nor was the horse "plant," nor the vice of the horse "defect in the condition of plant," and that the plaintiff voluntarily incurred the risk of accident, and was therefore not entitled to recover according to the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685. The plaintiff also must have contributed to the accident by his own negligence.

The judge held that the plaintiff was a "workman" and that the horse was "plant" within the Act, but he further held that the case came within the decision of Thomas v. Quartermaine, so that the plaintiff could not recover because he had continued to drive the horse after he was aware of its vicious nature, and therefore assented to incurring the risk attending the service. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

July 26.—W. E. Hume Williams, for the plaintiff.—The case does not come within Thomas v. Quartermaine, because in that case the plaintiff made no complaint, whereas in this case the plaintiff objected to the risk and only incurred it rather than lose his place. A master is bound to take all reasonable precautions to protect his workmen: Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macqu. 748, and when notice has been given him of defect in machinery he is liable for an accident due to the defect if the workman was not negligent: Clarke v. Holmes, 7 [illegible] & N. 937. The plaintiff brought himself within [illegible] on 3 of section 2 by the notice which he gave [illegible] man.

[illegible] d, for the defendant.—The plaintiff was not [illegible] within the Act, because he was a driver, and in

Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 577, 18 Q. B. D. 683, a driver was held not to be a workman within the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. The word "plant" is confined to inanimate objects such as fixtures and other chattels used in a business, and was never used before to describe a living creature. Even assuming the horse to be "plant," the plaintiff voluntarily continued in the dangerous employment, and cannot therefore recover: Thomas v. Quartermaine. The fact that he objected cannot do away with the fact that he continued when he might have given up his employment. In the words of Cockburn, C.J., in Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 25 W. R. 155, 2 Ex. D. 389, "if a man, for the sake of the employment, takes it or continues in it with a knowledge of its risks, he must trust to himself to keep clear of injury."

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant, who was a wharfinger, and for the purposes of his business the owner of carts or trolleys and horses. Amongst these was a horse which was of an extraordinarily vicious nature and wholly unfit, so far as is stated to us, to be driven even by the most careful driver. The plaintiff objected to drive him, and told the foreman of the stable that the horse was unsafe to drive, whereupon the foreman said: "You have to drive him, and if any accident happens we (meaning the employer) will be responsible." The plaintiff continued to drive the horse, and whilst so doing, sitting on a part of the trolley where it is said to be usual and not improper for the driver to sit, the horse kicked out and broke the plaintiff's leg. The plaintiff thereupon sued the owner of the horse, his employer. The judge of the City of London Court did that which I believe many county courts have done since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Quartermaine. The moment it was proved before him that the plaintiff knew the horse to be vicious, but continued to drive him, the judge said it was useless to inquire further, for that alone disentitled him to recover upon an application of what is called the maxim of Volenti non fit injuria. The judge acted upon the notion that that was the effect of the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Quartermaine, and, as I am given to understand, many county court judges have from the time that case was reported supposed that to be the effect of it. We are called upon now to say whether that is the true effect of the decision. My own position in the matter is extremely delicate, because I dissented from the decision of the rest of the court. I thought, and after mature consideration I have still the strongest conviction, that if that is really the effect of it the decision in that case was absolutely wrong; but I hope I have loyalty enough to say that if I thought that the decision of the majority of the judges there did mean what the county court judges have supposed it to mean, I should at once bow to it. The question we have now to consider is whether that was the real meaning of the majority—whether the judgment was not to a less rigid effect than that, and whether it does not leave open certain questions which must still be tried.

The first question here is whether this case is within the Employers' Liability Act at all. If it be not, then, according to the old law, if that Act had not existed, I have no doubt this plaintiff could not have recovered. He would have been a servant in the employment of the master, a part of whose machinery for carrying on his business was defective—in such a state that it would be a culpable want of care for the safety of his servants on the part of the employer to permit a necessary part of the machinery for carrying on his business to remain. But that was no concern of the jury. At all events, it was a thing which was patent, so that any person in the employ could know and see it. The horse here in question was not accidentally or suddenly vicious, but inherently vicious and known to be so. Under the old law it would have been said: "You" (the servant) "have entered into or continued in this employment where this thing of which you complain is open and palpable, and therefore it is an implied condition of your contract of service that you take upon yourself the risks of accidents therefrom, and consequently you have no remedy against your employer." As between master and servant that was the way the immunity from liability was always stated. The maxim Volenti non fit injuria was not wanted as between master and servant. It was only wanted, if at all, where no such relation as that of master and servant existed. That being so, then comes the question, what is to be the effect of the Employers' Liability Act? Does that Act apply to the present case?

Now the first question must be whether the plaintiff was a "workman" within the definition given in the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. I cannot entertain a doubt upon that. He is a man who drives a horse and trolley for a wharfinger. We must take into account what his ordinary duty was. He has to load and unload the trolley. That is manual labour. His duty may be compared to that of a lighterman who conducts a barge or lighter up and down the river. The driving the horse and trolley, and the navigating of the lighter, form the easiest part of the work; his real labour, that which tests his muscles and his sinews, is the loading and unloading of the trolley or the lighter.

Then comes the question which is somewhat more difficult, Can a horse be considered "plant" within section 1 of sub-section 1 of the Employers' Liability Act? It is suggested that nothing that is animate can be plant; that is, that living creatures can in no sense be considered plant. Why not? In many businesses, horses and carts, wagons, or drays, seem to me to form the most material part of the plant; they are the materials or instruments which the employer must use for the purpose of carrying on his business, and without which he could not carry it on at all. The principal part of the business of a wharfinger is conveying goods from the wharf to the houses or shops or warehouses of the consignees; and for this purpose he must use horses and carts or wagons. They are all necessary for the carrying on of the business. It cannot, for a moment, be contended that the carts and wagons are not "plant." Can it be said that the horses, without which the carts and wagons would be useless, are not? If, then, this horse was part of the plant, it had a defect, that is, it had the constant habit, whether in a stable or harnessed to a trolley, of kicking whatever was near it, whether a human being or a brick wall. In short, it was a vicious beast that could not be managed or controlled by the most careful driver. The plant, therefore, was defective. There was no evidence that the master (the defendant) knew of the defect. But the foreman who had the management of the stable, and under whose directions the horse was used, knew it; and after having repeatedly been told that it was unsafe, he said what practically amounted to this: "I care not whether the horse is vicious or not; you have got to drive him; and it matters nothing to you for, if you meet with an accident, the master will be responsible." The foreman, probably, had no power to bind his master to that; but it is, at all events, conclusive to show that he realised the fact that the plant was defective; and nothing was done to remedy the defect. Was this negligence on the part of the foreman for which the master was responsible? If the master had any duty at all to take care of his workmen, then allowing this imperfect plant to continue to be used was surely a breach of that duty. But it is said he may have had that duty, and may have neglected it as to those of his workmen who did not know of, or were not affected by, the particular defect, but not as to the plaintiff, who, knowing of the defect, still continued to drive the horse, and therefore comes within the maxim referred to. I confess that has always seemed to me to be not a bad way of illustrating the result; but it is, to my mind, a horrible way of stating the duty to say that a master owes no duty to a servant who knows that there is a defect in machinery, and, having pointed it out to one in authority, goes on using it. It seems cruel and unnatural, and, in my view, utterly abominable. It may be that the breach of this duty gives no right of action—that it is what is called a duty of imperfect obligation. Although the employer does not himself know of the defect, if he has put a person in his place to do what he ought himself to do, he is responsible for the negligence of that person.

Before the Employers' Liability Act there was this condition in the contract of hiring—that if there was a defect in the premises or machinery which was open and palpable, whether the servant actually knew it or not, he accepted the employment subject to the risk. That is the doctrine which is embodied in the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. I need hardly repeat that I detest the attempt to fetter the law by maxims. They are almost invariably misleading; they are for the most part so large and general in their language that they always include something which really is not intended to be included in them. I do not doubt that, if we put this maxim in plain English, part of it is true—that is to say, that if a thing is put before a workman and he is told, "Now, I do not ask you to do this unless you like; but I will give you more wages if you do. You see what it is. There is a rotten ladder—it is ten to one that it will break under you; but if you choose to run that risk I will give you higher wages." If the workman, seeing the risk, elects to incur it, no one could doubt that he would be precluded from recovering damages against his employer for any injury he might sustain from the breaking of the ladder. The same result would follow if the injured person was not a workman for hire. But does the maxim Volenti non fit injuria go this length—that the mere fact of the workman knowing that a thing is dangerous and yet using it is conclusive to show that he voluntarily incurs the risk? The answer to that depends (so far as this court is concerned) upon whether or not Thomas v. Quartermaine has so decided. I never entertained a doubt that the Employers' Liability Act does not prevent the proper application of the maxim Volenti non fit injuria; and I can only say, as an excuse for the part I took in Thomas v. Quartermaine, that that doctrine had never been mentioned on the argument of that case, but was for the first time suggested in the judgment of my brother Bowen. For myself I cannot help thinking that whether or not a workman has voluntarily agreed to incur the risk of defective machinery is a question of fact, and that, in my opinion, would have made the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine wrong, for the majority of the judges there took upon themselves to decide the question of fact, whereas, in my opinion, they had no right to decide it; the utmost they properly could do was to send it back to the county court. They held in that case that the facts were conclusive to show that the plaintiff did voluntarily—in the sense in which they understood the word—accept the risk. This revives the whole difficulty as to contributory negligence in cases of railway accidents (Davey v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 11 Q. B. D. 213). I have always protested that it is not for the judge to say whether or not a plaintiff (or the deceased in case of death) has been guilty of contributory negligence; he (the judge) has no right to hold that the evidence of it is conclusive; it should be left for the decision of the jury.

Now comes the other question, whether the Employers' Liability Act has done away with the old doctrine that a workman impliedly contracts or consents to incur a risk which is a visible and palpable one, and one which therefore he is to be taken to know of, or, if you please, which he does know of, or whether it applies only to the risks incident to common employment. For a time I was under the impression that the judgment in Thomas v. Quartermaine was that the Act only absolved the employer from liability for any injury resulting from the negligence of a fellow-workman. But upon looking at the matter more carefully I do not think they meant to say that. It was not necessary for them to say it, because they held that, inasmuch as the case was conclusively within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria, no other question arose in the case.

Now let us go back to the statute. We must look once more at section 1, sub-section 1, "where, after the commencement of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, the workman shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer nor engaged in his work." Here I say there was such defect and consequent personal injury. Read with this sub-sections 1 and 3 of section 2. Sub-section 1 provides that the workman shall not be entitled under this Act to any right of compensation or remedy against the employer under sub-section 1 of section 1, "unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in a proper condition," and sub-section 3 that "In any case where the workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself in the service of the employer, unless he was aware that the employer already knew of the said defect or negligence," the workman shall in like manner be disentitled to any right of compensation or remedy. Here the defect arose from the negligence of a person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the plant was in proper condition, and who had notice of the defect, and failed to take steps to avert injury.

To my mind it is clear that this was negligence with regard to the safety of his workmen for which the employer is responsible. But then it is said there may be that which prevents the workman from recovering compensation for an injury sustained by him in consequence of that negligence. The implied contract which I have adverted to under the old law did prevent it. Where there is no duty, it is said, there can be no negligence, or, in other words, there may be negligence which is not actionable negligence. It is very difficult to give a sensible construction to sub-section 3 of section 2. The workman who discovers the defect is to give notice of it, or he cannot recover. From that I infer that if he does give notice, and the defect is not remedied, he may recover. When is he to give notice? And what if the defect is not immediately remedied? Is the workman at once to refuse to incur the risk and quit the employ? That is a dilemma to which it never could have been intended to reduce the workman. I cannot help thinking that it is clearly enacted in the 3rd sub-section of section 2 that if the workman gives notice of the defect, and the employer fails to remedy it, the workman's claim for compensation is valid, unless he is brought clearly within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. Does the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine—for that is the judgment which is adopted by Fry, L.J.—mean to say that the mere knowledge of the workman and his continuing in the employ is fatal to him?

If I thought the judgment in Thomas v. Quartermaine really did mean that, whatever my own private opinion might be, I should unhesitatingly bow to it. I have been trying to construe that judgment fairly. At p. 697 of the report the learned judge, after referring to Law v. Corporation of Darlington, 28 W. R. 221, 5 Ex. D. 78, and Winch v. Conservators of the Thames, 22 W. R. 879, L. R. 9 C. P. 378, says: "The defendant in such circumstances does not discharge his legal obligation by merely affecting the plaintiff with knowledge of a danger which but for a breach of duty on his own part would not exist at all. But where the danger is one incident to a perfectly lawful use of his own premises neither contrary to statute nor common law, where the danger is visible and the risk appreciated, and where the injured person, knowing and appreciating both risk and danger, voluntarily encounters them, there is, in the absence of further acts of omission or commisson, no evidence of negligence on the part of the occupier at all. Knowledge is not a conclusive defence in itself. But when it is a knowledge under circumstances that leave no inference open but one—viz., that the risk has been voluntarily encountered—the defence seems to me complete." I must confess I do not like that way of putting it. I think there is a duty, though I agree that there is no actionable breach of that duty if the person injured, knowing and appreciating the danger, voluntarily elects to encounter it. In the preceding page the learned judge says: "It is no doubt true that the knowledge on the part of the injured person which will prevent him from alleging negligence against the occupier must be a knowledge under such circumstances as lead necessarily to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred. The maxim be it observed is not 'Scienti non fit injuria' but 'Volenti.' There may be a perception of the existence of the danger without appreciation of the risk; as where the workman is of imperfect intelligence." So that a dull man may recover damages where a man of intelligence may not. Both knew of the danger, but one is imperfectly informed as to its nature and extent.

Taking the whole of that judgment together, it seems to me to amount to this, that mere knowledge of the danger will not do; there must be an assent on the part of the workman to accept the risk, with a full appreciation of its extent, to bring the workman within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. If so, that is a question of fact. Here the judge of the court below has come to the conclusion that the moment it appeared that the plaintiff knew and appreciated the danger, and did not at once quit the defendant's employ, he came within the maxim, and was therefore, upon the authority of Thomas v. Quartermaine, disentitled to recover. He did not bring his mind to bear upon the motives which induced the plaintiff to act as he did, whether he relied upon the foreman's statement that the employer would be responsible in case of an accident, or whether he was influenced by the fear of being thrown out of employ if he disobeyed the foreman's orders. All that was for a jury, and the judge ought to have applied his mind to it. I see nothing in the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine to prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this case, unless the circumstances were such as to warrant a jury in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff, freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, impliedly agreed to incur it. For these reasons I think this case ought to go down for a new trial.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first question is whether the plaintiff is a "workman" within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act. In my opinion he is. His duty was not only to drive, but also to load and unload the goods which had to be transported on the trolley which it was his business to drive. This loading and unloading requires bodily labour and exertion, and brings the plaintiff within the statutory definition of a workman (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, s. 10).

The next question is whether the horse which injured the plaintiff is "plant" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act. There is no definition of plant in the Act, but in its ordinary sense it includes whatever apparatus is used by a business man for carrying on his business—not his stock-in-trade, which he buys or makes for sale, but all goods and chattels, fixed or movable, live or dead, which he keeps for permanent employment in his business (see Blake v. Shaw, 8 W. R. 410, Johns. 732). The word "defect" and the words "way and machinery," which occur in the section, throw some doubt on whether plant can include horses, but I do not think the doubt sufficient to require the court to hold that plant cannot include horses or to hold that plant must be confined to inanimate chattels. The defendant in this case has a number of horses for use in his business; they were part of his plant, not only in the ordinary sense of the word, but also, in my opinion, in the sense in which the word "plant" is used in section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act.

The next question is whether vice in a horse can be a defect in the condition of plant. Here, again, I think it can. I take defect to include anything which renders the plant, &c., unfit for the use for which it is intended, when used in a reasonable way and with reasonable care, and if a horse intended for drawing trolleys is from any cause unfit for such work, and a person is driving him with reasonable care, and is injured by reason of the unfitness of the horse for his work, such person may be properly said to be injured by reason of a defect in plant.

Having cleared the ground thus far, it is necessary to consider whether the defect "arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in his service and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the plant was in proper condition" (see section 2, sub-section 1). The defect—i.e., the unfitness of the horse—did not arise from the negligence of the defendant, nor, in truth, of anyone, nor is there any evidence that the defendant himself knew of such defect. But his stable foreman did know of it, and he, nevertheless, took no steps to prevent the horse from being used for a purpose for which he knew it was unfit, for he told the plaintiff to go on driving it, and said if anything happened "we"—i.e., his master—"must take the consequence." This, I think, is evidence of negligence on the part of the stable foreman for which the defendant can properly be held accountable unless his liability is excluded upon the ground that the plaintiff not only knew of the defect, but also took the risk upon himself.

This is the point which presents the greatest difficulty in the case, and which requires careful consideration. It must be taken as settled by Thomas v. Quartermaine that the words at the end of section 1 do no more than "remove such fetters on a workman's right to sue as had been previously held to arise out of the relation of master and workman"; that section 2, sub-section 3, does not extend the master's liability beyond that imposed by section 1 and section 2, sub-section 1; that in each of the cases specified in section 1 the maxim Volenti non fit injuria is applicable, and that if a workman, knowing and appreciating the danger and the risk, elects voluntarily to encounter them, he can no more maintain an action founded upon the statute than he can in cases to which the statute has no application. Those principles are, in my opinion, perfectly sound; but the proper application of them is by no means always easy. The question whether in any particular a plaintiff was volens or nolens is a question of fact and not of law. Bowen, L.J., was careful to point out that the mere fact that the plaintiff knew of the danger and yet incurred it is not conclusive. He says: "The maxim, be it observed, is not Scienti non fit injuria, but Volenti non fit injuria. He further points out that there may be cases in which a non-workman who knew of a danger and incurred it might nevertheless maintain an action against the person exposing him to it. The question in each case must be, not simply whether the plaintiff knew of the risk, but whether the circumstances are such as necessarily to lead to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred by the plaintiff.

The learned judge who tried the present case thought he was bound by Thomas v. Quartermaine to decide it in favour of the defendant. In this respect I differ from him. The principles laid down in that case are no doubt to be accepted and followed, and, if I may say so, I entirely concur in them; but it is not, in my opinion, correct to regard that case as deciding this. The facts there and the facts here are materially different. In Thomas v. Quartermaine the facts were all one way; there was evidence that the plaintiff was volens and not merely sciens; he was not even directed to do what led to his injury; he did it voluntarily of his own accord; there was no evidence that the plaintiff was nolens; the plant was not defective or dangerous to persons engaged in the ordinary course of their employment; the plaintiff had never complained of it; the injury was the result of a pure accident, and the case might well have been decided on that ground alone. In the present case the horse was vicious, the plaintiff was constantly complaining of it to the defendant's foreman, the foreman told the plaintiff to go on driving it, and the plaintiff did so rather than run the risk of dismissal; nor is it possible to regard this case as one of accident. Under these circumstances, the question is whether the plaintiff, with knowledge and appreciation of both the risk and the danger, voluntarily took the risk upon himself. The plaintiff was not engaged to drive vicious horses, and the conversation with the foreman, though not evidence against the defendant of any promise by him to take the risk, is, in my opinion, admissible to explain the conduct of the plaintiff, and to rebut the inference that he voluntarily took the risk upon himself.

To hold that this case is concluded by Thomas v. Quartermaine is, I think, to carry that case further than is warranted by the principle on which it was decided; it is to do the very thing Bowen, L.J., so carefully pointed out the danger of doing—viz., to treat sciens as equivalent to volens. The Act cannot, I think, be properly construed in such a way as to protect masters who knowingly provide defective plant for their workmen, and who seek to throw the risk of using it on them by putting them in the unpleasant position of having to leave their situations or submit to use what is known to be unfit for use. Thomas v. Quartermaine is no authority for any such construction of the statute.

If in any case it can be shown as a fact that a workman agreed to incur a particular danger, or voluntarily exposed himself to it, and was thereby injured, he cannot hold his master liable. But in the cases mentioned in the Act, a workman who never, in fact, engaged to incur a particular danger, but who finds himself exposed to it, and complains of it, cannot, in my opinion, be held, as a matter of law, to have impliedly agreed to incur that danger, or to have voluntarily incurred it because he does not refuse to face it, nor can it, in my opinion, be held that there is no case to submit to a jury on the question whether he has agreed to incur it or has voluntarily incurred it or not, simply because, though he protested, he went on as before. The facts of each particular case must be ascertained and considered. If nothing more is proved than that the workman saw danger, reported it, but on being told to go on, went on as before in order to avoid dismissal, a jury may, in my opinion, properly find that he had not agreed to take the risk, and had not acted voluntarily in the sense of having taken the risk upon himself. Fear of dismissal rather than voluntary action might properly be inferred. A fortiori, might the jury properly come to such a conclusion if it was proved that the workman was told by his superintendent not to mind, and that if any accident happened the employer must make it good? Such an additional circumstance would go far to negative the inference that the complaining workman took the risk upon himself.

I cannot construe the Act as shutting out such considerations as these, and as the learned judge did not think himself at liberty to entertain them, and decided in favour of the defendant upon what I consider a misconception of Thomas v. Quartermaine, I think there ought to be a new trial.

LOPES, L.J.—This is an important and difficult case, and I regret that I am unable to agree with the decision of the rest of the court.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, but the judge of the court below has not decided the case on any question arising under that Act apart from the law as it existed before the passing of that Act, but has given judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff knew all the facts, was well acquainted with the character of the horse, and voluntarily encountered the risk, and that therefore there was no evidence of negligence arising from any breach of duty which the defendant owed the plaintiff entitling the plaintiff to recover.

It is to be observed that section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act—which must be read together—effect no change in the law as regards the liability of the employer, except in certain specified cases, by identifying a "person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant are in proper condition" with the employer, and taking him out of the category of fellow servants and rendering the employer responsible for his negligence. There is nothing here to affect the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria if it applies; nor is that doctrine touched by anything in section 1, sub-section 3; but of that presently. The doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria is exhaustively dealt with in the cases of Woodley v. Metropolitan Railway Co. and Thomas v. Quartermaine. Both these cases were in the Court of Appeal, and the judgments of the majority of the court are not only binding on us sitting as a divisional court, but are binding on the Court of Appeal itself. The question, therefore, is whether the present case is governed by these cases, or either of them?

To determine this it is essential to state shortly the facts of the present case. The plaintiff was the driver of a trolley, and at the time of the accident had been about four years in the employ of the defendant, who was a wharfinger. This accident happened in November, 1886. In the previous August a horse had been purchased by the defendant, which was, by Tomlin, the defendant's stable foreman, assigned to the plaintiff to drive in his trolley. The plaintiff's duty was to clean, take care of, and drive the horse in his trolley, and to go with his trolley where ordered by Tomlin, who had the superintendence of the horses, and to load and unload as instructed. From the first the horse was vicious and troublesome—so vicious and troublesome that it was said to have broken down a brick wall, and generally to be a kicker and a jibber. The plaintiff had constantly complained of this horse to Tomlin, and had been told by him to go on driving the horse, and that his employer would be responsible for anything the horse did. The plaintiff, though daily, as he said, complaining, continued in the defendant's service driving the horse. On the 12th of November the plaintiff was driving the horse sitting on the trolley with his legs hanging down behind the horse. There was no other place on the trolley provided for him where he could sit to drive. The horse kicked violently, broke the plaintiff's leg and injured him severely. In these circumstances he brings his action against the defendant. The case came on to be tried in the City of London Court without a jury, and the judge, considering it undistinguishable from Thomas v. Quartermaine, and that the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria applied, stopped the case and gave judgment for the defendant.

Is this a case where the employer is absolved from liability because the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to the risk within the principle contained in the cases to which I have referred? In Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., the plaintiff was a workman, not in the employment of the defendants, but in that of a contractor employed by them. He had to work in a dark tunnel, rendered dangerous by trains constantly passing. After he had been working for a fortnight he was injured by a passing train. The jury found that the defendants were negligent, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £300. A rule to set aside this verdict was discharged, and on appeal it was held by the majority of the Court of Appeal that the plaintiff, having continued in his employment with full knowledge, could not make the defendants liable for an injury to which he voluntarily exposed himself.

The only distinctions that I can find between that case and the present are the following:—Woodley was hired to do dangerous work, and knew its dangerous character and attendant risks. Yarmouth was hired to do work not dangerous—viz., amongst other work, to drive horses, which most frequently are manageable. The horse which did the mischief was intrusted to his care after he entered on the employment, and it was then first he learned its propensities, but long after he had been made aware of its vicious nature he continued to drive it. There was no evidence that Woodley ever made any complaint to his employer. Yarmouth, on the contrary, complained, but continued in the employment. Having regard to the judgments of the majority of the court, I do not think that what I have suggested furnishes any substantial ground for distinction. Cockburn, C.J., says:—"With a full knowledge of the danger, he (Woodley) continued in the employment, and had been working in the tunnel for a fortnight when the accident happened. If he becomes aware of the danger which has been concealed from him, and which he had not the means of becoming acquainted with before he entered on the employment, or of the want of the necessary means to prevent mischief, his proper course is to quit the employment. If he continues in it, he is in the same position as though he had accepted it with a full knowledge of its danger in the first instance, and must be taken to waive his right to call upon the employer to do what is necessary for his protection, or, in the alternative, to quit the service. If he continues to take the benefit of the employment, he must take it subject to its disadvantages. If a man chooses to accept the employment, or to continue in it with a knowledge of the danger, he must abide the consequences, so far as any claim to compensation against the employer is concerned. Morally speaking, those who employ men on dangerous work, without doing all in their power to obviate the danger, are highly reprehensible, as I certainly think the company were in the present instance. The workman who depends on his employment for the bread of himself and his family is thus tempted to incur risks to which, as a matter of humanity, he ought not to be exposed. But, looking at the matter in a legal point of view, if a man, for the sake of the employment, takes it or continues in it with a knowledge of its risks, he must trust to himself to keep clear of injury." This judgment, in which the majority of the court concurred, covers the present case, and, subject to the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act, disposes of the only distinction which I am able to suggest.

The point that Yarmouth was not engaged to drive a dangerous horse is met by the fact that he continued in the service after he knew the horse was dangerous, and his constant complaints may be regarded as evidence of his thorough appreciation of the risk he was incurring, and of his willingness to incur that risk rather than relinquish his employment. After complaining, he remains in the service for a long time, knowing the risk, and knowing that no steps had been taken to prevent its continuance. This is more consistent with his acquiescence in a disregard of his complaints, and with a willingness to incur the risk, than with the contrary view.

In Griffiths v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., 32 W. R. 831, 12 Q. B. D. 493, on appeal 13 Q. B. D. 259, 32 W. R. Dig. 129, it was held that in an action brought by a servant against his master for personal injury resulting from the unsafe state of the premises upon which the servant was employed, the statement of claim must allege, not only that the master knew, but that the servant was ignorant of the danger. The present Master of the Rolls said:—"If the danger is one which was known to the master and not to the servant, the knowledge of the master and the want of knowledge of the servant make together a cause of action, and as it is necessary that these two things should exist in order to form a primâ facie cause of action, it is necessary that they should be shown to exist in the statement of claim" (13 Q. B. D., at p. 260). And Bowen, L.J., at p. 261 in the same case, says, "Both these allegations are material, because without them there is no cause of action."

It is, therefore, abundantly clear that as the danger was known to the servant (the plaintiff) he could not recover before the Employers' Liability Act.

It is said, however, that Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., Griffiths v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., and other cases do not govern the case before the court. It is said that the law has been altered in cases to which the Employers' Liability Act applies; and I assume for the purposes of this case that the Employers' Liability Act applies to the case of this plaintiff. It is suggested that there is something in the Employers' Liability Act which qualifies the defence of Volenti non fit injuria—a defence which would have been available for the master before the Act. It is said that a workman who can bring himself within one of the five clauses of section 1 of the Act is not to be treated as volens, although he thoroughly appreciated the risk he was incurring, complained of it, and for a long time continued in the service preferring the risk to quitting the service, and this although he would have been treated as volens before the Act.

I cannot accede to this view. It is opposed to the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine. The third sub-section of section 2 is relied upon. Bowen, L.J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine deals with that clause. He says, "The object of that clause is to limit the employer's liability, not to enlarge it." I read it thus:—Although under section 1 the workman, with certain exceptions, is to be placed in a position as advantageous as, but not better than, the rest of the world who use the master's premises in his business, the workman is not to have this advantage if, knowing of any defect or negligence, he does not inform the employer, as provided in that section. The object of this is to give the employer the opportunity of remedying the mischief. In fact, the workman is not to have the advantages of the Act unless he performs the condition precedent of making the master aware of his cause of complaint. This leaves the employer's defence of Volenti non fit injuria untouched by the Act if he can prove it. It is said that such a construction would make the Act nearly a dead letter. But this is not the case. In all cases where the workman is ignorant of the defect or negligence, and is injured by a fellow workman's negligence, "common employment" is no longer a defence for the master in the cases specified in section 1, as it would have been before the passing of the Act.

It is said that the object of the Act was to exclude in the specified cases the two legal inferences which were before the Act to be drawn against the workman from the mere fact of his employment—viz., first, the inference that he accepted the risk of his fellow servants' negligence; and, secondly, the inference that he accepted the risks which were involved in the execution of his employer's orders, if he in fact ran them, rather than refuse to do so, and thereby incur the risk of dismissal. I agree that it was the object of the Act to exclude the first inference, and in the specified cases to destroy the defence of "common employment." But what authority there is for the contention that it was intended to extinguish the second inference I fail to be able to discover.

The true construction of the 3rd sub-section of section 2, in my opinion, is that, whereas, before the Act, knowledge would have disentitled the workman to recover, now knowledge in the specified cases is no longer to create a disability, provided the workman gives information; but if, after giving information, he continues in the employment, knowing the danger he is incurring, the same inference arises as heretofore—viz., the inference that he voluntarily runs the risk—and any evidence of negligence arising from any breach of duty on the part of the employer is by the workman's conduct displaced.

I agree with the decision of the majority of the court in Thomas v. Quartermaine, and with the construction they place on the Employers' Liability Act. That Act only removes such obstacles to a workman's right to sue as had been held to arise from the relation of master and servant. It leaves the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria untouched. Now, as before the Act, to use the words of Bowen, L.J. (18 Q. B. D., at p. 699), "one man cannot sue another in respect of a danger or risk not unlawful in itself, that was visible, apparent, and voluntarily encountered by the person." The present case seems a stronger case of voluntary exposure to danger than that of Thomas v. Quartermaine. In the latter case there is little, if any, evidence that Thomas knew of or appreciated the danger; but in the present case the evidence is strong to show that Yarmouth thoroughly understood the danger to which he was exposing himself. With a knowledge of the danger, though complaining, he continues in the service, indicating thereby a willingness to incur the risk rather than give up his employment.

In my opinion the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine decides that every defence (except, in specified cases, the defence of "common employment") is still open to the employer; thus leaving the law, except in the case of "common employment" in the specified instances, as it was laid down in Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co. It was for the plaintiff here to make out that the defendant was negligent towards the plaintiff in conducting himself as admittedly he did. I can see no evidence of any negligence arising from any breach of duty which the defendant owed the plaintiff.

The plaintiff deposed that when he complained Tomlin told him to go on driving the horse, and that his employer would be responsible. There is no evidence that Tomlin was authorized by the defendant to make this statement. The judge below disregarded this evidence, and I think rightly; it was not admissible as evidence against the master (the defendant); I am unable to see any substantial difference between the present case and the cases to which I have referred, and I think the judge was right in giving judgment for the defendant.

I am also of opinion that the judge was right in holding that the plaintiff was a person to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applied, and, therefore, in that respect entitled to sue under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The case of Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co. is an authority for this. Holding as I do it is unnecessary to decide whether a horse is "plant" within section 1, sub-section 1, for, assuming it in the plaintiff's favour, in my opinion he cannot recover. I wish to be understood as not expressing any opinion on this. The appeal will therefore be allowed.

Probate—Practice—Two wills—English will disposing of English estate—Belgian will disposing of Belgian estate—Probate of both wills to English executor—Law of Belgium.

An English testator died in Belgium, having there made a will in English form disposing of his English estate, and a will in Belgian form disposing of his property in Belgium. The executor appointed by the Belgian will having renounced and consented to the present application, the court on motion granted probate of the two wills, as together constituting the last will of the deceased, to the English executor.

Motion for probate of two wills of the testator, the Rev. W. W. Bolton, as together constituting the last will of the deceased.

The deceased was an Englishman by birth. He had resided for many years as English Chaplain at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and for fifteen years prior to his death, which took place on the 6th of May, 1887, at Bruges, in the kingdom of Belgium. He had frequently expressed his intention of returning to England.

At the time of his death he was possessed of a house at Bruges and shares in a banking company there. He was also entitled to money lent in Canada and on mortgage in England, and to a fund in the High Court of Justice in England.

On the 9th of September, 1885, he duly executed at Bruges a will prepared in England bequeathing all his personal property in England and Canada to his sister and three nieces, and he appointed Mr. Freeman, his solicitor in London, sole executor.

At the time of the execution of this will he informed Mr. Freeman that he intended to make a will in Belgian form disposing of his Belgian property. By the Belgian law a Belgian will must be dictated to a notary in the presence of witnesses.

On the 29th of September, 1886, the testator executed a will at Bruges in accordance with Belgian law. It commenced with a statement by the notary that it was dictated in the presence of four witnesses, and that the testator had requested the notary to prepare and witness the execution of his will in reference to his property situate in Belgium, and after the gift of various legacies, all payable out of property situate in Belgium,

I agree, therefore, in thinking that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case the findings of the jury were clearly right, and that brings it within Shepherd v. Conquest, as to which I will add nothing to what has been said. As to the defence of estoppel, I do not think there is a particle of evidence to support it. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff.

KEMP v. GOLDBERG. (a.)

Mortgage—Action for reconveyance or redemption—Counter-claim admitting sums received on account—Particulars.

In an action by a mortgagor for reconveyance or redemption of the mortgaged property, the defendant by his counter-claim alleged that a certain specified sum was due to him, partly secured on bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff and partly on open account, and that he had received divers sums in respect of the bills of exchange and other sums in respect of the moneys due on open account, but that a large balance was due to him; and he claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

Held, on a summons by the mortgagor, that he was entitled to particulars from the defendant of the sums admitted to have been received by him in respect of the bills of exchange and the moneys due on open account.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in the action was mortgagor of certain real estate in Jersey, four policies of life assurance, and a bond. He alleged in his statement of claim that the mortgage debt had been repaid, and claimed reconveyance of the mortgaged property, or if the court should hold that all moneys due on the security of the mortgaged property had not been paid off, then an account and redemption.

The defendant, in his defence, stated that the mortgage debt had not been repaid, and that large sums were still owing on the security of the mortgaged property. By his counter-claim he alleged to be due to him a sum of £547 for commission on a sale effected by him and secured on the mortgaged property, and a sum of £5,063 17s. for moneys advanced, partly secured by bills of exchange accepted by the plaintiff, and partly due on open account, and claimed an account and foreclosure or sale.

The sixth paragraph of the counter-claim stated that "All the said bills of exchange have become due, and the defendant has, since the date of the said sale, received divers sums in respect thereof, and other sums in respect of moneys due to him on open account as aforesaid, but after giving credit for all moneys so received a large balance is still due and owing from the plaintiff to the defendant, together with interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on the balance from time to time owing."

This was a summons by the plaintiff asking for particulars of the payments alleged in that paragraph.

H. E. M. Stutfield (H. A. Forman with him), for the summons.—The plaintiff asks for particulars of the sums which the defendant alleges he received on account, in order that he may know the amount of the balance claimed and have an opportunity of paying it off without further proceedings.

D. L. Alexander, for the defendant.—The defendant asks for an account, and declines to anticipate the account by giving particulars. That is not the practice: Augustinus v. Nerinckx, 29 W. R. 225, 16 Ch. D. 13; Blackie v. Osmaston, 33 W. R. 158, 28 Ch. D. 119.

NORTH, J.—I think that the plaintiff should have particulars of the sums admitted to have been received in the sixth paragraph of the counter-claim for this reason. The counter-claim is not for a mere balance alleged to be due, but for a definite sum; and the only ground for saying that it is not for a definite sum is that the defendant has received divers sums on account, and declines to state what those sums are. He asks for an account; but what right has he to oblige the plaintiff to have an expensive account taken. It seems to me that common sense requires that the defendant, who alone has the means of knowing, should state what he has received. The plaintiff will then have the opportunity of paying the balance claimed. The cases referred to do not apply to the present case.

It is not a matter of course that particulars should be given. If an account is asked for by a claim or counter-claim, and the court sees an account will be necessary, there may be good reasons for deciding that no particulars shall be given, so that the account shall not be given twice over. But it does not seem to me that particulars should be refused merely because an account is asked for. If in a simple foreclosure action the plaintiff had been in receipt of rents and profits, and the defendant alleged that he did not know what to pay or tender, the fact that the plaintiff asked for an account would not be a sufficient reason for his refusing to give particulars. I think this is a case in which the particulars asked for in respect of the sums mentioned as received in the 6th paragraph of the counter-claim should be given.

Summons allowed.

Bill of sale—Evidence—Certificate of registration omitting to state the filing of affidavit—Covenant to produce receipts for rent, &c.—"Without reasonable excuse"—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7 (4).

The production, at the hearing of an interpleader issue, of a bill of sale, together with a certificate of registration, is no evidence that the proper affidavit was also filed in accordance with the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, but the proper course is to adjourn the hearing for the production of evidence, and not hold the bill of sale void merely on this ground.

A bill of sale contained an unqualified covenant by the grantor to produce receipts for rent, without the addition of words corresponding to the words "without reasonable excuse" in section 7 (4) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; but contained a proviso that the chattels assigned should not be liable to seizure by the grantee for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of that Act.

Held, that the insertion of this covenant did not render the bill of sale void as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Appeal on an interpleader issue by the execution creditor from a decision of his Honour Judge Russell at the Manchester County Court, declaring a bill of sale valid.

W. E. Hume Williams, for the execution creditor.—The bill of sale is void on two grounds. It was proved at the hearing of the interpleader issue only by the production of the original bill itself, together with a certificate of registration, which certificate omits to state that the affidavit required by the Act of 1878 was filed, and that the copy of the bill filed was a true copy. Such a certificate has been held to be no evidence that an affidavit was filed, under provisions in the Bills of Sale Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), s. 1, which are practically identical with those of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, sub-section 2: Mason v. Wood, 24 W. R. 41, 1 C. P. D. 63, followed in Emmett v. Marchant, 3 Q. B. D. 555, where, however, the court said that an adjournment ought to have been granted.

C. A. Russell, for the bill of sale holder, was called upon as to the first point.—The certificate of due registration involves the filing of the affidavit. Even if the certificate be not conclusive, it is primâ facie evidence that all things required by the statute have been done, and casts the burden of proving the insufficiency of the registration on the other side: Waddington v. Roberts, 16 W. R. 1040, L. R. 3 Q. B. 579. The affidavit was, in fact, filed, and I am ready to send for it now.

Mathew, J.—This is a purely technical point, and one which should not be taken unless there were some presumption that it would decide the rights of the parties. The proof of the bill of sale was insufficient; but this is not a case for a new trial, which is the most that can be asked for. The case must stand over for a week to enable the parties to examine the affidavit filed, in the event of our holding the bill of sale not void on the second ground.

A. L. Smith, J., concurred.

W. E. Hume Williams then argued the second point.—The bill of sale is void because it is not in accordance with the statutory form. It contains a covenant that the grantor will pay all rent, taxes, outgoings, &c., and take receipts, "and will, on demand in writing, produce the receipts," thus omitting the words "without reasonable excuse," which are found in section 7, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882, although it contains a proviso in accordance with the form in the schedule that there shall be no seizure for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of that Act.

It would be a breach of this covenant to fail to produce a receipt which had been accidentally lost, and though no express power to seize is contained in the bill of sale, one must be implied from the statutory proviso that there shall be no seizure except for certain specified causes: per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222. This covenant, therefore, gives a right to seizure in excess of the right given under section 7, sub-section 4, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; and a covenant which thus transgresses against the Act cannot be justified as a covenant "for the maintenance of the security" permitted by the form in the schedule: per Fry, L.J., Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423, 11 Q. B. D. 537, at p. 542, in which case, as in the present case, there was no express power to seize.

He also cited Stanford v. Barber, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259.

C. A. Russell, for the bill of sale holder.—Even if it be admitted that the bill of sale is bad on the principle laid down by Fry, L.J., in Davis v. Burton, yet a bill of sale containing an unqualified covenant to produce receipts has since been held valid by the Court of Appeal: Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, in which case Davis v. Burton was cited, though no decision on the point appears in the reports. And a covenant exactly similar to the covenant now in question has been considered good by Sir J. Hannen: Furber v. Cobb, 35 W. R. 398, 18 Q. B. D. 494, at p. 506. Assuming that a power to seize must be inserted by implication in this bill of sale, that power cannot be extended beyond the words from which it is implied—i.e., by the words of section 7, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1882, which are incorporated in the bill of sale. Even if a general power to seize arises on breach of the unqualified covenant in the bill to produce receipts, yet this general power must be taken subject to the restrictions imposed by the special words contained in the proviso.

He also cited Bianchi v. Offord, 17 Q. B. D. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 27; Lumley v. Simmons, 35 W. R. 422, 34 Ch. D. 698.

Gore, as amicus curiæ, cited Real and Personal Advance Co. v. Olcars, ante, p. 256.

Mathew, J.—There would seem to be abundant authority for us to decide this case either way; but in my opinion the judgment of the county court judge must be upheld. The covenant in question is certainly a covenant for the maintenance of the security, and it is one that is most useful in practice. As to the omission of the words "without reasonable excuse," it may be asked how is the bill of sale holder, who asks for the production of the receipts for rent, to know whether the excuse given for their non-production is reasonable? If he seizes the goods and is wrong in so doing, the grantor may apply, under section 7 of the Act of 1882, to a judge in chambers for an order restraining the sale, if he can satisfy the judge that there was a reasonable excuse. It was, no doubt, intended that there should be a right to seize the goods under this bill of sale, though it is not expressly given; but it must be taken to be a right as qualified by the express words of the Act. This view is supported by the authorities which would most influence us in arriving at our decision—viz., Goldstrom v. Tallerman and Furber v. Cobb.

A. L. Smith, J.—The question for us to answer is whether this bill of sale is rendered void by reason of the covenant whereby the grantor agrees to produce receipts for rent on demand in writing. Is this a covenant for the maintenance of the security? I think it is. I wish to add nothing to the remarks of Sir J. Hannen in Furber v. Cobb. It is here said that the bill is void because the covenant is absolute; but at the end of the bill there is a proviso that there shall be no seizure but for one of the five causes specified in section 7 of the Act of 1882. Therefore I think that on the true construction of this bill of sale the grantee could not seize the goods for a breach of the unqualified covenant. As to the authorities, in Davis v. Burton the bill of sale was held void because of its complex provisions. In Goldstrom v. Tallerman a bill of sale which contained the very covenant now before us was held good by the Court of Appeal, though it is true the point now taken was not argued. But in Furber v. Cobb the Court of Appeal held this very covenant good. In Stanford v. Barber the Court of Appeal thought that the insertion of such a covenant did not invalidate the bill of sale because there was no power of seizure on breach of the unqualified covenant.

JAMES v. RICKNELL. (a.)

Solicitor—Retainer—Extent of authority—Interpleader contested without special instructions.

A retainer given to a solicitor to take proceedings to recover a debt does not give him authority to engage in interpleader proceedings, without special instructions, after judgment has been obtained and execution issued.

Appeal from the Lord Mayor's Court.

The plaintiff, a solicitor, had been instructed by the defendant to take proceedings for the recovery of a debt. Judgment having been obtained, and execution issued against the debtor, the goods were claimed under a bill of sale. The trial of an interpleader issue was ordered which the plaintiff unsuccessfully contested. The plaintiff paid the sheriff's charges, and then brought this action against his client to recover the costs and disbursements incident to the proceedings in interpleader. The jury found that beyond his original retainer to take proceedings for the recovery of the debt, the plaintiff had received no special instructions to contest the interpleader issue. The deputy judge held that the plaintiff had no authority from the defendant to engage in interpleader proceedings, and gave judgment for the defendant.

W. E. Hume Williams and L. Pearson, for the plaintiff.—No special instructions were necessary to enable the plaintiff to contest the interpleader issue. Interpleader proceedings form a part of the original action. A solicitor who is retained to conduct an action is entitled to pursue it to its termination, and to do anything to recover the fruits of a judgment, and there can be no termination of an action until all its parts have been disposed of, and the fruits of the judgment are recovered.

The following cases were cited:—Lady de la Pole v. Dick, 33 W. R. 585, 29 Ch. D. 351; Lawrence v. Harrison, 2 Styles, 426; Jarmain v. Hooper, 6 M. & Gr. 827; Bevins v. Hulme, 15 M. & W. 88; Hamlyn v. Betteley, 29 W. R. 275, 6 Q. B. D. 63.

Rose-Innes, for the defendant, was not called upon.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. Authority is given to a solicitor to recover a debt, and to proceed with all ordinary steps for carrying out the machinery for such recovery. But this authority does not extend to substantially embarking on fresh litigation in order to recover the fruits of a judgment. I should require very strong authority to support the plaintiff's contention, and I can find none. There is no authority to show that the original retainer extends beyond execution. Mr. Hume Williams says that, technically, interpleader is part of the proceedings in an action. This seems to me to be immaterial. Rights and wrongs are not determined by names. An authority to conduct an action to its lawful end cannot carry with it authority to engraft upon it new litigation, which may continue to any extent, and at any cost, and with respect to which the client is entitled to exercise his own judgment as to whether he will contest it or not.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. If it be true that there are no cases which decide whether or not an interpleader is within the authority of an original retainer, I am ready to lay it down as law that it is not. Hamlyn v. Betteley decides quite a different point. The question there was whether an interpleader could be tried by a judge without a jury, and the Lord Chief Justice said that as regards procedure it was not sufficiently a fresh action to come within the rules for a new trial.

Appeal dismissed.

A man who sells tincture of opium which is not up to the standard laid down in the British Pharmacopœia is liable to be convicted of selling "a drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded" under section 6 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, although the purchaser did not specify any particular standard.

Case stated by stipendiary magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

George Bywater, a chemist at Sheffield, was charged by Sinclair White, the medical officer of health, for selling to him a certain drug—to wit, 3ozs. tincture of opium—which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by him, contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

The complainant stated that he went to the defendant's shop and asked for 3ozs. of tincture of opium. The defendant in person supplied him with the opium, for which he paid one shilling. In accordance with section 14 of the Act of 1875 one-third of the quantity was left with the defendant, one-third was kept by the complainant, and one-third sent to be analyzed.

The result of the analysis was as follows:—On a comparison with the description of tincture of opium given in the British Pharmacopœia—

	Sample.	Brit. Pharm. Tincture.
Alcoholic strength shown in degrees of proof spirit .	56·8	100·0
Morphia	0. 23°/.	75°/.
× 10 Opium . . .	2·3	7·5

Showing that the proportion of opium in the sample was less than one-third of that contained in the Pharmacopœia, while the proportion of alcohol was somewhat more than a half of the proper quantity.

At the hearing it was contended that the magistrate ought to convict the defendant because the analysis showed that the tincture of opium was not in accordance with the British Pharmacopœia of 1885.

On the part of the complainant evidence was given that "tincture of opium" was a well-understood term in the trade, and that the material sold by the defendant was not of the nature, substance, and quality of tincture of opium as generally understood by persons dealing with it, and that the British Pharmacopœia was the only one recognised generally by the medical profession and pharmacists.

No evidence was offered by the defendant, but he stated that he got the tincture of opium from the same firm as that from which his predecessor had got it.

The magistrate dismissed the complaint on the ground that in the absence of any special request to be supplied with tincture of opium according to the recipe in the British Pharmacopœia the complaint made did not lie, inasmuch as the purchaser did get what he asked for —namely, tincture of opium.

The question for the court was whether or not, under the circumstances, the magistrate ought to have convicted the defendant.

Wormald, for the appellant.—The article supplied was not the article of commerce known as tincture of opium. That is well known in the trade and is defined in the British Pharmacopœia. By the Pharmacy Act, 1867 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), s. 15, medicines of the British Pharmacopœia are prohibited from being compounded except according to the formularies there laid down. No specific demand was necessary unless something other than the article as defined was required. The magistrate was therefore bound to convict because the case showed a distinct breach of section 6 of the Act of 1875.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question referred to us is, I think, disposed of by what is stated in the case. The evidence of three competent witnesses shows that the article supplied to the purchaser was not of "the nature, substance, or quality" of the article demanded by him. It was proved or admitted that the tincture of opium supplied by the respondent was not in accordance with the standard quality prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia. I am, therefore, though somewhat reluctantly, bound to come to the conclusion that the respondent ought to have been convicted of the offence with which he was charged, and that the case must go back to the magistrate with our opinion to that effect.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The customer asks for "tincture of opium." That must mean the article known in commerce as tincture of opium. The thing supplied to him was not tincture of opium of commerce, but an article of very inferior substance and quality. That being so, the respondent was guilty of the offence charged, and ought to have been convicted.

Case remitted.

YARMOUTH v. FRANCE. (a.)

Negligence—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42)—Driver employed by wharfinger—Vicious horse—Risk incurred after notice—"Workman"—"Defect in condition of plant"—Volenti non fit injuria.

The plaintiff was employed as a driver by the defendant, who was a wharfinger. The foreman of the defendant's stables told the plaintiff to drive a horse which was so vicious as to be unfit to be driven by anybody. The plaintiff objected to driving the horse, but was ordered to do it notwithstanding. While driving in the performance of his duty, and guilty of no negligence in driving, he was injured by a kick from the horse.

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. (sitting as a Divisional Court), that the plaintiff was a "workman" within the definition in section 8 of the Employers' Liability Act.

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley, L.J. (Lopes, L.J., expressing no opinion), that the horse was "plant" used in the defendant's business, and that vice in the horse was a "defect in the condition of the plant" within the meaning of section 1.

Held, by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley, L.J. (Lopes, L.J., dissenting), that there was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant's foreman, and it was not conclusively shown that the risk was voluntarily incurred by the plaintiff.

Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685, distinguished.

Held, by Lopes, L.J., that there was no evidence for a jury to find for the plaintiff, as the facts showed that the plaintiff had elected to continue in the defendant's employment with full knowledge of the risk which he ran in so doing.

This was an appeal from a decision given in the City of London Court.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42). The plaintiff was employed by the defendant, a wharfinger and warehouseman, to take charge of a horse and trolley, it being part of his duty to load and unload the trolley for the delivery of goods to consignees, and to bring back the horse and trolley to the defendant's premises when his work was done. During this employment, in August, 1886, the defendant bought a new horse, which was placed under the plaintiff's control by the defendant's stable foreman. The horse proved to be a kicker and a jibber, and altogether unfit for driving. The plaintiff complained of it to the foreman and objected to driving it, but the foreman always replied that he must continue to drive and that if an accident occurred the defendant would be responsible. The plaintiff went on driving the horse for more than two months when, on November 12, while he was sitting in his proper place upon the trolley, the horse kicked out without any provocation and, striking the plaintiff on one of his legs, broke it. There was no evidence that the defendant himself knew of the horse being vicious as described.

The defendant, at the trial, maintained that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue under the Employers' Liability Act, as he was not a "workman" under the Act, nor was the horse "plant," nor the vice of the horse "defect in the condition of plant," and that the plaintiff voluntarily incurred the risk of accident, and was therefore not entitled to recover according to the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685. The plaintiff also must have contributed to the accident by his own negligence.

The judge held that the plaintiff was a "workman" and that the horse was "plant" within the Act, but he further held that the case came within the decision of Thomas v. Quartermaine, so that the plaintiff could not recover because he had continued to drive the horse after he was aware of its vicious nature, and therefore assented to incurring the risk attending the service. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

July 26.—W. E. Hume Williams, for the plaintiff.—The case does not come within Thomas v. Quartermaine, because in that case the plaintiff made no complaint, whereas in this case the plaintiff objected to the risk and only incurred it rather than lose his place. A master is bound to take all reasonable precautions to protect his workmen: Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macqu. 748, and when notice has been given him of defect in machinery he is liable for an accident due to the defect if the workman was not negligent: Clarke v. Holmes, 7 H. & N. 937. The plaintiff brought himself within sub-section 3 of section 2 by the notice which he gave to the foreman.

Wood Hill, for the defendant.—The plaintiff was not a workman within the Act, because he was a driver, and in

Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 577, 18 Q. B. D. 683, a driver was held not to be a workman within the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. The word "plant" is confined to inanimate objects such as fixtures and other chattels used in a business, and was never used before to describe a living creature. Even assuming the horse to be "plant," the plaintiff voluntarily continued in the dangerous employment, and cannot therefore recover: Thomas v. Quartermaine. The fact that he objected cannot do away with the fact that he continued when he might have given up his employment. In the words of Cockburn, C.J., in Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 25 W. R. 155, 2 Ex. D. 389, "if a man, for the sake of the employment, takes it or continues in it with a knowledge of its risks, he must trust to himself to keep clear of injury."

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant, who was a wharfinger, and for the purposes of his business the owner of carts or trolleys and horses. Amongst these was a horse which was of an extraordinarily vicious nature and wholly unfit, so far as is stated to us, to be driven even by the most careful driver. The plaintiff objected to drive him, and told the foreman of the stable that the horse was unsafe to drive, whereupon the foreman said: "You have to drive him, and if any accident happens we (meaning the employer) will be responsible." The plaintiff continued to drive the horse, and whilst so doing, sitting on a part of the trolley where it is said to be usual and not improper for the driver to sit, the horse kicked out and broke the plaintiff's leg. The plaintiff thereupon sued the owner of the horse, his employer. The judge of the City of London Court did that which I believe many county courts have done since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Quartermaine. The moment it was proved before him that the plaintiff knew the horse to be vicious, but continued to drive him, the judge said it was useless to inquire further, for that alone disentitled him to recover upon an application of what is called the maxim of Volenti non fit injuria. The judge acted upon the notion that that was the effect of the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Thomas v. Quartermaine, and, as I am given to understand, many county court judges have from the time that case was reported supposed that to be the effect of it. We are called upon now to say whether that is the true effect of the decision. My own position in the matter is extremely delicate, because I dissented from the decision of the rest of the court. I thought, and after mature consideration I have still the strongest conviction, that if that is really the effect of it the decision in that case was absolutely wrong; but I hope I have loyalty enough to say that if I thought that the decision of the majority of the judges there did mean what the county court judges have supposed it to mean, I should at once bow to it. The question we have now to consider is whether that was the real meaning of the majority—whether the judgment was not to a less rigid effect than that, and whether it does not leave open certain questions which must still be tried.

The first question here is whether this case is within the Employers' Liability Act at all. If it be not, then, according to the old law, if that Act had not existed, I have no doubt this plaintiff could not have recovered. He would have been a servant in the employment of the master, a part of whose machinery for carrying on his business was defective—in such a state that it would be a culpable want of care for the safety of his servants on the part of the employer to permit a necessary part of the machinery for carrying on his business to remain. But that was no concern of the jury. At all events, it was a thing which was patent, so that any person in the employ could know and see it. The horse here in question was not accidentally or suddenly vicious, but inherently vicious and known to be so. Under the old law it would have been said: "You" (the servant) "have entered into or continued in this employment where this thing of which you complain is open and palpable, and therefore it is an implied condition of your contract of service that you take upon yourself the risks of accidents therefrom, and consequently you have no remedy against your employer." As between master and servant that was the way the immunity from liability was always stated. The maxim Volenti non fit injuria was not wanted as between master and servant. It was only wanted, if at all, where no such relation as that of master and servant existed. That being so, then comes the question, what is to be the effect of the Employers' Liability Act? Does that Act apply to the present case?

Now the first question must be whether the plaintiff was a "workman" within the definition given in the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. I cannot entertain a doubt upon that. He is a man who drives a horse and trolley for a wharfinger. We must take into account what his ordinary duty was. He has to load and unload the trolley. That is manual labour. His duty may be compared to that of a lighterman who conducts a barge or lighter up and down the river. The driving the horse and trolley, and the navigating of the lighter, form the easiest part of the work; his real labour, that which tests his muscles and his sinews, is the loading and unloading of the trolley or the lighter.

Then comes the question which is somewhat more difficult, Can a horse be considered "plant" within section 1 of sub-section 1 of the Employers' Liability Act? It is suggested that nothing that is animate can be plant; that is, that living creatures can in no sense be considered plant. Why not? In many businesses, horses and carts, wagons, or drays, seem to me to form the most material part of the plant; they are the materials or instruments which the employer must use for the purpose of carrying on his business, and without which he could not carry it on at all. The principal part of the business of a wharfinger is conveying goods from the wharf to the houses or shops or warehouses of the consignees; and for this purpose he must use horses and carts or wagons. They are all necessary for the carrying on of the business. It cannot, for a moment, be contended that the carts and wagons are not "plant." Can it be said that the horses, without which the carts and wagons would be useless, are not? If, then, this horse was part of the plant, it had a defect, that is, it had the constant habit, whether in a stable or harnessed to a trolley, of kicking whatever was near it, whether a human being or a brick wall. In short, it was a vicious beast that could not be managed or controlled by the most careful driver. The plant, therefore, was defective. There was no evidence that the master (the defendant) knew of the defect. But the foreman who had the management of the stable, and under whose directions the horse was used, knew it; and after having repeatedly been told that it was unsafe, he said what practically amounted to this: "I care not whether the horse is vicious or not; you have got to drive him; and it matters nothing to you for, if you meet with an accident, the master will be responsible." The foreman, probably, had no power to bind his master to that; but it is, at all events, conclusive to show that he realised the fact that the plant was defective; and nothing was done to remedy the defect. Was this negligence on the part of the foreman for which the master was responsible? If the master had any duty at all to take care of his workmen, then allowing this imperfect plant to continue to be used was surely a breach of that duty. But it is said he may have had that duty, and may have neglected it as to those of his workmen who did not know of, or were not affected by, the particular defect, but not as to the plaintiff, who, knowing of the defect, still continued to drive the horse, and therefore comes within the maxim referred to. I confess that has always seemed to me to be not a bad way of illustrating the result; but it is, to my mind, a horrible way of stating the duty to say that a master owes no duty to a servant who knows that there is a defect in machinery, and, having pointed it out to one in authority, goes on using it. It seems cruel and unnatural, and, in my view, utterly abominable. It may be that the breach of this duty gives no right of action—that it is what is called a duty of imperfect obligation. Although the employer does not himself know of the defect, if he has put a person in his place to do what he ought himself to do, he is responsible for the negligence of that person.

Before the Employers' Liability Act there was this condition in the contract of hiring—that if there was a defect in the premises or machinery which was open and palpable, whether the servant actually knew it or not, he accepted the employment subject to the risk. That is the doctrine which is embodied in the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. I need hardly repeat that I detest the attempt to fetter the law by maxims. They are almost invariably misleading; they are for the most part so large and general in their language that they always include something which really is not intended to be included in them. I do not doubt that, if we put this maxim in plain English, part of it is true—that is to say, that if a thing is put before a workman and he is told, "Now, I do not ask you to do this unless you like; but I will give you more wages if you do. You see what it is. There is a rotten ladder—it is ten to one that it will break under you; but if you choose to run that risk I will give you higher wages." If the workman, seeing the risk, elects to incur it, no one could doubt that he would be precluded from recovering damages against his employer for any injury he might sustain from the breaking of the ladder. The same result would follow if the injured person was not a workman for hire. But does the maxim Volenti non fit injuria go this length—that the mere fact of the workman knowing that a thing is dangerous and yet using it is conclusive to show that he voluntarily incurs the risk? The answer to that depends (so far as this court is concerned) upon whether or not Thomas v. Quartermaine has so decided. I never entertained a doubt that the Employers' Liability Act does not prevent the proper application of the maxim Volenti non fit injuria; and I can only say, as an excuse for the part I took in Thomas v. Quartermaine, that that doctrine had never been mentioned on the argument of that case, but was for the first time suggested in the judgment of my brother Bowen. For myself I cannot help thinking that whether or not a workman has voluntarily agreed to incur the risk of defective machinery is a question of fact, and that, in my opinion, would have made the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine wrong, for the majority of the judges there took upon themselves to decide the question of fact, whereas, in my opinion, they had no right to decide it; the utmost they properly could do was to send it back to the county court. They held in that case that the facts were conclusive to show that the plaintiff did voluntarily—in the sense in which they understood the word—accept the risk. This revives the whole difficulty as to contributory negligence in cases of railway accidents (Davey v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 11 Q. B. D. 213). I have always protested that it is not for the judge to say whether or not a plaintiff (or the deceased in case of death) has been guilty of contributory negligence; he (the judge) has no right to hold that the evidence of it is conclusive; it should be left for the decision of the jury.

Now comes the other question, whether the Employers' Liability Act has done away with the old doctrine that a workman impliedly contracts or consents to incur a risk which is a visible and palpable one, and one which therefore he is to be taken to know of, or, if you please, which he does know of, or whether it applies only to the risks incident to common employment. For a time I was under the impression that the judgment in Thomas v. Quartermaine was that the Act only absolved the employer from liability for any injury resulting from the negligence of a fellow-workman. But upon looking at the matter more carefully I do not think they meant to say that. It was not necessary for them to say it, because they held that, inasmuch as the case was conclusively within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria, no other question arose in the case.

Now let us go back to the statute. We must look once more at section 1, sub-section 1, "where, after the commencement of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, the workman shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer nor engaged in his work." Here I say there was such defect and consequent personal injury. Read with this sub-sections 1 and 3 of section 2. Sub-section 1 provides that the workman shall not be entitled under this Act to any right of compensation or remedy against the employer under sub-section 1 of section 1, "unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in a proper condition," and sub-section 3 that "In any case where the workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself in the service of the employer, unless he was aware that the employer already knew of the said defect or negligence," the workman shall in like manner be disentitled to any right of compensation or remedy. Here the defect arose from the negligence of a person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the plant was in proper condition, and who had notice of the defect, and failed to take steps to avert injury.

To my mind it is clear that this was negligence with regard to the safety of his workmen for which the employer is responsible. But then it is said there may be that which prevents the workman from recovering compensation for an injury sustained by him in consequence of that negligence. The implied contract which I have adverted to under the old law did prevent it. Where there is no duty, it is said, there can be no negligence, or, in other words, there may be negligence which is not actionable negligence. It is very difficult to give a sensible construction to sub-section 3 of section 2. The workman who discovers the defect is to give notice of it, or he cannot recover. From that I infer that if he does give notice, and the defect is not remedied, he may recover. When is he to give notice? And what if the defect is not immediately remedied? Is the workman at once to refuse to incur the risk and quit the employ? That is a dilemma to which it never could have been intended to reduce the workman. I cannot help thinking that it is clearly enacted in the 3rd sub-section of section 2 that if the workman gives notice of the defect, and the employer fails to remedy it, the workman's claim for compensation is valid, unless he is brought clearly within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. Does the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine—for that is the judgment which is adopted by Fry, L.J.—mean to say that the mere knowledge of the workman and his continuing in the employ is fatal to him?

If I thought the judgment in Thomas v. Quartermaine really did mean that, whatever my own private opinion might be, I should unhesitatingly bow to it. I have been trying to construe that judgment fairly. At p. 697 of the report the learned judge, after referring to Lax v. Corporation of Darlington, 28 W. R. 221, 5 Ex. D. 78, and Winch v. Conservators of the Thames, 22 W. R. 879, L. R. 9 C. P. 378, says: "The defendant in such circumstances does not discharge his legal obligation by merely affecting the plaintiff with knowledge of a danger which but for a breach of duty on his own part would not exist at all. But where the danger is one incident to a perfectly lawful use of his own premises neither contrary to statute nor common law, where the danger is visible and the risk appreciated, and where the injured person, knowing and appreciating both risk and danger, voluntarily encounters them, there is, in the absence of further acts of omission or commisson, no evidence of negligence on the part of the occupier at all. Knowledge is not a conclusive defence in itself. But when it is a knowledge under circumstances that leave no inference open but one—viz., that the risk has been voluntarily encountered—the defence seems to me complete." I must confess I do not like that way of putting it. I think there is a duty, though I agree that there is no actionable breach of that duty if the person injured, knowing and appreciating the danger, voluntarily elects to encounter it. In the preceding page the learned judge says: "It is no doubt true that the knowledge on the part of the injured person which will prevent him from alleging negligence against the occupier must be a knowledge under such circumstances as lead necessarily to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred. The maxim be it observed is not 'Scienti non fit injuria' but 'Volenti.' There may be a perception of the existence of the danger without appreciation of the risk; as where the workman is of imperfect intelligence." So that a dull man may recover damages where a man of intelligence may not. Both knew of the danger, but one is imperfectly informed as to its nature and extent.

Taking the whole of that judgment together, it seems to me to amount to this, that mere knowledge of the danger will not do; there must be an assent on the part of the workman to accept the risk, with a full appreciation of its extent, to bring the workman within the maxim Volenti non fit injuria. If so, that is a question of fact. Here the judge of the court below has come to the conclusion that the moment it appeared that the plaintiff knew and appreciated the danger, and did not at once quit the defendant's employ, he came within the maxim, and was therefore, upon the authority of Thomas v. Quartermaine, disentitled to recover. He did not bring his mind to bear upon the motives which induced the plaintiff to act as he did, whether he relied upon the foreman's statement that the employer would be responsible in case of an accident, or whether he was influenced by the fear of being thrown out of employ if he disobeyed the foreman's orders. All that was for a jury, and the judge ought to have applied his mind to it. I see nothing in the decision in Thomas v. Quartermaine to prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this case, unless the circumstances were such as to warrant a jury in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff, freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, impliedly agreed to incur it. For these reasons I think this case ought to go down for a new trial.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The first question is whether the plaintiff is a "workman" within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act. In my opinion he is. His duty was not only to drive, but also to load and unload the goods which had to be transported on the trolley which it was his business to drive. This loading and unloading requires bodily labour and exertion, and brings the plaintiff within the statutory definition of a workman (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, s. 10).

The next question is whether the horse which injured the plaintiff is "plant" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act. There is no definition of plant in the Act, but in its ordinary sense it includes whatever apparatus is used by a business man for carrying on his business—not his stock-in-trade, which he buys or makes for sale, but all goods and chattels, fixed or movable, live or dead, which he keeps for permanent employment in his business (see Blake v. Shaw, 8 W. R. 410, Johns. 732). The word "defect" and the words "way and machinery," which occur in the section, throw some doubt on whether plant can include horses, but I do not think the doubt sufficient to require the court to hold that plant cannot include horses or to hold that plant must be confined to inanimate chattels. The defendant in this case has a number of horses for use in his business; they were part of his plant, not only in the ordinary sense of the word, but also, in my opinion, in the sense in which the word "plant" is used in section 1, sub-section 1, of the Employers' Liability Act.

The next question is whether vice in a horse can be a defect in the condition of plant. Here, again, I think it can. I take defect to include anything which renders the plant, &c., unfit for the use for which it is intended, when used in a reasonable way and with reasonable care, and if a horse intended for drawing trolleys is from any cause unfit for such work, and a person is driving him with reasonable care, and is injured by reason of the unfitness of the horse for his work, such person may be properly said to be injured by reason of a defect in plant.

Having cleared the ground thus far, it is necessary to consider whether the defect "arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in his service and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the plant was in proper condition" (see section 2, sub-section 1). The defect—i.e., the unfitness of the horse—did not arise from the negligence of the defendant, nor, in truth, of anyone, nor is there any evidence that the defendant himself knew of such defect. But his stable foreman did know of it, and he, nevertheless, took no steps to prevent the horse from being used for a purpose for which he knew it was unfit, for he told the plaintiff to go on driving it, and said if anything happened "we"—i.e., his master—"must take the consequence." This, I think, is evidence of negligence on the part of the stable foreman for which the defendant can properly be held accountable unless his liability is excluded upon the ground that the plaintiff not only knew of the defect, but also took the risk upon himself.

This is the point which presents the greatest difficulty in the case, and which requires careful consideration. It must be taken as settled by Thomas v. Quartermaine that the words at the end of section 1 do no more than "remove such fetters on a workman's right to sue as had been previously held to arise out of the relation of master and workman"; that section 2, sub-section 3, does not extend the master's liability beyond that imposed by section 1 and section 2, sub-section 1; that in each of the cases specified in section 1 the maxim Volenti non fit injuria is applicable, and that if a workman, knowing and appreciating the danger and the risk, elects voluntarily to encounter them, he can no more maintain an action founded upon the statute than he can in cases to which the statute has no application. Those principles are, in my opinion, perfectly sound; but the proper application of them is by no means always easy. The question whether in any particular a plaintiff was volens or nolens is a question of fact and not of law. Bowen, L.J., was careful to point out that the mere fact that the plaintiff knew of the danger and yet incurred it is not conclusive. He says: "The maxim, be it observed, is not Scienti non fit injuria, but Volenti non fit injuria. He further points out that there may be cases in which a non-workman who knew of a danger and incurred it might nevertheless maintain an action against the person exposing him to it. The question in each case must be, not simply whether the plaintiff knew of the risk, but whether the circumstances are such as necessarily to lead to the conclusion that the whole risk was voluntarily incurred by the plaintiff.

The learned judge who tried the present case thought he was bound by Thomas v. Quartermaine to decide it in favour of the defendant. In this respect I differ from him. The principles laid down in that case are no doubt to be accepted and followed, and, if I may say so, I entirely concur in them; but it is not, in my opinion, correct to regard that case as deciding this. The facts there and the facts here are materially different. In Thomas v. Quartermaine the facts were all one way; there was evidence that the plaintiff was volens and not merely sciens; he was not even directed to do what led to his injury; he did it voluntarily of his own accord; there was no evidence that the plaintiff was nolens; the plant was not defective or dangerous to persons engaged in the ordinary course of their employment; the plaintiff had never complained of it; the injury was the result of a pure accident, and the case might well have been decided on that ground alone. In the present case the horse was vicious, the plaintiff was constantly complaining of it to the defendant's foreman, the foreman told the plaintiff to go on driving it, and the plaintiff did so rather than run the risk of dismissal; nor is it possible to regard this case as one of accident. Under these circumstances, the question is whether the plaintiff, with knowledge and appreciation of both the risk and the danger, voluntarily took the risk upon himself. The plaintiff was not engaged to drive vicious horses, and the conversation with the foreman, though not evidence against the defendant of any promise by him to take the risk, is, in my opinion, admissible to explain the conduct of the plaintiff, and to rebut the inference that he voluntarily took the risk upon himself.

To hold that this case is concluded by Thomas v. Quartermaine is, I think, to carry that case further than is warranted by the principle on which it was decided; it is to do the very thing Bowen, L.J., so carefully pointed out the danger of doing—viz., to treat sciens as equivalent to volens. The Act cannot, I think, be properly construed in such a way as to protect masters who knowingly provide defective plant for their workmen, and who seek to throw the risk of using it on them by putting them in the unpleasant position of having to leave their situations or submit to use what is known to be unfit for use. Thomas v. Quartermaine is no authority for any such construction of the statute.

If in any case it can be shown as a fact that a workman agreed to incur a particular danger, or voluntarily exposed himself to it, and was thereby injured, he cannot hold his master liable. But in the cases mentioned in the Act, a workman who never, in fact, engaged to incur a particular danger, but who finds himself exposed to it, and complains of it, cannot, in my opinion, be held, as a matter of law, to have impliedly agreed to incur that danger, or to have voluntarily incurred it because he does not refuse to face it, nor can it, in my opinion, be held that there is no case to submit to a jury on the question whether he has agreed to incur it or has voluntarily incurred it or not, simply because, though he protested, he went on as before. The facts of each particular case must be ascertained and considered. If nothing more is proved than that the workman saw danger, reported it, but on being told to go on, went on as before in order to avoid dismissal, a jury may, in my opinion, properly find that he had not agreed to take the risk, and had not acted voluntarily in the sense of having taken the risk upon himself. Fear of dismissal rather than voluntary action might properly be inferred. A fortiori, might the jury properly come to such a conclusion if it was proved that the workman was told by his superintendent not to mind, and that if any accident happened the employer must make it good? Such an additional circumstance would go far to negative the inference that the complaining workman took the risk upon himself.

I cannot construe the Act as shutting out such considerations as these, and as the learned judge did not think himself at liberty to entertain them, and decided in favour of the defendant upon what I consider a misconception of Thomas v. Quartermaine, I think there ought to be a new trial.

Lopes, L.J.—This is an important and difficult case, and I regret that I am unable to agree with the decision of the rest of the court.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, but the judge of the court below has not decided the case on any question arising under that Act apart from the law as it existed before the passing of that Act, but has given judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff knew all the facts, was well acquainted with the character of the horse, and voluntarily encountered the risk, and that therefore there was no evidence of negligence arising from any breach of duty which the defendant owed the plaintiff entitling the plaintiff to recover.

It is to be observed that section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act—which must be read together—effect no change in the law as regards the liability of the employer, except in certain specified cases, by identifying a "person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant are in proper condition" with the employer, and taking him out of the category of fellow servants and rendering the employer responsible for his negligence. There is nothing here to affect the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria if it applies; nor is that doctrine touched by anything in section 1, sub-section 3; but of that presently. The doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria is exhaustively dealt with in the cases of Woodley v. Metropolitan Railway Co. and Thomas v. Quartermaine. Both these cases were in the Court of Appeal, and the judgments of the majority of the court are not only binding on us sitting as a divisional court, but are binding on the Court of Appeal itself. The question, therefore, is whether the present case is governed by these cases, or either of them?

To determine this it is essential to state shortly the facts of the present case. The plaintiff was the driver of a trolley, and at the time of the accident had been about four years in the employ of the defendant, who was a wharfinger. This accident happened in November, 1886. In the previous August a horse had been purchased by the defendant, which was, by Tomlin, the defendant's stable foreman, assigned to the plaintiff to drive in his trolley. The plaintiff's duty was to clean, take care of, and drive the horse in his trolley, and to go with his trolley where ordered by Tomlin, who had the superintendence of the horses, and to load and unload as instructed. From the first the horse was vicious and troublesome—so vicious and troublesome that it was said to have broken down a brick wall, and generally to be a kicker and a jibber. The plaintiff had constantly complained of this horse to Tomlin, and had been told by him to go on driving the horse, and that his employer would be responsible for anything the horse did. The plaintiff, though daily, as he said, complaining, continued in the defendant's service driving the horse. On the 12th of November the plaintiff was driving the horse sitting on the trolley with his legs hanging down behind the horse. There was no other place on the trolley provided for him where he could sit to drive. The horse kicked violently, broke the plaintiff's leg and injured him severely, In these circumstances he brings his action against the defendant. The case came on to be tried in the City of London Court without a jury, and the judge, considering it undistinguishable from Thomas v. Qartermaine, and that the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria applied, stopped the case and gave judgment for the defendant.

Is this a case where the employer is absolved from liability because the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to the risk within the principle contained in the cases to which I have referred? In Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., the plaintiff was a workman, not in the employment of the defendants, but in that of a contractor employed by them. He had to work in a dark tunnel, rendered dangerous by trains constantly passing. After he had been working for a fortnight he was injured by a passing train. The jury found that the defendants were negligent, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £300. A rule to set aside this verdict was discharged, and on appeal it was held by the majority of the Court of Appeal that the plaintiff, having continued in his employment with full knowledge, could not make the defendants liable for an injury to which he voluntarily exposed himself.

The only distinctions that I can find between that case and the present are the following:—Woodley was hired to do dangerous work, and knew its dangerous character and attendant risks. Yarmouth was hired to do work not dangerous—viz., amongst other work, to drive horses, which most frequently are manageable. The horse which did the mischief was intrusted to his care after he entered on the employment, and it was then first he learned its propensities, but long after he had been made aware of its vicious nature he continued to drive it. There was no evidence that Woodley ever made any complaint to his employer. Yarmouth, on the contrary, complained, but continued in the employment. Having regard to the judgments of the majority of the court, I do not think that what I have suggested furnishes any substantial ground for distinction. Cockburn, C.J., says:—"With a full knowledge of the danger, he (Woodley) continued in the employment, and had been working in the tunnel for a fortnight when the accident happened. If he becomes aware of the danger which has been concealed from him, and which he had not the means of becoming acquainted with before he entered on the employment, or of the want of the necessary means to prevent mischief, his proper course is to quit the employment. If he continues in it, he is in the same position as though he had accepted it with a full knowledge of its danger in the first instance, and must be taken to waive his right to call upon the employer to do what is necessary for his protection, or, in the alternative, to quit the service. If he continues to take the benefit of the employment, he must take it subject to its disadvantages. If a man chooses to accept the employment, or to continue in it with a knowledge of the danger, he must abide the consequences, so far as any claim to compensation against the employer is concerned. Morally speaking, those who employ men on dangerous work, without doing all in their power to obviate the danger, are highly reprehensible, as I certainly think the company were in the present instance. The workman who depends on his employment for the bread of himself and his family is thus tempted to incur risks to which, as a matter of humanity, he ought not to be exposed. But, looking at the matter in a legal point of view, if a man, for the sake of the employment, takes it or continues in it with a knowledge of its risks, he must trust to himself to keep clear of injury." This judgment, in which the majority of the court concurred, covers the present case, and, subject to the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act, disposes of the only distinction which I am able to suggest.

The point that Yarmouth was not engaged to drive a dangerous horse is met by the fact that he continued in the service after he knew the horse was dangerous, and his constant complaints may be regarded as evidence of his thorough appreciation of the risk he was incurring, and of his willingness to incur that risk rather than relinquish his employment. After complaining, he remains in the service for a long time, knowing the risk, and knowing that no steps had been taken to prevent its continuance. This is more consistent with his acquiescence in a disregard of his complaints, and with a willingness to incur the risk, than with the contrary view.

In Griffiths v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., 32 W. R. 831, 12 Q. B. D. 493, on appeal 13 Q. B. D. 259, 32 W. R. Dig. 129, it was held that in an action brought by a servant against his master for personal injury resulting from the unsafe state of the premises upon which the servant was employed, the statement of claim must allege, not only that the master knew, but that the servant was ignorant of the danger. The present Master of the Rolls said:—"If the danger is one which was known to the master and not to the servant, the knowledge of the master and the want of knowledge of the servant make together a cause of action, and as it is necessary that these two things should exist in order to form a primâ facie cause of action, it is necessary that they should be shown to exist in the statement of claim" (13 Q. B. D., at p. 260). And Bowen, L.J., at p. 261 in the same case, says, "Both these allegations are material, because without them there is no cause of action."

It is, therefore, abundantly clear that as the danger was known to the servant (the plaintiff) he could not recover before the Employers' Liability Act.

It is said, however, that Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., Griffiths v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., and other cases do not govern the case before the court. It is said that the law has been altered in cases to which the Employers' Liability Act applies; and I assume for the purposes of this case that the Employers' Liability Act applies to the case of this plaintiff. It is suggested that there is something in the Employers' Liability Act which qualifies the defence of Volenti non fit injuria—a defence which would have been available for the master before the Act. It is said that a workman who can bring himself within one of the five clauses of section 1 of the Act is not to be treated as volens, although he thoroughly appreciated the risk he was incurring, complained of it, and for a long time continued in the service preferring the risk to quitting the service, and this although he would have been treated as volens before the Act.

I cannot accede to this view. It is opposed to the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine. The third sub-section of section 2 is relied upon. Bowen, L.J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine deals with that clause. He says, "The object of that clause is to limit the employer's liability, not to enlarge it." I read it thus:—Although under section 1 the workman, with certain exceptions, is to be placed in a position as advantageous as, but not better than, the rest of the world who use the master's premises in his business, the workman is not to have this advantage if, knowing of any defect or negligence, he does not inform the employer, as provided in that section. The object of this is to give the employer the opportunity of remedying the mischief. In fact, the workman is not to have the advantages of the Act unless he performs the condition precedent of making the master aware of his cause of complaint. This leaves the employer's defence of Volenti non fit injuria untouched by the Act if he can prove it. It is said that such a construction would make the Act nearly a dead letter. But this is not the case. In all cases where the workman is ignorant of the defect or negligence, and is injured by a fellow workman's negligence, "common employment" is no longer a defence for the master in the cases specified in section 1, as it would have been before the passing of the Act.

It is said that the object of the Act was to exclude in the specified cases the two legal inferences which were before the Act to be drawn against the workman from the mere fact of his employment—viz., first, the inference that he accepted the risk of his fellow servants' negligence; and, secondly, the inference that he accepted the risks which were involved in the execution of his employer's orders, if he in fact ran them, rather than refuse to do so, and thereby incur the risk of dismissal. I agree that it was the object of the Act to exclude the first inference, and in the specified cases to destroy the defence of "common employment." But what authority there is for the contention that it was intended to extinguish the second inference I fail to be able to discover.

The true construction of the 3rd sub-section of section 2, in my opinion, is that, whereas, before the Act, knowledge would have disentitled the workman to recover, now knowledge in the specified cases is no longer to create a disability, provided the workman gives information; but if, after giving information, he continues in the employment, knowing the danger he is incurring, the same inference arises as heretofore—viz., the inference that he voluntarily runs the risk—and any evidence of negligence arising from any breach of duty on the part of the employer is by the workman's conduct displaced.

I agree with the decision of the majority of the court in Thomas v. Quartermaine, and with the construction they place on the Employers' Liability Act. That Act only removes such obstacles to a workman's right to sue as had been held to arise from the relation of master and servant. It leaves the doctrine of Volenti non fit injuria untouched. Now, as before the Act, to use the words of Bowen, L.J. (18 Q. B. D., at p. 699), "one man cannot sue another in respect of a danger or risk not unlawful in itself, that was visible, apparent, and voluntarily encountered by the person." The present case seems a stronger case of voluntary exposure to danger than that of Thomas v. Quartermaine. In the latter case there is little, if any, evidence that Thomas knew of or appreciated the danger; but in the present case the evidence is strong to show that Yarmouth thoroughly understood the danger to which he was exposing himself. With a knowledge of the danger, though complaining, he continues in the service, indicating thereby a willingness to incur the risk rather than give up his employment.

In my opinion the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine decides that every defence (except, in specified cases, the defence of "common employment") is still open to the employer; thus leaving the law, except in the case of "common employment" in the specified instances, as it was laid down in Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co. It was for the plaintiff here to make out that the defendant was negligent towards the plaintiff in conducting himself as admittedly he did. I can see no evidence of any negligence arising from any breach of duty which the defendant owed the plaintiff.

The plaintiff deposed that when he complained Tomlin told him to go on driving the horse, and that his employer would be responsible. There is no evidence that Tomlin was authorized by the defendant to make this statement. The judge below disregarded this evidence, and I think rightly; it was not admissible as evidence against the master (the defendant); I am unable to see any substantial difference between the present case and the cases to which I have referred, and I think the judge was right in giving judgment for the defendant.

I am also of opinion that the judge was right in holding that the plaintiff was a person to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applied, and, therefore, in that respect entitled to sue under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The case of Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co. is an authority for this. Holding as I do it is unnecessary to decide whether a horse is "plant" within section 1, sub-section 1, for, assuming it in the plaintiff's favour, in my opinion he cannot recover. I wish to be understood as not expressing any opinion on this. The appeal will therefore be allowed.

Probate—Practice—Two wills—English will disposing of English estate—Belgian will disposing of Belgian estate—Probate of both wills to English executor—Law of Belgium.

An English testator died in Belgium, having there made a will in English form disposing of his English estate, and a will in Belgian form disposing of his property in Belgium. The executor appointed by the Belgian will having renounced and consented to the present application, the court on motion granted probate of the two wills, as together constituting the last will of the deceased, to the English executor.

Motion for probate of two wills of the testator, the Rev. W. W. Bolton, as together constituting the last will of the deceased.

The deceased was an Englishman by birth. He had resided for many years as English Chaplain at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and for fifteen years prior to his death, which took place on the 6th of May, 1887, at Bruges, in the kingdom of Belgium. He had frequently expressed his intention of returning to England.

At the time of his death he was possessed of a house at Bruges and shares in a banking company there. He was also entitled to money lent in Canada and on mortgage in England, and to a fund in the High Court of Justice in England.

On the 9th of September, 1885, he duly executed at Bruges a will prepared in England bequeathing all his personal property in England and Canada to his sister and three nieces, and he appointed Mr. Freeman, his solicitor in London, sole executor.

At the time of the execution of this will he informed Mr. Freeman that he intended to make a will in Belgian form disposing of his Belgian property. By the Belgian law a Belgian will must be dictated to a notary in the presence of witnesses.

On the 29th of September, 1886, the testator executed a will at Bruges in accordance with Belgian law. It commenced with a statement by the notary that it was dictated in the presence of four witnesses, and that the testator had requested the notary to prepare and witness the execution of his will in reference to his property situate in Belgium, and after the gift of various legacies, all payable out of property situate in Belgium, the residue was bequeathed, as in the prior will, to his sister and three nieces, and the testator appointed a solicitor in Bruges, M. Verstraete, his testamentary executor. The body of the will contained these words: "I revoke all wills and other testamentary dispositions which I have made previous to this day."

(a.) Reported by J. Gerard Laing, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Searle asked for probate of both wills to the executor of the English will, and stated that the Belgian executor consented and was ready to file a renunciation. The clause revoking all prior wills is governed and made subject to the prior statement that the second will related to the testator's property in Belgium. That statement is a part of the will.

Hannen, P., granted probate to the executor of the English will subject to an affidavit being filed that by the law of Belgium the recital in the Belgian will that it referred to the testator's Belgian property formed part of the will, and that the Belgian executor renounced and consented to the grant asked for.

Motion allowed.

In re Trinity Church, Stroud Green.

Ecclesiastical law—Side chapel—Communion table.

Although the rubric and the 82nd canon contemplate only one Communion table in a church, they do not expressly prohibit a second, and a faculty should be granted for the introduction of a second table where, on the ground of convenience and economy, it is desirable to introduce one in a side chapel as subsidiary to the performance of the service of the church as prescribed by law.

Application for a faculty for the construction of a side chapel at the east end of the south aisle of Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green, and for the introduction of a Communion table into the chapel.

The rubric in the Book of Common Prayer and the 82nd canon, provide that there shall be one Communion table in a church, and the question was whether a second was forbidden.

The application was based upon the ground of convenience and economy. Dr. Linklater, the vicar, deposed that the church would accommodate 1,200 persons, and that at the early services perhaps not more than half a dozen would be present, and would be scattered over the church, which had, in winter, to be warmed and lighted throughout. It would be convenient if the small congregation could be brought together in the proposed side chapel, and by warming and lighting the chapel only a saving of £50 a year would be effected. The vestry approved of the application.

The application was heard by the Chancellor of the Diocese of London.

Beaufort, for the petitioners, referred to Hudson v. Tooth, 25 W. R. Dig. 107, 2 P. D. 125, and 1 Cardwell's Doc. Annals, pp. 94—101, and instanced the frequent cases of side chapels with communion tables in cathedral and parish churches.

Dr. Tristram, Q.C.—The application in this case is for a faculty to authorize the erection of a screen between the chancel and the east end of the south aisle of the church, and across the aisle, and the fitting up of the space inclosed by the screen as a chapel to be used for early daily prayer, and for the administration of early Holy Communion on week days and on Sunday mornings, when the congregation is a small one. For the latter purpose the court is asked to sanction the introduction of a Communion table into the chapel, there being, of course, one already in the chancel.

The application is based on convenience and the saving of expense. When the congregation is small, it is manifestly more convenient, both for the congregation and the officiating minister, that the former should be assembled within the limited space of the chapel, instead of being scattered over a large church; and, according to the evidence, the difference of the cost in lighting and heating the chapel in the present case, instead of the church for such services, is about £50 per annum in favour of the chapel.

On these facts the court would have no hesitation in granting the faculty, provided it may by law do so. The legal question for consideration is whether it is competent to the court, having regard to the wording of the rubric and the 82nd canon, ordering that there shall be one Communion table in a church, to authorise the introduction of a second within a parish church.

In the pre-Reformation period it was not unusual to have two or more altars in parish churches. These were removed under the injunctions as tending to superstition, and in their place was substituted one Communion table of wood. It is clear that the rubric and the 82nd canon contemplate there being only one holy table in a church, and if this had been an application to introduce one into the aisle simply, and not into what is to be practically a chapel, I am not prepared to say that the court would have been justified in granting it. But this question does not arise in the present case. I am aware that there are in the side chapels of many of our cathedrals holy tables, as there is here in St. Paul's, and my attention has also been directed to the fact that several of our bishops have consecrated churches with Communion tables in side chapels.

But these cases cannot be considered as having the force of legal precedents in this court; for, cathedrals not being within the jurisdiction of the Bishop's Court, alterations are made in them and ornaments introduced into them without the sanction of any judicial decision or a judicial order. In Westerton v. Liddell, Moore's Special Report, 21, 22, it was held that the fact of an ornament having been in a church at the time of its consecration did not necessarily legalize it or preclude its subsequent removal by faculty if the court were satisfied of its illegality.

The attention of the court has also been directed to the fact that faculties have issued in other dioceses for the introduction of holy tables in side chapels in parish churches.

But these, with the exception of one, which came before me, sitting as Chancellor of Ripon in January last, have not been the subject of a decision after a hearing in open court. The Ripon case was an application by the vicar and churchwardens of the parish church of Leeds for the introduction in a side chapel of a holy table for use and convenience, and having had an opportunity of then fully considering the question, I decreed the faculty to issue, and I adhere to that decision.

There is principle laid down by the Judicial Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council in Westerton v. Liddell, Moore's Rep., 187, which may safely guide the court in this case, and that is, that an ornament, though not prescribed by the rubrics or canons, may be introduced for use in a church if subsidiary to the performance of the service of the church as prescribed by law. On the ground a credence table was permitted to remain in a church. In the rubrics or canon there is no mention of provision made for side chapels in parish churches. But there is no provision against them, and I think their introduction with a holy table in the chapel may, in change of circumstances owing to the demand in recent years for early morning services and for the celebration of early Holy Communion, be sanctioned by this court on the ground of convenience and saving of expense, and to meet the requirements of the times.

The court, therefore, decrees the faculty as prayed.

BROWNE v. LA TRINIDAD. (a.)

Company—Directors—Irregularity in the summoning board meeting—Effect of such irregularity on subsequent general meeting—Agreement prior to formation of company—Incorporation of such agreement in the articles—Agreement not thereby enforceable against company.

Mere irregularity in summoning directors to a board meeting—such as the mere non-issue of a notice to a particular director, or not giving him sufficient notice—though it may entitle that director to object and require another board meeting to be held, is not such an irregularity as to render the meeting, when held—of persons who are in fact directors and intend to act as a board—incompetent to authorize the calling of a special general meeting of shareholders, and cannot deprive the general meeting called in consequence—when, in all other respects, regularly summoned—from exercising the powers which are given it by the articles.

Harben v. Phillips, 31 W. R. 173, 23 Ch. D. 14, explained.

Before the incorporation of a company, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and a trustee for the intended company, stipulating (inter alia) that the plaintiff should be a director and should not be removable till after 1888. This agreement was set out and adopted in the articles of association, but there was no other evidence of any contract being entered into between the plaintiff and the company adopting the agreement. After the formation of the company the plaintiff was appointed a director, and shares were allotted to him.

In October, 1887, at a special general meeting, a resolution was passed that the plaintiff should be removed from the directorate. The plaintiff brought an action to restrain the company and the other directors from acting on or confirming this resolution.

Held, that the agreement as to the non-removal of the plaintiff from the directorate was not an agreement entered into with the company, and that, though the agreement was embodied in the articles, it did not thereby —in the absence of any other evidence to show that the company had entered into the agreement—become a contract between the plaintiff and the company, and therefore that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction sought.

Decision of Charles, J., reversed.

Appeal from Charles, J., sitting as Vacation Judge.

On November 28, 1884, the defendant company was registered. The memorandum of association stated that one of the objects of the company was to adopt and carry into effect an agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, for the sale by the plaintiff to a trustee for the intended company of a mining property in Mexico. This agreement contained a stipulation (clause (5)) that "upon assurance of the property, or earlier if the company shall require, the vendor shall become a director of the company and shall not be removed or bound to retire by rotation till 1888." The articles of association of the company provided (inter alia) (6) "The directors shall adopt on behalf of the company and carry into effect the agreement referred to in the memorandum of association dated the 24th of November, 1884, a copy whereof is set forth in the schedule hereto, with or without modification as they may think fit. Subject to such modification, if any, the said agreement is hereby confirmed, and the provisions thereof so far as are applicable to the company and remain to be performed are incorporated with and shall be construed a part of these presents." Clause (9) provided that any director who should become bankrupt, or insolvent, or lunatic, or should cease to attend the meetings of the board for three months without permission "shall thereupon be disqualified from being, and cease to be a director, and the vacancy thereby occasioned shall be filled up in manner hereinbefore provided.' Clause (91) provided that "The company may by special resolution, save as aforesaid, remove any director before the expiration of his period of office, and if they think fit appoint a qualified shareholder in his stead, and the director so appointed shall in all respects stand in the place of his predecessor."

By resolutions passed after the registration of the company the plaintiff was appointed a director of, and was allotted shares in, the company, but there was no evidence of any resolution passed at any general meeting of the company adopting the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884. Subsequently disputes arose between the plaintiff and the other directors, and on the 28th of September, 1887, at a meeting of directors, composed of a quorum of two—the plaintiff not being present—a resolution was passed that notice should be issued for an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders to be held on the 12th of October, at which a resolution would be proposed (1) that in accordance with clause (91) of the articles of association the plaintiff should be removed from the directorate of the company; and (2) that the capital of the company should be increased.

The secretary accordingly, on the 1st of October, issued notices convening the extraordinary general meeting for the 12th of October, and the notices so issued were stated to be issued in pursuance of the order of the directors given at the board meeting of the 28th of September, and also stated the purposes for which the general meeting for the 12th of October was convened.

The plaintiff, on the 8th of October, issued the writ in this action, by which he sought an injunction against the company and the other directors to restrain them from holding the meeting of the 12th of October, or preventing the plaintiff acting as a director; and to have a declaration that the company had no power to remove him from the directorate till after the year 1888, and that the extraordinary general meeting for the 12th of October had not been duly convened.

The plaintiff alleged that the meeting of the board of directors held on the 28th of September was not a duly constituted board meeting, on the ground that he had not received due notice of it.

The evidence showed that the plaintiff received at his office a written notice that the meeting of the 28th of September was to be held at 3.30 p.m. at the offices of the company. The plaintiff alleged he only received this notice at 3.28 p.m. the same day, the defendants alleged he received it at 3.20 p.m. The plaintiff's office was within five minutes walk of the offices of the company.

The articles of association contained no regulation as to the mode of summoning board meetings, and it appeared from the evidence that it had been customary to call board meetings at very short notice. The previous board meetings had, however, been held in the plaintiff's office. The plaintiff did not attend the meeting of the board of the 28th of September, nor did he make any objection at the time, or until he issued his writ on the 8th of October, to the shortness of the notice given him.

The plaintiff served notice of motion for an injunction, together with the writ, on the 8th of October, but the motion was not heard till the 19th of October, and meanwhile, on the 12th of October, the extraordinary general meeting was held, at which both resolutions were passed unanimously.

Charles, J., on the hearing of the motion, granted an injunction to restrain the company holding any meeting to confirm the first resolution passed at the meeting held on the 12th of October, and to restrain the other directors preventing the plaintiff acting as a director, on the ground that the plaintiff had not received proper notice of the meeting of the board of the 28th of September, and that that initial irregularity vitiated all the subsequent proceedings.

The defendants appealed.

Higgins, Q.C., Latham, Q.C., and P. F. Stokes, for the appellants.—The plaintiff admits that he was served with a written notice of the intended board meeting of the 28th of September a few minutes before the meeting was held. He made no objection then to the shortness of the notice, and though he states in his evidence it was impossible for him to attend that meeting, he gives no reason why he could not do so. His office was so close by the offices of the company, at which the meeting was held, that he had sufficient time to attend the meeting if he had chosen to do so. The evidence shows that it was customary to convene meetings of the directors casually and on very short notice. The objection, therefore, as to the informality of the notice is a mere technical one. Then, as to the power of the company to remove a director before the expiration of his period of office, article 91 of the articles of association gives the company that power. It may be said that the words "save as aforesaid" in article 91 relate back to article 6, which confirmed the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, which contained a stipulation that the plaintiff, when made a director, should not be removed till after 1888; but that agreement was not made with the company, because it did not then exist, and the articles only amount to a contract enforceable between the shareholders inter se: Eley v. Positive Life Assurance Co., 24 W. R. 252, 338, 1 Ex. D. 88. There is no evidence of any resolution passed at any general meeting of the shareholders adopting the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884.

Marten, Q.C., and D. L. Alexander, for the plaintiff, the respondent.—The notice of the general meeting of the shareholders issued by the secretary on the 1st of October states that it is issued by order of the board, given on the 28th of September; but that meeting of the board was irregular, as the plaintiff, who was a director, and entitled to be present at it, had no proper notice of the meeting given him. That notice was, further, an intimation to the shareholders that by order of the board the plaintiff ought to be removed from being a director. [COTTON, L.J.—Suppose directors, intending to act as a board, but at no formal meeting of the board, direct the secretary to issue notices for a general meeting of shareholders, would the informality in the constitution of the board deprive the general meeting of powers which it otherwise would have had?] Yes; Harben v. Phillips, 31 W. R. 173, 23 Ch. D. 14, is an authority to that effect. Again, the general meeting of shareholders had no power to remove the plaintiff from the directorate. The only power of removing directors is that contained in article 91, and the words "save as aforesaid" in that article have no meaning unless they refer to article 6, which incorporates the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, which stipulated that the plaintiff should not be removed from the directorate till after 1888. Power to remove the plaintiff from the directorate is therefore excepted out of the general power to remove directors given by article 91.

Higgins, Q.C., in reply, referred to Collie's claim, 19 W. R. 1022, L. R. 12 Eq. 246; In re Empress Engineering Co., 29 W. R. 342, 16 Ch. D. 125; In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38.

COTTON, L.J. [having briefly stated the nature of the action, continued:—] The case raises points of considerable importance. The meeting of shareholders was summoned, not only to determine whether the plaintiff should be removed from the position of director, but also to decide as to the authorization of an increase of capital. Only one point was decided by Charles, J. It was this, he thought there was an initial irregularity which prevented the meeting of the shareholders from being so called as to be capable to act, and he came to this conclusion because, as he considered, the plaintiff substantially had not been summoned to the board meeting which gave directions for the issuing of the notices summoning the meeting of shareholders. Was he right in that? [The Lord Justice here stated the facts with reference to the notice of the board meeting of September 28 given to the plaintiff, and continued:—] This notice was left a few minutes before the time fixed for the meeting, he received it before the meeting, and five minutes would have taken him to the place where the meeting was to be held. He did not go, nor until the commencement of this action, on the 8th of October—the meeting being summoned for the 12th—did he make any objection to the calling of the board meeting at such short notice. That is very material, because if he had at once given the other directors notice and said, "I object to the calling of the board on such short notice to consider this question," that might have altered the case. The other directors might then have called a fresh meeting of the directors and considered the question, and allowed him to state the objections he had to these resolutions being put before the special general meeting. There was time to do this, as only a seven days' notice of a general meeting was requisite. In my opinion, under the existing circumstances, it cannot be said that the board was not so summoned as to be able to act as a board. It is a very different question whether the other directors were quite right in acting as they did in giving such short notice. It was suggested by Mr. Marten in argument that it was done unfairly, in order to exclude the plaintiff, and prevent him from urging any reasons which he had against his being removed from the board of directors and against the increase of capital. There is nothing in the affidavits as to that, and it is not right that we should act upon a suggestion which is raised in that way, when the plaintiff does not swear to it, and when, so far as I see, there is nothing in the facts which can be relied on as supporting a suggestion of that sort. If the plaintiff had at once complained of the shortness of the notice of the board meeting before the board had summoned the general special meeting of the shareholders, it would have been a question whether the court ought not to have restrained the directors from calling the meeting without giving an opportunity to the plaintiff, as one of the then directors, to lay before the board his views in reference to the questions to be brought before the special general meeting. But the only question which we have now to consider is whether, even if there was such an informality that the court might have interfered before the board had summoned the special general meeting, that meeting can be said to have been called without authority, and to have been incompetent to act, though the resolution of the board had been passed at a meeting of the directors, of which everybody except the plaintiff had sufficient notice, and he did not raise any objection as to the shortness of the time, nor does he now show that he could not have gone to the board meeting before the other directors had passed the resolutions.

In my opinion, if there was an irregularity at the board meeting, it was not such an irregularity as to vitiate the action of the board, and even if there had been an irregularity in the constitution of the board, it would not have deprived the general body of shareholders of the power of acting, when the notice was issued by the directors as such, and was signed in the usual way by the secretary as required in the articles on behalf of the directors. I think Charles, J., failed to give due consideration to the principle that a court of equity refuses to interfere where an irregularity has been committed, if it is within the power of the persons who have committed it at once to correct it by calling a fresh meeting, and dealing with the matter with all due formalities. But, in my opinion, there was a sufficient notice sent to the plaintiff to prevent him from contending now that the meeting of the board was a meeting of persons who were not competent to act as a board of directors. There was, therefore, nothing to make the issue of the notice irregular, and even if there was an irregularity in the board meeting which might have enabled the plaintiff to insist that it should be postponed and another board meeting called, that would not vitiate the special general meeting so as to prevent its exercising the powers which are given to it by the articles.

It was contended that in Harben v. Phillips it had been laid down that where there is an irregularity in the constitution of the board it cannot effectually call a general meeting. But I think that that case is not quite understood. The words "irregularity in the constitution of the board" did not mean some irregularity in summoning persons who were in fact directors, such an irregularity as the mere non-issue of a notice to a particular director, or not giving him sufficient notice. There the case was that the supposed board was a meeting of persons, two of whom were not directors at all, and the persons who met had excluded those who the court thought ought to have been admitted in the place of the two persons whom I have mentioned. That clearly is a very different case. There had been a meeting where some who were not legally directors were present, and some who were legally directors were excluded, and we decided that it was not a meeting which could discharge the duties of a board.

We now come to what may be called the substance of the case, and unfortunately, from the course the case took before Charles, J., we have not the benefit of his opinion upon it. The question is this, had the general meeting (assuming it to have been regularly called by the notice, as I hold it was) power to remove the plaintiff from being a director? That turns primarily on the 91st of the articles. [The Lord Justice read the clause, and continued:—]

A resolution for removing the plaintiff was passed, which is to be brought for confirmation before the meeting to-morrow, if that meeting can be held. But for the words "save as aforesaid," in clause 91, and the agreement referred to in the 6th clause of the articles, there would be no doubt that the company can, by a special resolution, remove any director. But those words, "save as aforesaid," undoubtedly cause a difficulty. [The Lord Justice then referred to the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, and continued:—] That, of course, was a contract in no way binding the company, having been entered into before the company was formed. But the 6th article says:—[The Lord Justice here read article 6, and continued:—] It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that "save as aforesaid" in article 91 refers to article 6, and refers, therefore, to the 5th clause in the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, and that the proper meaning of article 91 is that, subject to the provisions in favour of the plaintiff contained in the agreement of November, 1884, the general special meeting may, by special resolution, remove any director. Is that the proper meaning to give to it? "Save as aforesaid" does not fit in very well, because this stipulation in favour of the plaintiff is nowhere recited in the articles, and it would be very strong, as a mere matter of construction, even if there was nothing else to which the words "save as aforesaid" could be referred, to say that they meant subject to the provisions of the agreement of the 24th of November, 1884. To my mind, any draftsman of ordinary skill drawing such an article as this would, if that had been the intention, have said "subject to the provisions of the agreement of the 24th of November." I think, however, that the words "save as foresaid" in article 91 are explained by reference to article 89, which, in certain events, requires the removal of directors from office. The difficulty of referring the words "save as aforesaid" to that clause is, that when a director comes under clause 89 he ipso facto ceases to be a director, and it is not necessary there should be any resolution to remove him. This prevents the words "save as aforesaid" from accurately fitting that previous provision, but to my mind there is very much less difficulty in supposing that "save as aforesaid" was intended to refer to clause 89 than in throwing it back to article 6 and to something which is not recited, but is only referred to in that clause. I think that the draftsman when he introduced a clause enabling the company by special resolution to remove a director was afraid that some question would be raised unless he put in something to show that it would not be necessary to have a special resolution in the events referred to in article 89, and so through over-caution introduced the words "save as aforesaid." In my opinion, therefore, the "save as aforesaid" does not limit the power of removing a director which is given to the company to be exercised at the general meetings, and does not help the case of the plaintiff.

But there is another point which we ought, I think, to consider. Assuming that an unlimited power is given to the meeting by article 91, ought we, having regard to the contract entered into by the memorandum of the 24th of November, 1884, and article 6, to interfere by injunction to restrain the company in general meeting from acting under that power? I do not give any opinion upon the question how far the court would have interfered by injunction in order specifically to enforce an agreement between the company and the plaintiff that he should be an irremovable director. That point raises questions upon which I should not like to give any opinion without having them fully discussed. In my opinion we ought not to interfere in the present case, because there is no such contract between the plaintiff and the company. The memorandum of agreement of the 24th of November, 1884, is in no way a contract between the plaintiff and the company. It is said that it was adopted and incorporated into the articles, but I cannot accede to that. The company by its directors acted upon the agreement, but that does not make it binding on the company. Then, is it incorporated into the articles in such a way as to entitle the plaintiff to say, I have such a contract between me and the company as can be enforced by a court of law, and as I might enforce in equity by way of specific performance? That point is clearly settled, I think, by Eley v. Positive Life Assurance Co. There two of the members of the court of first instance held, and the other member did not express dissent, that the articles are merely a contract between the shareholders inter se, and that though a person in whose favour a stipulation is made in the articles may afterwards have shares allotted to him, he is not by that means put into the same position as if he had entered into a contract with the company. This decision was affirmed on appeal. There is, therefore, no contract between the plaintiff and the company that he shall not be removed from the office of director, and there is no ground for the court interfering by way of injunction to restrain the company from coming to such resolutions as they think fit at the meeting to-morrow. The appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appeal raises two questions, each of which is somewhat important. I will first address myself to the question of substance—whether it is, or is not, competent for the shareholders of this company to remove Mr. Browne from the position of director? His case is that upon the true construction of the articles of association and the contract set out at the end of them and embodied in clause 6, there is a contract between him and the company by virtue of which he is made irremovable until the end of the year 1888. It appears to me that, having regard to the authorities, which are now somewhat numerous, he fails to establish that position. Having regard to the construction put upon section 16 of the Companies Act of 1862 in the case of Eley v. Positive Life Assurance Co. and subsequent cases, it must be taken as settled that the contract upon which he relies is not a contract upon which he can maintain any action, either on the common law side or the equity side. There might have been some difficulty in arriving at that conclusion if it had not been for the authorities, because it happens that this gentleman has had shares allotted to him, and is, therefore, a member of the company. Having regard to the terms of section 16, there would be some force, or, at all events, some plausibility, in the argument that, being a member, the contract which is referred to in the articles has become binding between the company and him. Of course, that argument is open to this difficulty—that there could be no contract between him and the company until the shares were allotted to him, and it would be remarkable that, upon the shares being allotted to him, a contract between him and the company, as to a matter not connected with the holding of shares, should arise. There are difficulties in the construction of section 16 of the Act of 1862, but those difficulties have been removed by the authorities, which show that Browne has no contract with the company which he can enforce either at law or in equity. I do not lose sight of the fact that it is necessary to be cautious in this matter, because he has filed an affidavit at the last moment, in which he says that the contract of the 24th of November, 1884, has been adopted by the company without any modification. What that means is, to say the least of it, uncertain. He has not put in evidence any document or resolution showing that the company have entered into a contract with him to the effect of the contract set out in the schedule to the articles. If there is any such contract, the observations I have made fall to the ground, but I cannot, merely because a man swears that a contract not binding on the company has been adopted by the company, come to the conclusion that there is a contract binding the company. That may be only his inference of law. If his case is that, since the formation of the company, the company have contracted with him not to remove him from his directorship, he must prove it, and this he has not yet done. It appears to me, upon the materials before us, that he has no contract with the company.

Now, if that is the true view of the plaintiff's legal position, there is a great difficulty in holding that he is not removable under article 91. Construe "save as aforesaid" how you like, I doubt his being able to make out that he is not removable. If I am right in my first position, the real effect of "save as aforesaid" in that clause is, to say the least of it, obscure. I have looked at the articles to see if I could come to any conclusion upon it, and it appears to me, as it does to the other members of the court, that the true explanation is that which has been given by Cotton, L.J. If it had been intended to except Mr. Browne from the operation of that clause, I think that it would have been so stated in unmistakable language, and other words than those found would have been used. This disposes of the question of substance.

I now come to what I may now call the question of technicality—the alleged irregularity of the meeting. Mr. Browne says, whatever right the company may have to remove him by special resolution, they have no right to act upon the notice which was issued by the secretary to summon a general meeting. The objection is this:—It appears that on the 1st of October, 1887, Mr. Harvey, the secretary of the company, issued a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting of the members of the company for two purposes—for the purpose of passing a special resolution removing Mr. Browne from the board of directors, and for the purpose of passing a resolution authorizing the increase of the capital of the company. This notice convening the meeting purports to be issued by order, which, I suppose, means by order of the board of directors. The plaintiff contends that it has been issued without proper authority, for that Mr. Harvey, the secretary, issued it, not by the order of the board of directors, but by the order of two of the directors not duly assembled. If that is so, then he says it is not competent for the shareholders to pass this resolution, and what they do at a meeting thus irregularly called will be invalid, and ought to be stopped.

Now let us look at the facts. In the first place, Mr. Browne in his notice of motion does not seek to restrain the company from increasing the capital. He does not ask that all proceedings under this alleged irregular notice shall be stopped. He confines his application to the first part of it, and asks the court to restrain the shareholders from passing any resolution removing him. If there were anything in his objection he would be entitled to go on and ask the court to restrain the shareholders from passing any resolution at all. Now let us look a little more closely at this matter. It appears that the directors of this company had been in the habit of holding meetings at short notice, convened without any, or, if any, without much, formality. It appears that before the meeting of the 28th of September the meetings of the directors were usually held at the office of Mr. Browne himself, and he never raised any objection to the shortness of the notice before this. The meeting is quarrelled with upon the ground that sufficient notice was not given to all the members of the board to assemble and hear what was proposed to be done. The power of the board to convene a meeting of the shareholders is contained in clause 56 of the articles, and runs thus:—"The directors may, whenever they think fit, call an extraordinary meeting," and then it provides that they shall be bound to do so upon such requisition as therein mentioned. "The directors may, whenever they think fit." That means, I apprehend, that the directors may do it at a meeting properly convened. I do not think it means that any directors may, without consulting the others, call an extraordinary meeting. I think that, so far, Mr. Marten's argument is right, and if the plaintiff had complained that the meeting of directors convened at such a short notice was not duly convened, and had sought the interference of the court to prevent the directors from acting on a resolution passed at it, I can understand that he would have had a plausible case. But he did nothing of the kind. He took no notice of the matter. He did not say that it was inconvenient for him to attend, and he did not ask the directors to adjourn it. He does nothing at all until this notice convening the extraordinary meeting has been issued and circulated, nor until four days before the meeting. His contention now is that what he calls this irregularity in serving the notice upon him renders it incompetent for the shareholders to pass the resolution to consider which they have had notice to meet. It appears to me that, if we gave effect to such an argument as this, we should be paralyzing the whole course of business of these companies. It is competent for directors to call meetings, it is competent for shareholders to pass resolutions, and the most that can be said here is that there is or may be some irregularity, but an irregularity (if such it be) which can be cured at any moment. In such cases the court never interferes. I think it is most important that the court should hold fast to the rule upon which it has always acted, not to interfere for the purpose of forcing companies to conduct their business according to the strictest rules, where the irregularity complained of can be set right at any moment. I am not at all sure, having regard to the mode in which, and the short notice upon which, those meetings of directors were held, that this gentleman could have complained of this meeting of directors as irregular, but I will assume that he could. If, at the time of receiving the notice of the board meeting, he had said to the secretary that he could not attend as the notice was too short, he might have had some case. I am not prepared, however, to say that, in consequence of the shortness of that notice, the shareholders were incompetent to pass the special resolution they were convened to consider. If they confirm it to-morrow it appears to me that their doing so will be entirely valid, and I am of opinion that this injunction ought not to have been granted.

Lopes, L.J.—I entirely concur, and I can add nothing to what has been said.

Mortgage—Assignment of future property by way of mortgage—Contract enforceable in equity—Property on coming into existence bound.

A mortgagor assigned by way of mortgage (inter alia) property not then in existence, comprising "all moneys . . . to which the mortgagor . . . may, during this security, become entitled under any settlement, will, or other document, either in his own right or as next of kin of . . . any . . . person or persons," and "also all . . . personal property . . . of, to, or in which the mortgagor, . . . during this security, shall become beneficially possessed, entitled, or interested for any vested, contingent, or possible estate or interest." Subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, but during the continuance of the security, the mortgagor became entitled to a share of a testator's residuary estate.

Held, that, with regard to all property non-existent at the date of the mortgage, the mortgage was to be treated in equity as a contract for valuable consideration received; that the contract here was divisible in its terms; that, at all events, with respect to moneys to which the mortgagor might become entitled under any will, the contract would be enforced in equity; and therefore that the share in the testator's residuary estate to which the mortgagor had become entitled was bound by the contract and was effectually charged in favour of the mortgagee.

Decision of Kay, J. (35 W. R. 388, 35 Ch. D. 109), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kay, J., reported 35 W. R. 388, 35 Ch. D. 109.

The material facts and documents will be found fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (35 W. R. 388).

By a mortgage deed dated January 18, 1876, the mortgagor, in consideration of the sum of £800 then paid him by the mortgagee, assigned to the mortgagee by way of mortgage (inter alia) all moneys of or to which the mortgagor then was or might during the security become entitled under any settlement, will, or other document, either in his own right or as next of kin of his father or any other person or persons. The mortgage deed also contained a "general words" clause purporting to sweep in all personal property of, to, or in which the mortgagor then was, or during the security should become, beneficially possessed, entitled, or interested for any vested, contingent, or possible estate or interest.

In 1881 the mortgagor filed a petition for liquidation, and the present appellant was the trustee in liquidation of the mortgagor. In 1884 the mortgagor, while still a liquidating debtor, became entitled under the will of the testator in the action to a share of the testator's residuary estate. An originating summons was taken out by the plaintiff, the executor of the testator's will, to have the question determined whether this share was or was not bound by the mortgage.

Kay, J., held that the share in question was bound by the mortgage, and passed, therefore, to the mortgagee. The trustee in liquidation of the mortgagor appealed.

Begg, for the appellant.—The principle on which an assignment of future property is enforced is that of specific performance of a contract: Collyer v. Isaacs, 30 W. R. 70, 19 Ch. D. 342. The effect of the mortgage here is to include all property which the mortgagor might acquire during the continuance of the mortgage security. A contract of that kind is too vague to be specifically performed: Official Receiver v. Tailby, 35 W. R. 91, 18 Q. B. D. 25. The contract here is not divisible (Belding v. Read, 13 W. R. 867, 3 H. & C. 955), and therefore cannot be enforced: In re D'Epineuil, 30 W. R. 702, 20 Ch. D. 758. Covenants to settle all future property in marriage settlements have always been treated favourably in equity for the purpose of protecting the wife: Hardey v. Green, 12 Beav. 182; Lewis v. Maddocks, 8 Ves. 149.

E. Widdrington Byrne, for the respondent, the mortgagee. — First the covenant contained in the general words of the mortgage to bring into the security all future-acquired property is perfectly valid and can be enforced; and, secondly, if it be necessary to do so, I say the covenant can be read distributively, and the words "all moneys of or to which" the mortgagor "may, during this security, become entitled under any . . . will," are sufficient to comprise this particular share in question without relying on the general words at all. On the second point, Bennett v. Cooper, 9 Beav. 252, is a distinct authority in my favour. On the first point there is no distinction in principle between contracts to settle future property in marriage settlements and the same contracts in other instruments. As to Official Receiver v. Tailby, it was a decision that went merely on the construction of the words in the particular document there, and is not binding generally. Belding v. Read is not reconcilable with Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, nor with Clements v. Matthews, 11 Q. B. D. 808, 31 W. R. Dig. 23. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436.]

Begg replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 3.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by one of the defendants from a judgment of Kay, J., who held that, as between the mortgagee and the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, the mortgagee is entitled to a legacy bequeathed to the mortgagor. [The Lord Justice then stated shortly the terms of the mortgage deed, and continued:—] It is clear that an assignment cannot at law pass future property, but it may be made effectual against future property on the ground that a court of equity will, in a suitable case, enforce it as a contract.

It is necessary, first, to consider the principle on which an assignment of property not in existence at the time is made effectual. The principle is that such an assignment, as regards the non-existing property, amounts to a contract for value, which a court of equity will specifically perform. That was laid down by Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall, and I should not have gone back to this were it not that there seems to be a misunderstanding as to the application of the doctrine of specific performance in these cases. The ordinary application of the doctrine of specific performance is to compel a vendor or a purchaser to complete a contract for sale or for purchase, a contract which is wholly executory. Where such a contract relates to goods the court will not in general decree specific performance. Why is this? Because the court considers that in general damages are a sufficient remedy, and the proper remedy for a breach of contract to sell or purchase goods; but that does not apply to a breach of contract relating to land.

The question in the present case is whether this assignment gave the mortgagee an effectual charge upon a share of the residuary estate of the testator in this action, which came to the mortgagor in 1884 on the death of the testator. In the present case the contract is not wholly executory. The mortgagee has performed his part of it by advancing his money on the faith of it, and the principle that damages are a sufficient remedy does not apply. Still there may be grounds which will induce a court of equity to refuse specific performance. It may be that the court cannot ascertain the property; in that case it will refuse to enforce the contract on the ground of vagueness. That the property cannot be identified at the time the contract is made does not signify if it can be identified at the time when the court is asked to carry the contract into effect. Again, a contract might be so wide that the court might consider it wrong to enforce it—wrong on the ground that if fully carried into effect it would prevent the party from paying his debts and deprive him of the means of subsistence. Such an objection was adverted to in In re D'Epineuil. Having stated these general principles, I will proceed to consider whether the present contract is open to objections which would make it right to refuse specific performance of it.

In my opinion the decision that this legacy is effectually charged in favour of the mortgagee is right. This, in my judgment, is a divisible contract. The general words at the end of the assignment are so wide that a court of equity might say they were too wide to be enforced. I do not decide that point, because, in my opinion, it is not necessary to do so. We have here a distinct assignment of legacies, and that is not too wide to be enforced. Is it too vague? As I have said, vagueness comes to nothing if the property is definite at the time when the court is asked to enforce the contract. Legacies are capable of being as readily identified as anything that can be mentioned. Light is thrown on this subject by the cases on covenants in marriage settlements to settle the wife's future property. It is said that marriage settlements are favoured instruments, and that the cases on them furnish no guide as to other instruments. I cannot agree with that. It is true that an agreement to settle a wife's future property is not open to the second objection I have mentioned, for an agreement to settle upon a wife and her children all property that comes to her during the marriage cannot be considered unreasonable. But, as regards the other objection, it appears to me impossible to hold that a covenant which is not too vague to be executed when it is found in a marriage settlement is too vague to be executed when found in a mortgage. In Bennett v. Cooper Lord Langdale held that a collateral security very similar in its nature to the present ought to be enforced. The description there was: "All sums of money then or thereafter to become due to him, and all legacies and bequests which had already or might thereafter be given or bequeathed to him or his wife by any person whomsoever," and it was held that legacies subsequently bequeathed to the mortgagor were bound. That disposes of the present case, but I will refer to some of the cases cited to us.

In Belding v. Read the court appears to me to have gone wrong on the construction of the instrument. Instead of treating it as a divisible contract to assign the effects to be in or upon the assignor's premises at Reedham, and also to assign all the personal estate to which he should be entitled anywhere in Great Britain, the court treated it as one indivisible contract, and as too vague to be enforced. Perhaps if the contract had been one indivisible contract a court of equity might have said that it ought not to be enforced because it would be almost impossible to ascertain what was included in it, and because, if enforced, it would take away the assignor's whole means of livelihood.

Mr. Begg contended that the judges did not treat it as one indivisible contract, but it appears to me that they did, and I expressed my view to that effect in Clements v. Matthews. In the case of Official Receiver v. Tailby the Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that in Clements v. Matthews I expressed an opinion that the general words alone would not have bound the future property. I did not mean to give an opinion one way or the other on that point, which it was not necessary to decide. I thought that the contract was divisible, and that the contract in question came within that branch of it to which no objection on the ground of vagueness could be raised and was therefore bound, so that it was unnecessary to consider whether it would have been bound if the contract had only contained the general words. The case of the Official Receiver v. Tailby was much pressed on us by the appellant. It is a decision of the Court of Appeal, and if it were the same as the present case we should be bound by it. But that case was very different. It turned on an assignment of "all the book debts due and owing or which may, during the continuance of the security, become due and owing to the said mortgagor."

We have not here the difficulty which the Court of Appeal had in that case. The contract here refers to property capable of being identified. I am not certain on what grounds the Court of Appeal arrived at their decision in that case, for they do not lay down any principle, and whatever the grounds were, I think the the case does not apply to the very different terms of the present instrument. The appeal in my opinion fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and take the same view as Cotton, L.J. The time will come when the Court of Appeal will have to consider the law as to assignments of future property, and to lay down—if it can—for the guidance of the profession some more definite rule than is to be gathered from the cases since Holroyd v. Marshall. As it seems to me, language has been used in some of them which tends to confuse the two distinct ideas of vagueness in the contract and vagueness which arises from the difficulty of identifying future property. "Vagueness" is a misleading term. A contract may be so vague in its terms that it cannot be understood, and in that case it is of no effect at law or in equity. There is another kind of vagueness which arises from the property not being ascertained at the time of the contract: but if at the time when the contract is sought to be enforced the property has come in esse, and is capable of being identified as that to which the contract refers, I cannot see why there is in it any such vagueness as to prevent a court of equity from enforcing the contract. Even then there may be something in the contract which will prevent its being enforced. I will not attempt to define what will have that effect. It is suggested that, as distinct from vagueness, there may be such wideness in a contract that it ought not to be enforced by a court of equity. Thus it is said that a contract by a man to assign all the property that shall come to him would be too wide to be enforced. I will give no opinion on that point till it comes before us for decision.

A contract, of course, may be one of which a court of equity cannot decree specific performance, because it relates to nothing specific—e.g., a contract to supply a given quantity of goods of a particular description. That is a case where the subject-matter cannot be ascertained. And even where the subject-matter is ascertained there may be cases where a court of equity will not interfere. The uncertainty of the subject-matter at the time when the contract is entered into does not seem to me to be an adequate ground, however, for declining to interfere if the subject-matter has become ascertained when the court is asked to enforce the contract. I am aware there may be an important distinction between a case where the contract is wholly executory and a case where the whole consideration has been paid. I only wish to say that in my opinion the subject is one of great difficulty, that it does not appear to me to have been exhaustively considered, and that there is a good deal of obscurity in the language often used about it. I retain the same doubts as I expressed in Clements v. Matthews.

In Holroyd v. Marshall Lord Westbury says:—"If a vendor or mortgagor agrees to sell or mortgage property real or personal of which he is not possessed at the time, and he receives the consideration for the contract and afterwards becomes possessed of property answering the description in the contract, there is no doubt that a court of equity would compel him to perform the contract, and that the contract would in equity transfer the beneficial interest to the mortgagee or purchaser immediately on the property being acquired. This, of course, assumes that the supposed contract is one of that class of which a court of equity would decree specific performance. If it be so, then immediately on the acquisition of the property described, the vendor or the mortgagor would hold it in trust for the purchaser or mortgagee according to the terms of the contract. For if a contract be in other respects good and fit to be performed, and the consideration has been received, incapacity to perform it at the time of its execution will be no answer when the means of doing so are afterwards obtained."

I must express my concurrence with Cotton, L.J., as to the difficulty of making a distinction between contracts on marriage and other contracts as regards the question of vagueness. As to the cases cited, I think that in Belding v. Read the court construed the agreement wrongly, and that the case cannot stand with Clements v. Matthews, as I intimated in Reeves v. Barlow. I ought to add that I am not satisfied that the judges in Belding v. Read altogether appreciated the observations of Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall.

Official Receiver v. Tailby is a peculiar case. In Holroyd v. Marshall it was laid down that, when the property comes into possession, you must see whether the subject-matter of the contract is such that the court would decree specific performance. In Official Receiver v. Tailby the court laid down no principle as to what contracts can be specifically performed; they only said that the contract before them could not, and I am not sure how they construed it. The present contract is entirely different. According to Clements v. Matthews it can be divided, and I see no reason for saying that a contract to assign all legacies which shall be bequeathed to the mortgagor is one which a court of equity will not perform. It is, therefore, unnecessary to go into the question whether, if the assignment had contained only the sweeping general words, the property would have been bound. I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails.

FRY, L.J.—I agree in thinking the decision of Kay, J., is right, but, as the question is one of general importance, I will add a few words.

We have not to consider the cases where an assignment of future property is made effectual by what Lord Bacon calls "novus actus interveniens." There is another class of cases where an assignment of future property will have effect given to it as a contract to give security on future property—viz., where the consideration has been received and the property has come into existence. That there are cases in which the court will enforce such a contract is not in dispute. I think there may be cases where the court will not do so, owing to the nature of the subject-matter of the contract, and the authorities seem to indicate the existence of such a class of cases. Belding v. Read indicates it, though I think that in that case the court drew a wrong boundary line, and were in error in holding that in such a case a court of equity would not decree specific performance. In Official Receiver v. Tailby, where the contract was indivisible, the court held it was one which could not be enforced, and I, considering myself bound by Belding v. Read, came to the same conclusion in In re D'Epineuil. There may, I think, be contracts of such a nature that the court will not decree specific performance of them. It might say that a contract by a man to assign all his future property by way of mortgage was one which ought not to be enforced, because it would deprive the assignor of the means of livelihood, and would tend to a multiplication of actions for getting in the different parts of the property which the assignor would be bound to assign from time to time. But in the present case we have not to draw the line between contracts which the court will enforce and contracts which it will not.

The cases where the contract is wholly executory on both sides differ materially from a case like the present, where the contract on one side has been performed. Wherever the boundary line is to be drawn I am satisfied that the present falls within the class of cases where the contract will be enforced. It is a contract relating to several subject-matters, one being all real and personal estate to which the mortgagor may become entitled under any will. I see no reason for not specifically performing that contract as to any property that comes to the mortgagor under a will. He has received the consideration and ought to perform his part of the contract. Such a contract was enforced by Lord Langdale in Bennett v. Cooper, and, though we are not bound by his decision, I think it one which ought to be followed.

The appellant very properly pressed upon us the case of Official Receiver v. Tailby, where the court came to the conclusion (and it may be a right conclusion) that a contract to assign all book debts which should be owing to the mortgagor was too vague to be enforced. If the case had been in point we should have submitted to it. The court seemed inclined to hold that the agreement included, not only all debts entered in the assignor's books, but all debts which ought to be so entered, in which case it might be held that the uncertainty made the contract one which the court could not enforce. There is no such difficulty here; the contract is quite different, and, as I cannot find that the court in that case laid down any principle, I do not think it is any authority against our decision.

WILSON v. GLOSSOP. (a.)

Husband and wife—Adultery of wife—Connivance of husband—Wife living separate from husband—Liability of husband for necessaries supplied to wife.

A husband who has turned his wife out of doors without any means of support on account of adultery committed by her with his connivance is liable for necessaries supplied to her.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 77), 19 Q. B. D. 379, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division.

The action was brought in the Sheffield County Court to recover £40 for forty weeks' maintenance of the defendant's wife. It appeared that the defendant, on account of his wife's adultery, turned her out of doors without any means of support. She thereupon went to her mother, the plaintiff, who supplied her with board and lodging. The defendant filed a petition for dissolution of marriage, and on the trial of the petition the jury found that the wife had committed adultery, but that the defendant had connived at it. The petition was accordingly dismissed.

The defence relied upon in this action (the claim being admitted to be for necessaries) was the adultery of the wife. The answer was that the defendant's connivance precluded him from relying upon this defence.

The Divisional Court, reversing the judgment of the county court judge, gave judgment for the plaintiff (see ante, p. 77, 19 Q. B. D. 379).

The defendant appealed.

Moorsom, Q.C., for the defendant.—When a husband has turned his wife away for adultery, she carries with her no implied authority to pledge his credit for necessaries, and the same rule applies where she commits adultery while living apart from him: Manby v. Scott, 2 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., 525, 535; Cooper v. Lloyd, 6 C. B. N. S. 519, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 42; Cox v. Kitchin, 1 B. & P. 338; Rex v. Flintan, 1 B. & Ad. 227; Govier v. Hancock, 6 T. R. 603. In this last case the husband was guilty of gross misconduct, and yet he was held not liable. He had brought a mistress into the house with his wife, treated his wife with cruelty, and finally turned her out of doors. The wife then committed adultery, and the husband was held not liable for necessaries supplied to her. Connivance of the husband at the wife's adultery is another form of misconduct, and cannot affect the doctrine that adultery of the wife destroys any implied authority to pledge the husband's credit while living separate. Norton v. Fazan, 1 B. & P. 226, may seem to militate against this contention, but that case, as Buller, J., said in his judgment, was an anomalous one. A wife who has committed adultery with her husband's connivance and has been turned out of doors cannot get restitution of conjugal rights: Drew v. Drew, 1 Notes of Cases, 315; Dennis v. Dennis, cited in a note to Turton v. Turton, 3 Hagg Ecc. 348, 353.

H. Reed, for the plaintiff.—The old cases would seem to go this length—that a husband who turns away his wife for any cause remains chargeable for necessaries for her: Robinson v. Gosnold, 6 Mod. 171; per Hale, C.B., in Manby v. Scott, Bac. Abr., Baron & Feme (H.); Etherington v. Parrot, 1 Salk. 118. The modern cases, however, show that if the wife is turned away for adultery she carries no authority to pledge her husband's credit: Ham v. Toovey, Selw. N. P. 228; Hardie v. Grant, 8 C. & P. 512; Culley v. Charman, 29 W. R. 803, 7 Q. B. D. 89. The question always is, was the husband justified in turning his wife away? A husband who connives at his wife's adultery and then turns her away does so without lawful excuse, and she carries with her authority to pledge his credit for her maintenance. As to a wife losing her claim to dower by adultery, he cited Co. Litt., 32b., and Manby v. Scott, 2 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., at p. 536. As to whether connivance was a bar to a claim for restitution of conjugal rights, he cited Holmes v. Holmes, 2 Lee, 116; Hope v. Hope, 1 Sw. & Tr. 94, 6 W. R. Dig. 15; Seaver v. Seaver, 2 Sw. & Tr. App. 2, p. 665.

Moorsom, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff must be taken to be in the position of a stranger who has supplied certain articles necessary for the sustenance of a married woman who is living apart from her husband. In proceedings in the Divorce Court by the husband for dissolution of marriage, the jury found that though the wife had committed adultery, the husband had connived at it—that is to say, that he was an accomplice in what she had done. Notwithstanding that finding, the husband has, after the decision of the Divisional Court against him, brought this appeal, and contends that he is not liable by reason of the adultery of his wife. A man who marries is bound by law to maintain his wife, unless she offends by committing adultery. A man is bound by every moral tie to protect his wife against infamy, and to shield her from her own weakness. Instead of that, this defendant has been a willing accomplice in his wife's adultery. The argument on his behalf necessarily goes to this extent, that if he had forced his wife to commit adultery and had lived on the wages of her prostitution he could afterwards for that very adultery throw her on the streets without any means of support, and be free from all liability to pay for her maintenance. Nothing could induce me to say that such is the law of England, unless I were bound by a superior authority so to hold. If there had been such an authority I should have bowed before it with regret. I do not care to consider whether a wife can, under the circumstances, claim restitution of conjugal rights. A husband who turns his wife out of doors on account of her adultery without any means of support is guilty of a harsh and cruel act; but to say that a husband, who has been a willing accomplice in his wife's adultery, can throw her on the streets without any means of support, and without incurring any liability for her maintenance, is to state that which is shameful. There is no authority, nor any vestige of an authority, in support of such a proposition; and, therefore, I am of opinion that the defendant is liable, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—If a husband turns his wife away without any means of support for any cause not justifiable in law she carries with her the right to pledge his credit for her maintenance. Is adultery committed by a wife with the connivance of her husband a justification for the husband turning her away from his house so as to relieve him from any liability in respect to her maintenance? In answer to that inquiry no direct authority can be given. To say that it would be a sufficient justification would, in my opinion, be both morally and socially abominable. I say that neither morally nor legally is it any justification. The cause for which the defendant turned his wife away was not a justifiable one, and it followed that she carried with her the right and the power to pledge his credit for her maintenance. The wife has received maintenance from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff can recover the expenses so incurred.

LOPES, L.J.—The facts in this case are not in dispute, and may be shortly stated as follows:—The wife committed adultery with the connivance of her husband; the husband subsequently turned her out of doors without any means of support; the plaintiff supplied her with the necessary means of support, and now seeks to make the husband liable for the money so expended.

During cohabitation there is a presumption (though a rebuttable one) arising from the circumstance of cohabitation, that the wife is in certain circumstances the agent of the husband, and entitled to pledge his credit. But when the wife is living apart from her husband at the time of making the contract, the presumption is the other way, and it lies on the creditor to show that the wife is living apart under such circumstances as give her an implied authority to bind him. If she is turned away by her husband without any justifiable cause, and without the means of supplying herself with necessaries, the husband is bound by any contract she makes for necessaries suitable to her degree and estate; per Bayley, J., in Montague v. Benedict, 2 Sm. L. C. 9th ed., at p. 507. Again, in Eastland v. Burchell, 27 W. R. 290, 3 Q. B. D. 432, Lush, J., says:—"The authority of a wife to pledge the credit of her husband is a delegated, not an inherent, authority. If she binds him, she binds him only as his agent. This is a well-established doctrine. If she leaves him without cause, and without his consent, she carries no implied authority with her to maintain herself at his expense. But if he wrongfully compels her to leave his home, he is bound to maintain her elsewhere, and if he makes no adequate provision for this purpose, she becomes an agent of necessity to supply her wants upon his credit." Apply the law so laid down to the present case. A husband, who has consented to the adultery of his wife, turns her out of doors without the means of providing herself with necessaries. Does he not wrongfully compel her to leave his home? What right has he to complain of that to which he has been a willing party, and what justification can it afford for his turning his wife out of doors without the means of supplying herself with necessaries? Harris v. Morris, 4 Esp. 41, relied upon in the court below, seems to proceed on the ground that the husband's liability revives if he takes the adulteress back into his house, and that when he turned her out again, he turned her out with power to pledge his credit for necessaries. That case does not seem to assist in the decision of the case now before the court. Lord Kenyon seems to found his judgment on the fact that she was sponte retracta. I think the judgment of the court below right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

SHRAPNEL v. LAING. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Claim and counter-claim—Defendant recovering on counter-claim a larger sum than plaintiff on claim—Event.

Where, in a trial by jury, there is a claim and a counter-claim, which is not a set-off, but is in the nature of a cross-action, and the plaintiff succeeds on the claim and the defendant on the counter-claim, the plaintiff should get the general costs of the claim, to be taxed as though it were an independent action, and the defendant the general costs of the counter-claim, to be taxed as though it were another independent action, and the allocatur for costs should be given for the balance due to the party in whose favour such balance is.

Appeal from a divisional court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.).

The action was brought for damages for breach of contract, and there was a counter-claim for work done under the contract. At the trial an agreement was come to between the parties, which was indorsed on the briefs of counsel in the following terms:—"Verdict for the plaintiff on the claim for £50, and for the defendant on the counter-claim for £80. Costs as in the ordinary practice in trial by jury with such a result. Judgment accordingly." The judgment was entered "that the plaintiff recover £50 against the defendant, and that the defendant recover £80 against the plaintiff, and costs to be taxed." The taxing master gave the plaintiff the costs of the action, except such as related to the counter-claim, and gave the defendant the costs of the counter-claim only.

The defendant objected to the taxation because the master had allowed to the plaintiff all such items as he would have been entitled to if he had a right to the general costs of the action, to which the defendant denied his right, and because the master had disallowed to the defendant items to the allowance of which he considered that he was entitled as the party entitled to the general costs of the action.

The Divisional Court refused to interfere with the taxation.

Hugh F. Boyd, for the appellant.—By ord. 21, r. 17, the judge may enter judgment for the balance on claim and counter-claim. The judgment in this case ought to have been entered for the balance. The costs in this case would follow the event by ord. 65, r. 1. The balance, which is in the appellant's favour, is the event, and he is therefore entitled to the general costs of the action: Baines v. Bromley, 29 W. R. 706, 6 Q. B. D. 691. Lund v. Campbell, 33 W. R. 510, 14 Q. B. D. 821, is directly in point. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Hewitt & Co. v. Blumer & Co., 3 Times L. R. 221.] The decisions are conflicting. Ward v. Morse, 31 W. R. 936, 23 Ch. D. 377, assumes to follow Saner v. Bilton, Kisch, for the respondent.—The judgment was properly drawn up, and the master has taxed accordingly. He has apportioned the costs of common items as in Ward v. Morse.

Boyd replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there was a motion for review of taxation, and the Divisional Court have refused to review it. Upon a summons to review taxation the person taking out the summons must show that he has taken objections to the taxation, and by those objections he is bound and those objections only can be considered. In this case there was a claim and counter-claim proper—that is to say, an independent counter-claim which is not in the nature of a set-off. The plaintiff recovered on the claim and the defendant on the counter-claim, the defendant recovering a larger amount altogether than the plaintiff. Judgment was entered according to terms arranged by the counsel. As to the form in which the judgment was entered, I think for the purposes of taxation it is immaterial whether it was entered for the balance or not. It is therefore unnecessary to determine what was the proper form in which, in accordance with the arrangement, it ought to have been entered. It is, in my opinion, a matter for the discretion of the judge under ord. 21, r. 17, whether in such a case the judgment should be entered for so much for the plaintiff on the claim and for so much for the defendant on the counter-claim, or whether it should be entered for the balance. I should suppose, unless there were reason to the contrary, that the usual course would be for the judge to direct judgment to be entered for the balance. But, however the judgment be entered, the rule as to the taxation of costs in such a case is the same. The fundamental ground of that rule is that the claim, with its issues, is a cause by itself, and the counter-claim, with its issues, is also an independent cause by itself. They are, in fact, cross-actions founded on different circumstances and very often arising from different transactions. The taxation of costs must therefore be conducted on that footing. The costs of the claim must be taxed as though the claim were a cause by itself. If there are issues on the claim and the plaintiff succeeds on the claim, but fails on some of the issues, the plaintiff will get the costs of the cause, but the defendant will get the costs of the issues on which he has succeeded. So, where there is a wholly independent counter-claim, the costs must be taxed as though it were an independent action. If the defendant succeeds on the counter-claim, but fails on some of the issues raised by it, he will get the general costs of the counter-claim, less the costs of those issues on which he has failed, and on which the plaintiff, who is the defendant in the counter-claim, has succeeded. The taxing master's allocatur will therefore show this, but it will show either that the costs of the claim exceed those of the counter-claim, or vice versâ, and the amounts will be set off. The only difficulty is one which can be easily dealt with by the master. Sometimes the means of arriving at the result are the same, although the actions are different. For instance, there may be only one brief for each party on claim and counter-claim. Then that one brief must be treated by the master as if it were two. He must look through it and divide it, so much as necessary for the claim, so much as necessary for the counter-claim. The same will be the case as to the fee on the brief and as to any other such items which may be common to both actions. I do not think there are many such common items. The writ may, perhaps, be a common item, and possibly interrogatories, but it is not necessary to decide that now.

The only objection that has been taken to this taxation is that, because the defendant recovered more than the plaintiff on a balance, he ought to have the general costs of the action. I do not think that objection can be sustained. I wish to follow entirely what I said in Hewitt & Co. v. Blumer & Co. That judgment, which is binding on us, appears perfectly right, and I adopt it again now. It follows that this appeal fails. I wish to add that nothing that I have said derogates from the absolute right of a judge who tries a case without a jury to direct how the costs shall go.

FRY, L.J.—I also think that this appeal must be dismissed. The application to us is twofold—to reform the judgment, and to review the taxation. I think that the judgment has been drawn up in the proper form. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that ord. 21, r. 17, gives the judge a discretionary power as to the form of entering up a judgment, but I think that is immaterial, because the costs have to follow the event here. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled in this case to the costs of the claim and the defendant to the costs of the counter-claim. The only question raised by the objections is whether a defendant who succeeds on his counter-claim for a larger sum than is recovered by the plaintiff on his claim is entitled to the general costs of the action. I think he is not. We have nothing now to do with proportioning common items. They are referred to in Hewitt & Co. v. Blumer & Co. and in Ward v. Morse, but they do not concern us now, and I wish to guard myself from expressing any opinion about them.

The result, then, is that the plaintiff will get the general costs of the claim and the defendant the general costs of the counter-claim.

LOPES, L.J.—It is, I think, immaterial to consider the form in which the judgment was entered. The case appears to me to be absolutely governed by the case of Hewitt & Co. v. Blumer & Co. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Mortgage—Subsequent lease by mortgagor—Payment of rent to mortgagee under compulsion—Validity of payment as against mortgagor—Appointment of receiver.

Where a tenant holding under a lease, granted by the mortgagor subsequent to the mortgage, pays to the mortgagee the amount due for rent under threat of legal proceedings and in consequence of the default of his lessor, the tenant can set up such payment in answer to a claim for the rent by the mortgagor, or by anyone claiming under him.

Johnson v. Jones, 9 A. & E. 809, followed.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 75.

The facts were as follows:—

In February, 1886, the defendant mortgaged a house to two persons, and on the 11th of March, 1886, he demised this house to one Butler, who had no knowledge of the mortgage, at an annual rent payable quarterly.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Butler paid the quarter's rent due in June, 1886, to the defendant, but on the 7th of July the mortgagees gave him notice to pay to them the rent then or thereafter accruing due and to pay it to no other person. On the 10th of September Butler received notice of a transfer of the mortgage to a company, and the company by notice required Butler to pay the rent to them.

The plaintiff, having recovered judgment against the defendant, and this judgment being unsatisfied, on the 14th of December, 1886, Field, J., at chambers, made an order appointing the plaintiff receiver of the rents then due or to become due to the defendant in respect of two houses, one of which was the house let to Butler and mortgaged to the company, the appointment to be without prejudice to the rights of any prior incumbrancers upon the said premises who might think proper to take possession of the same by virtue of their respective securities. Notice of this order was served upon Butler.

On the 25th of January, 1887, default having been made in payment of the mortgage debt and interest thereon being in arrear, Butler was required by the company, the transferees of the mortgage, under threat of legal proceedings, to pay to them the half-year's rent due at Christmas, 1886, and thereupon he paid it to them. Application was then made by the receiver for an order directing Butler to pay to him the quarter's rent due at Michaelmas, notwithstanding that Butler had already paid it to the mortgagees. Pollock, B., made the order, but the Divisional Court discharged it: see ante, p. 75.

The receiver appealed.

A. Powell and Ingpen, for the receiver.—The Divisional Court were wrong in saying that the assent of the tenant to the notice by the mortgagees to pay the rent to them created a new tenancy between them. The notice did not alter the tenancy: Evans v. Elliot, 9 A. & E. 342; Brown v. Storey, 1 M. & G. 117; Hickman v. Machin, 4 H. & N. 716, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 57; Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., 604. A mortgagee, who has taken a mortgage prior to the lease by the mortgagor, cannot claim rent from the tenant, there being no privity between him and the tenant. It differs in that from a lease made prior to the mortgage: Moss v. Gallimore. The mortgagor remains the landlord entitled to the rent until the mortgagees have evicted the tenant by their title paramount or done what is equivalent to eviction. The eviction here, at any rate, did not take place until the notice of the 25th of January, 1887, and payment of the rent to the mortgagees. But this attornment did not relate back, and so the prior rent was still payable to the mortgagor. The receiver stands in the same position as the mortgagor, and therefore can claim this rent. As to the question of pressure by the mortgagees, they had no power on the 25th of January to interfere with the prior rights of the mortgagor. To support a plea of payment by the tenant, the tenant must have been liable to distress at the suit of the mortgagees, which was not the case here. The case of Johnson v. Jones, 9 A. & E. 809, is wrong and ought to be overruled. There was no such compulsion here as would justify a plea of payment: Wilton v. Dunn, 17 Q. B. 294; Cambell v. Beedle, 7 M. & G. 386; Pope v. Biggs, 9 B. & C. 245; Carpenter v. Parker, 6 W. R. 98, 3 C. B. N. S. 206, were also referred to. Further, the tenant was guilty of a contempt of court in interfering with the receiver, and in not paying the rent to him under the order appointing the receiver. 1 Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., 414, was referred to.

Gore, for the tenant, Butler, was not called upon.*

* It should be mentioned that section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (as to leases by mortgagor), was expressly excluded by the mortgage deed.

FRY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the Divisional Court, setting aside the order of the judge at chambers directing Butler to pay one quarter's rent to the receiver. Butler was brought before the court in this way:—The plaintiff had obtained judgment against the defendant, and the plaintiff was himself appointed receiver of the rents of two houses belonging to the defendant, one of which Butler held as tenant to the defendant. Butler had paid the rent to the defendant's mortgagees, and the receiver also claimed payment of a quarter's rent from Butler, notwithstanding that Butler had already paid it to the mortgagees, and thereupon the receiver applied for an order to that effect.

We have not to consider whether the above procedure is in proper form. I will assume for present purposes that it is correct. His lordship, having stated the facts, proceeded:—

In the first place, it is said that, a receiver of the rents having been appointed, the court will not allow any interference with him and with his right to receive the rents, and that Butler, by his conduct in not paying him the rent, has interfered with the receiver, and has therefore committed a contempt of court. The order, however, appointing the receiver is expressly made without prejudice to prior incumbrancers. It seems to me that the company are prior incumbrancers within the meaning of that order, and they have thought proper to obtain possession of the premises—that is, they have done all they could to obtain possession by getting the rents paid to them. The form of the order is designed to allow payment to prior incumbrancers of any sums which they are entitled to receive, and they may enforce their rights without committing a contempt of court. No doubt this form of order, as applied to equitable execution, is modern; but there is an old form of order for the appointment of a receiver at the instance of a second mortgagee where the prior mortgagee is not in possession, the order being made without prejudice to the rights of any prior mortgagees, or so as not to affect any prior incumbrancers who might think proper to take possession under their security. Therefore it appears to me that the prior mortgagees are entitled to insist upon their rights without committing a contempt of court.

That being so, we are driven to inquire whether, under their rights, the mortgagees had a right to receive this sum of money. In other words, whether Butler, by paying it to the mortgagees, could successfully plead payment in answer to a claim by the defendant, the lessor. This point was raised and decided by the Court of Queen's Bench as long ago as 1839 in Johnson v. Jones. The headnote there states "to an avowry for rent the tenant may plead payment of it to a mortgagee to whom the premises had been mortgaged in fee before the demise to the plaintiff, and who had demanded payment from the plaintiff, and threatened to put the law in force in case of refusal. Such plea is, in substance, a plea of payment." The circumstances in that case were very similar to those here. In the present case the mortgagees had demanded the amount due from Butler to the mortgagor for rent, and threatened eviction in case of refusal, and thereupon Butler paid it to them. The plea in that case, which was held good, shows that the tenant, being under that compulsion, and being under that compulsion by the default of the lessor, was entitled to treat that payment as payment to the lessor. Lord Denman, C.J., said: "This is a plea, not of nil habuit in tenementis, but of payment; and the defect of the lessor's title is shown only as a medium of proof that the payment was for the benefit and by reason of the default of the lessor himself. Sapeford v. Fletcher, 4 T. R. 511, and Taylor v. Zamira, 6 Taunt. 524, are therefore authorities to show that the plea is, in substance, good." And Littledale, J., said: "The plaintiff does not deny that he holds as tenant to the defendant; but he shows that the lease was made subject to a prior charge, namely, the mortgage, which he was compelled to pay. The payment was of money not claimed as rent, but as due upon the loan by way of mortgage." Mr. Powell contended that that case was wrongly decided, that there was no compulsion there, and that notice to pay the rent to the mortgagees under such a threat did not amount to compulsion, and that it differed from the case of a rent-charge where the rent-charge owner might distrain upon the property. But the interest upon the mortgage debt is charged upon the property, and to my mind it is an immaterial distinction whether the tenant is liable to distress or eviction; both may be described as a compulsion to pay; and if he pays to the mortgagees under that compulsion the sum due to his lessor, he may set up that payment as against a claim by his lessor. That case has stood for nearly fifty years, and has been approved in Cambell v. Boodle, and by Bramwell, B., in Hickman v. Machin. I think, therefore, that that case is good law and ought to be followed, and that the decision applies to the present case. The judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

COLLINS v. CASTLE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Building scheme—Restrictive conditions—Right to enforce—Absence of mutual covenant.

In 1856 the owner of an estate had a scheme prepared for laying it out as a building estate, and sold a few plots in 1857. In 1882 other portions were offered for sale, by the trustees of the late owner, in lots, some of which were subject to various restrictive conditions, and the others of which were free from any restriction. The plaintiff B. H. C. bought several of the free lots and one of those subject to a condition.

In 1883 another sale took place of the various lots left unsold in 1882 together with further lots, some free from restriction; and the latter were bought by the plaintiffs. In 1885 the defendant bought certain lots originally left unsold in 1882, and which were subject to the condition of building thereon houses of the value of £1,200 each, and entered into a covenant in the required terms with the vendors. The plan on the conditions showed the houses built on certain of the lots sold in 1857. The defendant intended to build houses of less value than £1,200 each on the lots so purchased by him.

Held (following Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778), that, though the plaintiffs could not sue on the covenant entered into by the defendant with the trustees, the inference from the circumstances was that the restrictions as to building houses of a certain value were for the benefit of all the purchasers of lots on the estate, and therefore that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from building houses of less value than £1,200 each.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Trial of action.

The Marquis of Camden, in 1856, being the owner of the Camden Estate, near Tunbridge Wells, had plans prepared for the purpose of laying it out for building, and sold a few plots, the purchasers of which had to enter into a covenant as to the character of the houses to be built on the land.

The Marquis of Camden died in 1875, having, by his will, devised his real estate to trustees. No further sale took place until 1882, when a portion of the estate, together with other property situated at Pembury, some two miles away, was offered for sale by auction. The conditions provided that purchasers of certain of the lots were to enter into a covenant with the trustees of the will of the Marquis of Camden, their heirs, successors, and assigns, and other the person or persons for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of the unsold part of the Camden Estate, similar to that entered into by the purchasers from the marquis in 1856, and also to erect only one dwelling-house on an acre, and to expend in the erection of each house £1,200 at the least. The purchasers of certain other lots were to enter into a like covenant to build only one house on each lot, and to expend on it £1,200; and the purchasers of certain other lots were to build houses costing £1,000 each. The remaining lots were to be sold free of restriction. The lots sold at that time were those free from restriction, which were, with one exception, bought by the plaintiff B. H. Collins, who also bought one of the lots subject to the restriction of building thereon a house worth £1,000, and this was the only lot subject to a restriction that was sold at that sale.

In July, 1883, the unsold portions of the estate were again put up, together with other land not previously offered. The plan attached to the conditions showed the lots which had been sold. Some of the lots were to be subject to a restriction as to building houses worth £1,000 each and £1,200, as the case might be. The rest were free from restriction, and were bought by the two plaintiffs, B. H. Collins and J. S. S. Douglas.

In 1884 the defendant bought the lots originally left unsold in 1882, and which were subject to restrictions as to building, and subject to the conditions of 1883. The lots were conveyed to him in 1885.

By an indenture of the 4th of June, 1885, and made between the trustees of the Camden Estate, of the one part, and the defendant, of the other part, the defendant covenanted with the trustees, their appointees, heirs, and assigns, and the person or persons for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of such of the lands then or theretofore part of the Camden Park Estate as had not been sold since the death of the Marquis of Camden, to erect only one dwelling-house on each of the lots bought by him at a cost of £1,200 for each house.

This was an action brought by B. H. Collins and J. S. S. Douglas alleging that the defendant intended to build on the land bought by him houses of less value than £1,200 each, and claiming an injunction to restrain him from dealing with his land in breach of the restrictive conditions affecting the same and the covenants entered into by him.

Warmington, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey.—This case falls within the principle of The Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 15 Q. B. D. 261, and 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778. There was a general scheme of building, to the advantage of which all the purchasers have a right. It makes no difference that the land may have been parted with at different times. The defendant was aware of the previous attempted sales.

Barber, Q.C., and Heath.—There are express covenants entered into by the defendant with certain covenantees. If liable at all it must be to those covenantees who do not include the plaintiffs. There are no mutual covenants here as in previous cases: Western v. MacDermott, 15 W. R. 265, L. R. 2 Ch. 72; Keates v. Lyon, 17 W. R. 338, L. R. 4 Ch. 218; Master v. Hansard, 25 W. R. 570, 4 Ch. D. 718.

Kekewich, J.—It is quite clear that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action on the ground of the express covenant entered into by the defendant with the trustees of the Camden Estate, as they purchased before the covenant was entered into, and are consequently neither appointees, heirs, nor assigns of those trustees. The case, in fact, resolves itself into the question whether, under all the facts and circumstances, the plaintiffs can be held entitled to the benefit of the restrictions imposed on other parts of the property of which they have purchased a portion. The recent case of the Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. contains an apt statement of the law by Wills, J., on questions of this kind which has been approved by the Court of Appeal. The case applied the principles of the courts of equity in the Queen's Bench Division. That statement of the law is binding on me, and is as follows:—"Where the same vendor selling to several persons plots of land, parts of a larger property, exacts from each of them covenants imposing restrictions on the use of the plots sold, without putting himself under any corresponding obligation, it is a question of fact whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees imposed for his own benefit and protection, or are meant by him, and understood by the buyers, to be for the common advantage of the several purchasers. If the restrictive covenants are simply for the benefit of the vendor, purchasers of other plots of land from the vendor cannot claim to take advantage of them. If they are meant for the common advantage of a set of purchasers, such purchasers and their assigns may enforce them inter se for their own benefit."

The Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Lindley substantially adopt that statement of the law, and the latter makes this remark:—"I wish to add that I think the way in which Wills J., has treated Keates v. Lyon and that class of case is correct, and that it is an inference of fact in each case whether the purchasers are bound inter se by such covenants."

There is, therefore, no necessity for me to endeavour to deduce the principle from the cases for myself. In applying the Nottingham case I am not so much extending the principle as applying it to a set of facts perhaps not contemplated by the judge who decided it. The doctrine has not yet been fully elaborated, and many questions must be left undecided—as, for instance, what remedy (if any) the plaintiffs would have had if the vendors had acceded to the request the defendant made and relieved him from the restrictions. I have come to the conclusion that, applying the law as laid down by Wills, J., the restrictions attached to this land were for the common benefit of all the purchasers, and that the plaintiffs bought on the faith of getting the advantage of them.

One difficulty in the application of the doctrine is this, does it apply as well to cases where the common vendor is putting up for sale the whole of his property as to cases where he either retains or declares his intention of retaining a portion.

The latter alternative is not the case I have now to decide, which is one where the vendor is desirous of selling the whole, though not all at once. The doctrine is not to be narrowed to a case where all the property is put up for sale once for all according to a scheme not to be departed from. The property in question was originally laid out in 1856, and the gradual sale of portions was apparently contemplated, and in 1882, when the Camden trustees put the bulk of it up for sale, the plan attached to the conditions showed certain houses as built on plots sold in 1857. One of the plaintiffs bought at that sale. In 1885 the defendant bought some lots, the conditions of 1883 being made applicable; and on the plan attached to the conditions those houses built on the lots sold in 1857 are marked, and two lots are marked as sold, one being that sold to the plaintiff Collins.

That was notice to the defendant, that the property had been laid out for building according to a scheme, and that the vendor's intention was to sell portions as found convenient.

It has been argued that the inclusion in the sale in 1882 of certain property at Pembury precludes the application of the doctrine, as it would be difficult to say to which property the benefit of the conditions was to belong. I am, however, not dealing with a covenant which would have to be strictly construed, but have to discover the intention of the parties, and my conclusion is that the conditions are applicable, as between purchasers of the Camden Park Estate, for the benefit inter se of those purchasers.

I am further of opinion that it makes no difference that the conditions were different as regards different lots, and that some were sold free from any restrictions Such variations are usual and expedient in laying out a building estate, and ought not to prevent a man who has bought subject to one set of conditions, or, may be, free from any, from enforcing different ones attaching to other lots.

This case is, as I have said, not one of covenant, where proof of damage would be unnecessary, as it would be a question of strict right, but here such proof is necessary. Irrespective, however, of direct evidence, I should hold that a man who has bought land on the condition that on neighbouring land only houses worth £1,200 each are to be built, suffers damages if houses of less value are built. Evidence has, in fact, been given of damage—namely, that deterioration in value of the plaintiff's property has been caused by the threatened action of the defendants.

Under these circumstances, I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled, not to sue the defendant on the covenant contained in his purchase-deed, but to enforce that covenant so far as it is in accordance with the conditions subject to which he bought, and subject to which the plaintiffs knew that he must buy if the vendors did their duty, and also that they have shown sufficient damage in case the defendant is not restrained to justify them in suing in this court.

County court jurisdiction—Collision in the Thames—Admiralty cause—Damages under £50—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3, 5.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 3, county courts having admiralty jurisdiction were empowered to try (inter alia) actions for damage by collision where the amount claimed did not exceed £300.

(a.) Reported by A. H. Todd, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 5 of that Act courts appointed by Order in Council are alone to have jurisdiction in each district in any admiralty cause.

Held, that this statute did not take away from county courts not having admiralty jurisdiction the power to try actions for damages for collision between vessels where the amount claimed was under £50.

Appeal from an order of Huddleston, B., refusing to order a writ of prohibition to issue to the judge of the Southwark County Court to prohibit him from trying an action for damages done to the plaintiffs' barge in the Thames by a collision with the defendants' barge, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendants. The amount sought to be recovered was £5 15s. The grounds for the application to Huddleston, B., was that this was an admiralty action, and such a cause came within the jurisdiction of the City of London Court under an Order in Council made under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 5.

Gaskell, for the defendants.—This is an admiralty cause within the meaning of section 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71). In Reg. v. Southend County Court (Judge of), 32 W. R. 754, 13 Q. B. D. 142, the county court was held to have jurisdiction by virtue of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2. That was not an admiralty cause.

Back, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

DAY, J.—I think this appeal must be dismissed. The county court had jurisdiction to try such a case as this before the Act of 1868, and there is nothing in the Act to show that the Legislature had any intention to take away that jurisdiction.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Act of 1868 gave the county courts a new jurisdiction, and did not take away the old one which they had under the original Act of 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95). If it were necessary to resort to the remedies and powers which the Act of 1868 gave to the county court, then, no doubt, the case would come within the class of admiralty causes to deal with which special courts have been nominated in the Privy Council Order. That is not necessary in the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

HOWARTH v. BREARLEY. (a.)

Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), ss. 31, 32—Apothecaries Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 94), ss. 20, 21—Unqualified practitioner acting as assistant—Right to recover for services rendered—Registration.

A qualified medical practitioner cannot recover for the services rendered or medicine given by his unqualified and unregistered assistant at a branch establishment, the qualified practitioner not being consulted on the case in question by the unqualified man.

This was an appeal from the judge of the Hundred Court at Salford.

J. L. Fitzmaurice was a duly qualified medical practitioner, registered under the Medical Acts, and residing at Bury. His brother, A. Fitzmaurice, who was not qualified to practise medicine or surgery, nor certificated to act as an apothecary, managed a branch establishment at Elton on his behalf. A. Fitzmaurice had consulted his brother in difficult cases, but had alone rendered the services and supplied the drugs in the case in question, and had not consulted his brother in any way. All the drugs and medicines at the Elton branch were bought and paid for by J. L. Fitzmaurice. The plaintiff, as assignee of the creditors of J. L. Fitzmaurice, brought an action to recover from the defendant charges for medical attendance and services rendered to him, and for the cost of medicines and drugs supplied to him.

The judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that the Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), and the Apothecaries Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 94) barred the right to recover.

T. W. Chitty moved on behalf of the appellant.

C. A. Russell, for the respondent, was stopped by the court.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question whether the learned judge was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff depends on the relation between J. L. Fitzmaurice and his brother, A. Fitzmaurice. This relation has not been very clearly defined; they were either partners, or master and servant. Then J. L. Fitzmaurice, who is the qualified practitioner, sues for services which he has not personally rendered, but which have been rendered by his brother. J. L. Fitzmaurice gave no advice whatever in regard to, and never even saw, the defendant. If he had given advice, and his brother (the unqualified man) had been merely the ministering hand under his directing brain, I should be prepared to hold that the services were his. I think this view is consistent with common sense. Further, we have to consider an Act of Parliament the provisions of which put an end to the plaintiff's right to sue. The Act says, "no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any court of law for any medical or surgical advice, attendance, or for the performance of any operation, or for any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied unless he shall prove upon the trial that he is registered under this Act." The qualified man has brought this action, has proved that he was registered, but he sued for medical attendance which he, personally, did not render at all. None of the services sued for were rendered by the plaintiff, and therefore he cannot recover for services which were rendered, without any reference to himself, by another man who stood in an indefinite relation towards him. It is immaterial, I think, what that relation was, perhaps we may consider it as that of master and servant, and say that the master cannot recover for services with no part of which he had anything to do. I do not think that any of the cases cited are in conflict with this view. A case which is the converse of this, De la Rosa v. Prieto, 16 C. B. N. S. 578, shows strongly what the opinion of the court would have been in the present case. As to the earlier cases of Turner v. Reynall, 11 W. R. 700, 14 C. B. N. S. 32[illegible] and Haffield v. Mackenzie, 10 Ir. C. L. R. 289, if they are in conflict with the later cases I prefer to follow the latter. As a judge sitting at Nisi Prius I should always have been extremely reluctant to follow Turner v. Reynall, for it seems to me to lay down the law contrary to the intent of the Act, as is pointed out in Leman v. Houseley, 23 W. R. 235, L. R. 10 Q. B. 66. The later cases are more satisfactory than the earlier ones. For the above reasons, upon the plain words of the statute and upon the facts as found by the learned judge—viz. that the services were not rendered by the qualified man—I think that the nonsuit was right.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I need [illegible]

add more than that I concur in what my lord has said about Turner v. Reynall and Haffield v. Mackenzie. It is for the plaintiff to prove that the medical services were rendered by a duly qualified practitioner. This he has not proved. He has only shown that another person, without in any way consulting him, rendered them. The work was not done for the patient by the qualified man, and his assignee cannot recover as for work done by the servant of the qualified man. Looking at the Act, I think that a registered practitioner cannot give a roving authority to an unqualified person to practise in his name without consulting him or taking his advice and then sue for the services rendered by such person. The services rendered by A. Fitzmaurice were in no way the services of J. L. Fitzmaurice.

Solicitor's lien for costs—Action for dissolution of partnership—Bankruptcy—Transfer to Bankruptcy Court—Claim of landlord for rent—Preference—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 102—Costs.

On April 6, 1887, an order was made directing the receiver appointed in an action for dissolution of partnership, which had been transferred to the Bankruptcy Court, to pay over the balance of moneys in his hands to the solicitor in the action in respect of his costs. At this time the court was not informed that a claim had been previously made to the receiver by the landlord of the bankrupt's premises for rent due which had not been paid. The order of April 6 had not been complied with, and the receiver now applied to the court for directions.

Held, that the order of April 6 must be modified to the extent that the amount due to the landlord should be paid to him, and the remainder to the solicitor, and that the receiver, being the person responsible for the difficulty which had arisen, must be personally liable for costs.

Application by the receiver appointed in an action for dissolution of partnership for directions.

In 1886 an action for dissolution of partnership was commenced by the debtors in the Chancery Division, one Bradshaw Brown being appointed receiver in that action. In consequence of the bankruptcy of both partners the action was subsequently transferred to the Bankruptcy Court and afterwards stayed, and on April 6, 1887, an order was made that certain moneys in the hands of the receiver should be paid by him to Mr. Pullen, the solicitor in the partnership action, in respect of his costs. It was alleged, however, that on this occasion the attention of the court was not called to the fact that on March 19 a claim had been made upon the receiver by the landlord of premises occupied by the bankrupts for rent, and the order of April 6 not having been complied with application was now made by the receiver for directions The amount in the receiver's hands was £84; the claim of the landlord amounted to £49; and the solicitor's bill of costs to over £100.

H. Lynn, for the receiver.—At the motion on April 6, when the order was made for the receiver to pay over the balance in his hands to the solicitor in respect of his costs in the action, the receiver was not separately represented, and the attention of the court was not called to the fact of the landlord's notice of claim of March 19. Under the circumstances the receiver asks the court for directions.

F. C. Willis, for the landlord.—If on April 6 the court had had any knowledge that any sum was owing to the landlord for rent it would not have made the order it did, and I ask that it may be varied.

Dundas Gardiner, for the solicitor.—Any order made on April 6 must be binding on the receiver, and he had no right to disobey it. If he neglected to tell the court of the landlord's claim he must bear the loss. Further, I say that the landlord has no right as against the solicitor to the money recovered in the action. A lien is given to the solicitor, and the interest of every party is liable to pay his costs. There is a first charge to the solicitor on money recovered in the action.

Cave, J.—This is an application on the part of the receiver in an action of Suffield v. Watts for directions with regard to the payment of moneys in his hands as receiver. On April 6 application was made to me for an order that the receiver be discharged, and I made an order that the receiver pay over the balance of moneys in his hands to the solicitor in the action, it being then stated to me that the costs exceeded the amount in his hands. But it was not stated that a sum was due and owing to the landlord for rent, of which he had given notice to the receiver on March 19. Had I known that there was that claim I should not have made the order I did make. It is clear that a solicitor's lien extends only to the net proceeds recovered in an action, and he has no right to the gross proceeds. It might just as well be said that he would have the right to the gross proceeds of the sale of the stock in trade without having regard to auctioneer's charges, &c. If I had known of this claim in April, I should have made an order that the receiver should first pay the claim of the landlord, and that the balance, being the net proceeds, should be handed to the solicitor for his costs. The money has not been handed over, and the landlord applies that the rent may be paid, and I think he was quite justified in asking for it. The business was carried on in the premises in question and the rent is due. Consequently the order of April 6 must be modified to this extent, and the receiver must be ordered to pay the £49 to the landlord, and the remainder will go to the solicitor. Then with regard to the costs. The landlord clearly ought to have his costs. He gave notice to the receiver on March 19, and my attention ought to have been called to that notice. There remains, however, the solicitor and the receiver. Mr. Pullen, the solicitor, has sworn that he had not notice of this claim of the landlord, and although the receiver says that the solicitor or his clerk was informed of the receipt of the landlord's letter of March 19, his statement is not to my mind altogether satisfactory. That being so, the person who has brought about all the difficulty is the receiver, and he has brought it about simply by not stating that the claim had been made. He had money in his pocket, and I cannot see why he did not pay the landlord. So on the order of April 6 being made he kept the money in his pocket and paid neither the solicitor nor the landlord, and it is not until July 12 that he comes to the court for directions. Therefore the receiver must pay the costs of the landlord and the costs of the solicitor, and he must pay them out of his own pocket, and not out of the fund, which would not be fair on the solicitor, and he must, of course, pay his own costs.

Order accordingly.

Bankruptcy notice—"Final judgment"—Order dismissing action in Chancery Division, with costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

The plaintiff in an action in the Chancery Division claimed to be entitled to estates belonging to the defendant, but, in default of a proper statement of claim, an order was made dismissing the action for want of prosecution, with costs. A bankruptcy notice was subsequently served on the plaintiff in respect of such costs.

Held, that the order in question was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which a bankruptcy notice could be founded.

Appeal from a decision of the registrar of the county court at Newcastle dismissing a petition for a receiving order.

The case raised the question whether an order dismissing an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court with costs was a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so as to constitute the failure to comply with the terms of a bankruptcy notice founded upon such order an act of bankruptcy upon which a petition could be presented against the debtor.

An action had been commenced in the Chancery Division against the Earl of Strathmore by the debtor Riddell, who claimed to be entitled to large estates now held by the Earl in Yorkshire and Durham. The plaintiff, however, appeared unable to frame a proper statement of claim, although leave to amend was given on two or three occasions, and on the 10th of June, 1887, an order was made by North, J., ordering that the action do stand dismissed for want of prosecution, and the costs to be paid by the plaintiff. These costs were taxed at £53, and not being paid a bankruptcy notice was issued against the debtor, but the petition for a receiving order was dismissed by the county court registrar on the ground that the order in question was not a "final judgment" within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The Earl of Strathmore now appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Stephen, for the appellant.—The order put an end to the action. It had all the elements of finality and was in effect a judgment.

They referred to Ex parte Schmitz, In re Cohen, 32 W. R. 812, 12 Q. B. D. 509; Ex parte Chinery, In re Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342; Ex parte Moore, In re Faithfull, 33 W. R. 438, 14 Q. B. D. 627.

J. L. Walton, for the debtor.—The registrar was bound by the authorities, and could make no other order than he did. This order was made under ord. 27, r. 1, R. S. C., 1883, and the only jurisdiction of the court was to make an order as distinguished from a judgment. That view is confirmed by the wording of the forms in the appendix to the general rules. A distinction is recognized between a judgment and an order in an action. Where judgment is obtained the litigation is at an end, and no person can revive it. Here there is nothing to preclude the plaintiff from bringing another action on the same claim. There has been no adjudication on the litis contestatio.

Cave, J.—I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed. We have to decide whether the order made in this case, by which, in default of a statement of claim, the action was dismissed for want of prosecution, is a "final judgment" within section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I adopt the interpretation given by Lord Selborne in the case of Ex parte Moore, In re Faithfull, where he says, "To constitute an order a final judgment nothing more is necessary than that there should be a proper litis contestatio and a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits." That carries the case, I think, to the extent of saying that this order is a judgment, and if there were no such word as "final" in the section it might be that a bankruptcy notice could be founded on it. But the word "judgment" is qualified by the word "final," and Lord Selborne says, "a proper litis contestatio and a final adjudication between the parties to it on the merits." Here there has not been a final adjudication on the merits. The order is so far final that this particular order cannot be re-opened, but it is not a final adjudication of the matter between the litigants. The matter in dispute was the title to certain estates, and with regard to that it is not a final adjudication. It is open to the plaintiff Riddell, provided that he can find someone sufficiently skilful to frame for him a proper statement of claim, to bring a fresh action in which the question would have to be adjudicated upon, and when that is done in such a way as to prevent another action, there then would be a final adjudication.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion, and practically I think the case of Ex parte Schmitz, In re Cohen, is binding on us, where it was held that the fact that an order had been made against the defendant requiring him to pay the taxed costs in an action within a specified time did not constitute such order a "final judgment" within the meaning of the section.

Company—Winding up—Distress for rent—Leave of court—Attornment clause in mortgage—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 87, 163.

The L. Co. mortgaged certain cotton mills and the machinery therein to W. The deed contained a clause by which the L. Co. attorned tenants to W. at an annual rent. A winding-up order was subsequently made against the company, and the official liquidator remained in possession of the mills with a view to selling them as a going concern. He expended money in keeping up the mills and machinery, but he did not actually work them. The mortgagees, who were the executors of C., to whom W. had transferred the mortgage, acquiesced in this arrangement, believing it to be for the benefit of all parties interested.

The mortgagees applied to the court for leave to distrain for one year's rent due under the attornment clause which had accrued since the winding-up order.

Held, that such leave must be refused, as no special equity in favour of the mortgagees had been proved, and that, on the evidence, it was shown that the premises remained in the occupation of the liquidator for the joint benefit of the company and the mortgagees.

A mortgagee with an attornment clause does not stand in so favourable a position as an ordinary landlord.

In re Exhall Coal Mining Co., 13 W. R. 219, 4 De G. J. & S. 377, followed.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J., in chambers.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 28th of October, 1878, the Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co. (Limited) conveyed to R. Whittaker in fee simple certain cotton mills at Royton, in the county of Lancashire, and the warehouses and buildings held therewith, and assigned to him the machinery and fixtures therein by way of mortgage for securing the repayment of £22,000, with interest at six per cent. The indenture contained a clause by which the company attorned tenants to the mortgagee at an annual rent of £1,595.

The mortgage was transferred by Whittaker to J. Clegg. He died in June, 1885, having by his will appointed W. Carnelley and three other persons his executors.

In November, 1885, an order was made to wind up the company, and the official liquidator remained in possession of the mills with a view of selling them as a going concern. He expended money in keeping up the mills and the machinery, but he did not actually work them. The mortgagees acquiesced in this arrangement, believing it to be for the benefit of all parties interested. The mortgagees applied to North, J., in chambers for leave to distrain for one year's rent due, under the attornment clause, on the 31st of December, 1886, and he refused the application.

From this decision the mortgagees appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and W. P. Beale, for the appellants.—The appellants ought to be allowed to distrain for the rent which has accrued since the order for winding up. North, J., was of opinion that the possession by the liquidator was for the joint benefit of the company and the mortgagees, and therefore that the doctrine laid down in In re Bridgwater Engineering Co., 12 Ch. D. 181, 27 W. R. Dig. 46, applied, and that leave to distrain ought not to be given. But the evidence does not show any request by the mortgagees to the liquidator to retain possession. The principle which underlies all the cases on this point is that a liquidator after a winding up order has been made must discharge in full every obligation undertaken by him for the benefit of the estate of a company. In the present case the object of the liquidator in retaining possession after the winding up order was that he might thereby be entitled to sell the property more advantageously..

They referred to In re Oak Pits Colliery Co., 30 W. R. 759, 21 Ch. D. 322; In re Progress Assurance Co., L. R. 9. Eq. 370, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 57; In re North Yorkshire Iron Co., 26 W. Higgins, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the liquidator.—Before the court will grant a landlord leave to distrain after a winding up order has been made, he must show that there is some reason which renders it inequitable that the company should avail themselves of the fetter imposed by section 163. This the appellants have failed to do in the present case. The evidence shows that the liquidator retained possession of the premises of the company for the joint benefit of the company and the mortgagees. Besides, the case of a mortgagee with an attornment clause is not within the cases which have been cited on behalf of the appellants. Leave to distrain should therefore be refused.

They referred to the Companies Act, 1862, ss. 87, 163; In re Bridgwater Engineering Co.; In re Exhall Coal Mining Co.; In re Progress Assurance Co.; In re Oak Pits Colliery Co.; In re Lundy Granite Co.

Buckley replied.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application, by way of appeal, for liberty for the mortgagees, who have an attornment clause and claim to have the right of a landlord, to distrain unless the liquidator pays them the rent which has accrued since the commencement of the winding up. The application is very properly limited to that.

Now section 163 of the Act of 1862, if it stood by itself, and I may also say in the absence of decisions, would have been conclusive against the application, because that section, as I understand it, is clear. It is this: "Where any company is being wound up by the court or subject to the supervision of the court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents." That seems a very clear section, and that is the great difficulty, notwithstanding another section and decisions upon it in the way of the applicants.

But it has been decided that that section must be read subject to the provisions of section 87, which says that "When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company, except with the leave of the court, and subject to such terms as the court may impose." Undoubtedly Turner, L.J., in In re Exhall Coal Mining Co., said that you must read those two together, notwithstanding the precise words of section 163; and that the court had power to authorize a distress, which came within the word "proceeding" in section 87. To my mind it is doubtful whether, having regard to the express words of section 163, which says "That any distress shall be void," it was right to say that section 87 included distress among the "proceedings" which the court might allow. There are other proceedings in the nature of actions and modes of enforcing claims against the company which undoubtedly would satisfy section 87 without including in the word "proceeding" a distress, which is in terms dealt with under section 163.

But it would be wrong for us to depart from the decisions which have followed that judgment of Turner, L.J., in In re Exhall Coal Mining Co., as long ago as 1864, and, following those decisions, we have to consider what is the rule which has been laid down not inconsistent with those cases. It is this, that it lies upon the landlord who applies to put in a distress, to show that there are circumstances which justify the court in depriving the company and the creditors of the company of the benefit of the express provision of section 163.

The question, therefore, is whether that has been done in the present case. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that a good many of the cases on these two sections, and on applications like this, have not dealt with the matter as directly as they might have done. In one authority which has been referred to, In re Lundy Granite Co., the question really did not arise, and it was only some general observations of James, L.J.—which, with all respect, were not applicable to the case before him—which are relied on as laying down what the doctrine is. We have had cases cited where retaining possession as against the landlord was for the benefit of the company, and in those cases the court has allowed the landlord to exercise his right of distress. Then there have been cases when it has been for the joint benefit, and there it has been said that the landlord cannot, under those circumstances, exercise his right of distress. There are other cases probably where it has been held that the working, or the possession, being beneficial for the winding up of the company, the rent has been considered as part of the expenses of winding up. What principle are we to say underlies these cases? In my opinion, the landlord coming to ask the court to exercise the power which, according to the decisions, has been given by section 87, must show one of two things, either that it is inequitable for the company or its liquidator to insist on section 163—that there is some special equity which entitles the landlord to ask the court to relieve him of the burden of section 163; or that it is a case in which the court will allow distress to be put in so as to recover the rent, which ought to be paid as one of the expenses of winding up. But the matter must be brought within one or the other of those heads in order to justify the court in disregarding the express provisions of section 163, which in terms are clear.

Now what is there here? The judge below decided this case on the ground that what had been done had been done for the joint benefit of the company and the mortgagees. I in no way differ from him, and I think probably he was right in coming to that conclusion. It is very true that the liquidator delayed selling in order to get a better price, and in the hope that he would get something after paying the mortgagees. That looks as if the delay in selling was for the benefit, not of the mortgagees in any way coming here as landlords, but for the benefit of the company. But we must remember what the position of the mortgagees was. They were executors, and were very largely interested in this company, one of them in his own right, and all of them in respect of shares which had belonged to the testator. They were anxious to get up a new company, and one of the objects of postponing the sale was to do what was necessary in order to start a new company in which one of the executors was to take a very large share. So that the mortgagees delayed to exercise their power of sale as mortgagees in order to enable that to take place which was for the benefit, not only of the company, but of themselves, who were interested in the company. I do not think the judge was wrong in the conclusion which he arrived at, and it cannot, in my opinion, be considered as in any way inequitable for the company, on behalf of its creditors, to insist on the provisions of section 163; and, in my opinion, there is nothing which would justify us in dealing with the interest payable to the mortgagees as part of the expenses of winding up this company when that interest accrued under the circumstances to which I have referred.

I have dealt with this case as if it were the case of a landlord coming here in respect of rent due to him for the enjoyment of the land by the company; but I cannot think that the mortgagee stands in as good a position as a landlord would. If a landlord were minded to take possession, and could do so, he would be free to deal with the property as he might think fit. But a mortgagee would stand in a different position. If he takes possession he puts himself into that very awkward position of being mortgagee in possession subject to accounts, and also with the liability of taking charge of the machinery and spending a considerable sum for the purpose of protecting it. I cannot think that here, if the mortgagees had not assented to what was done, they would have taken possession, and I doubt whether it would be right to allow rent to be paid, or to allow distress to be put in for rent, when the effect of the payment of the rent would be, not to prevent the mortgagee from taking possession, but to prevent him from exercising an entirely different right—namely, the right of selling. It is not necessary in the present case to decide that, but I must express my opinion that a mortgagee who has this attornment clause, and asks for liberty to distrain under it, does not come in as favourable a way as a landlord whose right would be to take the land and deal with it as he thought fit, whether he exercises his power of taking possession or receives possession of it from the liquidator. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In dealing with the cases on this subject, which are numerous and not altogether consistent, the cardinal point is not to lose sight of the provisions nor of the object of the Act of Parliament. The court certainly did, in 1864, shortly after this Act passed, put a construction on section 87 which I think was a little forced; notwithstanding the peremptory words of section 163, that no distress or execution shall be levied against the assets of the company, the court held that section 87 gave the court a power to allow such execution and distress to issue. I think that construction was rather forced; but I accept it. It has now been followed so often that the construction of the two sections which Turner, L.J., was the first to put on them must now be adopted; nevertheless we must fall back on the section and see on what grounds a person who asks to be allowed to issue a distress or execution can escape from the peremptory provision contained in section 163. That there are circumstances which may entitle him to do so is conceded, having regard to the construction which has been put on the section; but the burden is always on him who wishes to issue execution to show why he should be entitled to do it. This rule has not been lost sight of in modern cases, even if it was a little at first. Now what are the grounds on which these mortgagees rely for liberty to do that which is forbidden? Have they been induced to do anything by the liquidator which renders it inequitable on the part of the company, through him, to protect themselves, or to protect the creditors, it being a creditors' question more than a shareholders' question, by insisting on the application of section 163? Has anything happened which renders it unjust to give effect to that section? If there is, I conceive, upon authority and upon principle, that that section would not apply. I cannot see anything here which approaches such a case as that. I cannot say that anything has been said or done, or omitted to be done, by the liquidator to alter the rights of the parties. It is said by Mr. Buckley that the liquidator has bought delay and must pay for it. But I am satisfied from the evidence that the mortgagees waited as much for their own benefit as for the benefit of the liquidator. They were interested in getting up this new company, and it was for their advantage that the liquidator should do his best, and have reasonable time to do it; and I cannot think, under those circumstances, that there is the slightest ground for saying there has been anything which renders it unjust on the part of the company to claim the benefit of section 163.

The only other ground which the mortgagees could suggest was that this rent ought to be paid as part of the costs of the winding up. That is another ground altogether. If the liquidator, on behalf of the company, continues to carry on the business of the company, all charges, costs, and expenses properly incurred must be paid, notwithstanding section 163, which really has nothing to do with a question of that kind. But I do not think this case is brought within that principle; I agree with the reasons given by Cotton, L.J. It appears to me that the whole of the delay has been quite as much in the interests of the mortgagees as in the interests of the company. I think the decision of North, J., was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The difficulty seems to arise very much from the construction that was put twenty-three years ago upon section 87. Section 163 is precise that any distress put in shall be void. Section 87, which is a distinct section, says that "no suit, action, or other proceeding, shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company, except with the leave of the court, and subject to such terms as the court may impose." Now if it stood alone, apart from decisions, I should have the greatest possible difficulty in seeing how a distress could be a proceeding under section 87. The language would lead one to a different conclusion, and the fact that distress is forbidden by section 163 would drive one still further. But the opposite view has been taken by the courts, and it would be, not only wrong, but I think it would be a monstrous disregard of authorities of the past if we were to try to be wiser than the courts have been for twenty-three years. We must, therefore, do the best we can to harmonize these two sections, difficult as it is, for me in particular, and I think for the other members of the court to do it. It seems to me the true principle to be applied is that which Mr. Chadwyck Healey has urged on us, that it must rest on the landlord to show why he should escape the fetters of section 163, and should be afforded that leave which we will assume, in accordance with the decisions, can be granted to him in proper cases under section 87. I do not see how, in reason, there can be any except two principles upon which such leave can be granted to escape from the fetter imposed by statute. It seems to me the first inquiry must be whether anything has happened since the winding up which renders it inequitable that the company in possession should be allowed to shelter itself against distress by virtue of the statute; or, if that inquiry results in a negative answer, and there is nothing to show that it is inequitable that the company should be sheltered by section 163. The next inquiry must be, has anything happened which renders the rent in respect of distress properly chargeable among the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding up. If so, the rent ought to be paid, and it may well be that the court ought to allow the landlord to distrain as one of the natural means of obtaining his rent.

In applying these two principles the court have dealt in many instances, which it is not necessary to review, with the case where the occupation was retained by the liquidator after the winding up for the benefit of the company, or for the joint benefit of the landlord and the company, in such a way as to create what I think Hall, V.C., called a sort of mixed occupation. Those two cases seem to me to be applications of one or other of the two principles which I have mentioned, and it is true that in applying them the courts have not always put on paper the two principles and applied them eo nomine. But whenever there has been a decision upon that class of case, the decision can only be justified and rendered intelligible by referring to one or other of those two principles. Dealing with the present case, and taking these two principles seriatim, we have first to see whether there is anything here which renders it inequitable that the company should be allowed to shelter itself against distress by section 163. I cannot see that the landlord's case has been altered for the worse by anything that has been done. It seems to me the judge below was right in thinking it was for the mutual benefit of the company and the landlord that time should be given to the company, and I do not think that the time can be said to have been purchased, as Mr. Buckley puts it. I think it was a concession of time for mutual convenience, and that it was no part of the terms by which that time should be purchased that rent should be payable and distress put in. There was an attempt being made to form a company.

If that is so as to the first principle, I think it also follows that the second principle does not apply, and that the rent cannot be considered as one of the expenses of the winding up, and that for that reason the distress ought to be enforced. It also seems to me that what Cotton, L.J., has said deserves the greatest attention, though it is not necessary to discuss it further—namely, that it does not follow that a mortgagee is in the same position as a landlord. I think that, as soon as you arrive at the two principles which the Lord Justices and I have endeavoured to expound, the decision in every case becomes a question of fact whether the circumstances of the case justify the application of the principle in favour of the landlord or in favour of the company; and the decisions with regard to benefit or mixed benefit appear to be decisions in the nature of mixed law and fact as to the application of the two principles I have named.

Reichel v. Bishop of Oxford.

Ecclesiastical law—Resignation of benefice—Revocation before acceptance—Resignation on condition.

A deed of resignation of a benefice executed and sent to the bishop is valid though not made before a notary public, the bishop having power to dispense with that formality.

A resignation sent at the bishop's request is valid without any formal acceptance by the bishop.

The bishop may fix a future time for the acceptance and operation of a resignation without transgressing the rule that a resignation, except in the case of an exchange, must be made purè, spontè, absolutè, et simpliciter.

A resignation made at the request of the bishop to avoid scandal is valid.

A resignation accepted by the bishop, but postponed by him so as to enable the clerk to receive the next payment of tithe rent-charge, is not invalid as simoniacal.

In 1885 the plaintiff, who had been vicar of Sparsholt-cum-Kingston-Lisle, Berkshire, in the diocese of Oxford, since 1870 was publicly charged with immoral conduct, and in consequence of the scandal the bishop called upon him to take proceedings to clear his character. Accordingly, at the Reading Easter Assizes in 1886, he indicted the person who had made the charges, but failed to obtain a conviction. The bishop then suggested to the plaintiff that he should resign his benefice a once, and after some correspondence Mr. Wellings, rural dean, wrote on the 26th of May, 1886, at the instance of the bishop, that if the plaintiff would place his formal resignation in the hands of the bishop, acceptance of it would not be signed till a date to be agreed upon, and that the plaintiff would be allowed to absent himself from his parish during the interval. On the 28th of May the plaintiff replied:—

"My dear Lord Bishop,—I desire herewith to place in your hands my resignation of this benefice of Sparsholt-cum-Kingston-Lisle, conformably with your lordship's wish, and at the same time I gratefully accept your kind proposal to postpone acceptance of my resignation until a date to be agreed upon, your lordship meantime permitting me to be absent."

This letter was on the 31st of May, with the bishop's authority, replied to by Mr. T. M. Davenport, his secretary, and deputy-registrar of the diocese, in the following words:—

"Sir,—The Bishop of Oxford desires me to send you a deed of resignation, and to inform you that his lordship proposes to date his formal acceptance of it on the 1st October next, and not to declare your benefice vacant until that date, if the deed is at once executed by you and submitted to me, and if his lordship also receives in the meantime an assurance of satisfactory arrangements for the cure and duties of the parish during your absence. The deed requires to be executed by you before two witnesses, and if you are unable to obtain the attestation of a notary public in London it may be remitted to me attested by two persons."

It appeared that the 1st of October was named so that the plaintiff might not be deprived of the tithe rent-charge. With that letter Mr. Davenport sent the following printed form of resignation with the names added in writing:—

"In the name of God, Amen. Before you a notary public and credible witnesses here present, I, the Rev. Oswald Joseph Reichel, vicar of Sparsholt with Kingston Lisle, in the county of Berks and diocese of Oxford, for certain just and lawful causes me thereunto especially moving, without compulsion, fraud, or deceit, do purely, simply, and absolutely resign and give up my said vicarage and parish church of Sparsholt with Kingston Lisle, with all their rights, members, and appurtenances into the hands of the Right Rev. Father in God, John Fielder, by Divine permission Lord Bishop of Oxford, or to any other whomsoever having or that shall have power to admit this my resignation. And I totally renounce my right, title, and possession of, in, and to the same vicarage and church, with all their rights, members, and appurtenances heretofore had and hitherto belonging to me, and quit them and expressly recede from them by these presents. And that this my resignation may have its full effect I do hereby nominate and appoint Thomas Marriott Davenport, of the city of Oxford, notary public, my proctor or substitute, to exhibit this my resignation to the said Right Rev. Father, and in my name to pray that his lordship would graciously vouchsafe to accept thereof, and to pronounce, decree, and declare the vicarage and church of Sparsholt with Kingston Lisle aforesaid void and to be void of my person to all intents of law that may follow thereupon, and to decree, if requisite, that intimation of the said avoidance may be issued to the patron thereof."

This instrument was dated the 2nd of June, 1886, and was executed by the plaintiff, and was, with the attestation thereto of two witnesses (neither of whom was a notary public), forwarded by him to Mr. Davenport from Weymouth on the 2nd of June with the following letter:—

"Sir,—I have executed the enclosed resignation on the understanding that the bishop will postpone acceptance thereof until 1st October next. If you cannot dispense with my appearing before a notary public I will endeavour so to do. Unfortunately both of them in this place happen to be absent at this moment."

On receiving the deed Mr. Davenport signed the memorandum of surrender on it after striking out the statement that the plaintiff had personally appeared before him. The bishop signed the memorandum of acceptance and returned the document to Mr. Davenport, who shortly afterwards had it stamped. The stamps bore the date 26th July, 1886.

Meanwhile the plaintiff had, on the 16th of July, delivered to Mr. Davenport a formal withdrawal of resignation and two letters of that date to Mr. Davenport and to the bishop stating that he had cancelled and revoked his resignation and his appointment of Mr. Davenport as his proctor and permission to exhibit the resignation to the bishop.

The withdrawal of resignation, dated the 10th of June, 1886, and witnessed in the same manner as the resignation, ran thus:—

Whereas I, Oswald Joseph Reichel, vicar of Sparsholt with Kingston Lisle, in the county of Berks and diocese of Oxford, have executed a certain instrument, dated the 2nd day of June, 1886, purporting to be a resignation of my said benefice, and therein purporting to appoint Thomas Marriott Davenport my proctor for the purpose of exhibiting the same to the Lord Bishop of Oxford. And, whereas the said instrument has not been executed by me voluntarily, freely, and unconditionally, but under pressure and by the request and desire of the said Lord Bishop, and conditional upon its not being accepted before the 1st day of October, 1886, and without legal advice. And whereas I have not appeared personally before a notary public for the purpose of appointing the said Thomas Marriott Davenport to act as my proctor in the matter of my said pretended resignation. And whereas I am now advised that the said instrument is null and void, and of no force whatever to affect the resignation of my benefice, not having been made freely, and voluntarily, and unconditionally, and that the pretended appointment of the said Thomas Marriott Davenport is also of no force or validity, not having been made by me personally before a notary public. Now I, the said Oswald Joseph Reichel, hereby cancel and revoke the said instrument and pretended resignation of my said benefice of Sparsholt with Kingston Lisle, declaring it to be my intention not to resign my said benefice, and I also annul and cancel the pretended appointment of the said Thomas Marriott Davenport to act as my proctor, hereby withdrawing from him all authority to act as such, and strictly forbidding him from acting as such proctor, and from exhibiting to the said bishop my said pretended resignation, or otherwise taking action in the matter on my behalf.

After some further correspondence the plaintiff commenced his action for a declaration that he was still vicar of Sparsholt. The Provost and Scholars of Queen's College, Oxford, the patrons of the living, having been added as defendants, the action was tried on the 13th of December, 1886. The college did not appear, desiring to remain neutral in the proceedings.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 12.—COTTON, L.J.—This action was instituted for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that the plaintiff is still vicar of Sparsholt-cum-Kingston-Lisle, and to have an instrument of resignation which he executed, dated the 2nd of June, 1886, declared null and void; that it should be cancelled, and that an injunction should be granted to restrain the defendant, the bishop, from in any way acting upon or treating the resignation as valid, from declaring the benefice vacant, and from instituting another person.

In May, 1886, the plaintiff was undoubtedly vicar of Sparsholt; but before that time—namely, in 1885—a charge, seriously affecting his character and position in the parish, had been made openly against him by a woman. He took criminal proceedings against her for the purpose of vindicating his character, but those proceedings entirely failed. In one case the woman was acquitted, and in the other case the indictment was withdrawn. Thereupon the bishop, feeling that the plaintiff's position in the parish was such that it was not advisable that he should continue to hold the benefice, wrote to him, and a correspondence took place between him and the bishop, and the most material letters are those of the 26th and 28th of May, 1887. The letter of the 26th of May was not written by the bishop, but by a clergyman acting by his authority. The plaintiff's letter says he places in the hands of the bishop his resignation, but that, of course, was without having complied with the usual formalities; and very shortly afterwards, Mr. Davenport, the secretary of the bishop, sent the plaintiff a deed of resignation, to be executed by him and to be sent on to the bishop. Stopping there, I do not consider that there was any contract or bargain between the bishop and the plaintiff; but I do understand from the letters that there was a sort of intimation by the bishop that it would be necessary for him to take proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court in consequence of the charge which had been brought against the plaintiff unless he prevented any further scandal in the parish by resigning. Then, as I understand, there was an intimation by the bishop, at the instance of the plaintiff, that he would not act on the resignation, if put into his hands, by immediately declaring that the benefice was void, but would allow the plaintiff still to continue in his position of vicar of Sparsholt till the 1st of October, though as from that time he would act on the resignation by declaring the benefice void.

The deed which was sent to the plaintiff by Mr. Davenport was, to a great extent, in the ordinary form. It was a printed form, slightly varied. It was signed, sealed, and delivered by the plaintiff on the 2nd of June, and was sent by him to Mr. Davenport. Mr. Davenport immediately sent it on to the bishop, who received it on the 3rd of June. I will consider the objections that have been raised to the deed both as to form and substance.

The first question which I shall consider is, Was there, as regards the act to be done by the plaintiff, an effectual resignation of this benefice? The deed was signed by him. But he says in his evidence that neither by him nor by the bishop was it ever intended that the instrument should be a deed effectual for the resignation of the benefice — that it should be put into the bishop's hands as something which he might show, but not really to be acted on by him. That is directly contrary to all the correspondence which took place between the plaintiff and the bishop, or those who were acting for the bishop, before the deed was executed. It is obvious that the bishop, in declining to grant an interview to Mr. Reichel, and saying that it was necessary he should resign, intended to have an actual resignation of the benefice from Mr. Reichel; and, although Mr. Reichel does—and I regret it—swear that it was never intended by him, or by the bishop, that the deed should be anything but form, the bishop states that that was not his intention, but that he always intended that it should be an actual resignation. With those remarks I leave that point.

But was the deed itself good and effectual as a resignation on the part of the plaintiff? The great objection urged to this deed, as regards the mere deed, was that it had not been executed before a notary public. But why was it not so executed? It was, as originally framed, intended, undoubtedly, to be executed before a notary public; but Mr. Davenport, thinking that it might be difficult for the plaintiff to execute the deed before a notary public, told him that if he had such a difficulty he need not execute it before a notary public. Therefore, it was for the convenience of the plaintiff that the officer of the bishop intimated to him that the formality of executing this deed before a notary public would not be insisted on by the bishop. If we were to hold this objection good, it would come to this, that because this ordinary formality was, for the convenience of the plaintiff, and with the assent of the bishop, not insisted upon, the plaintiff could afterwards take advantage of that concession made to him by the bishop and his advisers, and say that that deed, signed as his solemn deed of resignation, was to be considered as null and void. Unless there is some positive law—some statute, or something equivalent to it—requiring us to come to such a conclusion, I shall be unable to do so. Does the canon law require us so to decide? In my opinion no authorities have been referred to or quoted (and every possible authority was quoted to us for the appellant) which force us to come to that conclusion. The passage most relied on, and which seemed most like an authority that the resignation to be effectual must be by a deed executed before a notary public, was a passage from Gibson's Codex (2nd ed. 1761, p. 822) about resignation. But what is he there considering? He is considering the question whether, as some suppose, there could be a resignation by an attorney or proxy; and dealing with that he says: "I take it (in practice) there is no way of resigning, but either to do it by personal appearance before the ordinary, or, at least, to do it elsewhere before a public notary, by an instrument directed immediately to the ordinary and attested by the said notary, in order to be presented to the ordinary by such proper hand as may pray his acceptance." It is not said there that a deed really and in fact executed by the clerk desiring to resign, if not executed before a notary public, is to be regarded as null and void where there is no question at all whether in fact he did execute it. In my opinion, this formality of execution before a notary public was a formality to protect the bishop—to prevent him from accepting as a deed of resignation that which was in fact never executed by the clerk who was supposed to be desirous of resigning his benefice—and if the bishop is satisfied aliunde that the instrument is that of the clerk and is willing to waive that formality, no objection can be taken to the effect or validity of the deed on the ground that a formality for the protection of the bishop was not adopted. In my opinion, that objection entirely fails.

The next question was, whether this deed of resignation was effectually revoked or recalled by the plaintiff? It appears that on the 10th of June the plaintiff did execute a deed revoking the prior deed of resignation which he had executed, and he did not notify that to the bishop or Mr. Davenport, the secretary of the bishop, till the 16th of July. The deed of resignation had given a mandate to Mr. Davenport to present this deed to the bishop, and it was contended, on behalf of the appellant, that Mr. Davenport had no business to present the deed to the bishop till the 1st of October; that this deed of revocation was made before the mandate or authority given to Mr. Davenport was at an end, and that he could not further deal with the deed of resignation. In fact, Mr. Davenport had acted on the authority, given him in absolute terms by the deed without any restriction of time, by sending the deed to the bishop, so that the bishop ceived it on the 3rd of June; and, in my opinion, Mr. Davenport was fully justified in so doing. All that the bishop promised was, that he would not sign the formal acceptance of the resignation till the 1st of October; but, according to the evidence, there is no restriction on the authority given to Mr. Davenport so as to make it wrong for him, as soon as he received the deed, to send it on to the bishop, whatever the consequence may be. Then it was said—and this was the principal argument—that a deed of resignation of his benefice by a clerk may be revoked at any time before acceptance. Before I consider the actual terms in which that objection was taken I will deal with the question, which really is one of substance, as to the act of the clerk and the act of the bishop with regard to resignation.

Undoubtedly no resignation is effectual until it has been assented to—approved—by the bishop. And why is this? The clerk has received the benefice from the bishop, the bishop has intrusted him with the cure of the souls in the parish, and it would be wrong, and contrary to principle, to allow a clerk who had received that charge from the bishop to give up his charge without the sanction of the bishop to his so doing. It is a case of a subordinate discharging himself, without the assent of his superior, from duties which the superior has committed to him. Till the bishop or the ordinary, whichever he may be, has assented, and in that sense accepted the resignation, the resignation may be a nullity; and till it is assented to by the bishop it is not effectual. That is really what is meant—one clearly sees the distinction in a passage from Lyndwood quoted by Gibson in the chapter I have already referred to (p. 823). Lyndwood lays down that, although where there is a cure of souls the resignation cannot be effectual without the assent of the ordinary, yet where the resignation is of a sinecure the deed of resignation will itself avoid the sinecure, because nobody is prejudiced except the person who resigns. But he says—and I shall have to refer to the words on another part of the case—that where there is a cure of souls there is necessity then for the ratihabitio episcopi, that is, the assent of the bishop. That is the obvious substance of the matter; where that which is resigned involves a cure of souls committed to the clerk by the bishop, the clerk cannot give up that cure without the assent of the bishop. But then the appellant's counsel urged that there was a revocation before there was any acceptance; that the bishop had said he would not sign the formal acceptance till the 1st of October; that such signature was the acceptance; and that the revocation was long before that time. A great many passages from canonical authors were referred to for the purpose of enforcing this argument, and in particular a passage from Gibson in which are the words "until the acceptance of the bishop." But what is really meant by the authorities which were referred to? I will take John the Devout, one of the authorities quoted, because there it is stated that there is locus pœnitentiæ up to a certain point, but that when facta et probata resignatio there is no locus pœnitentiæ. Facta means where the clerk has executed the deed of resignation; probata where the bishop has approved of it. So up to the time when the clerk has executed the instrument of resignation or come in person to express his intention to resign, there is still time for revocation; but when the bishop has approved, probata, there is no longer an opportunity for revocation. Then, in another passage, there is the expression admissio of the bishop. And it was argued that that meant acceptance. But admissio is not acceptance in the sense of signing the formal instrument which was signed by the bishop, I looked at one of the best lexicons, and I found that admissio had the meaning of "grant or permission, or approval." So that, in my opinion, all that is meant is that there is no room for revocation when the bishop has either approved or admitted in the sense of admissio. As long as the resignation has not become binding by the assent of the bishop or ordinary, so long can there be a revocation of the complete act; but as soon as the resignation is complete by the assent of the bishop, then there is no locus pœnitentiæ; there is no power to recall. In my opinion, there was no power, on the 16th of July, for the plaintiff to recall his resignation if, previously to that time, there had been an assent or approval of the bishop to his resignation.

Now one must consider here—and this point was very much argued—whether any form of assent on the part of the bishop is necessary. I use the word "assent," not "acceptance," because the latter is a word the doubtful meaning of which has given rise to great difficulty. I cannot find that any form is required. It could not be intended that any form should be required when a clerk came in person to the bishop and said, "I wish to resign." The bishop says, "I assent to that," and that is all. But it is said that, when the resignation is by deed and not by a clerk in person, signature at least must be necessary; and reliance was placed on the decree of the 4th Lateran Council, which gave certain directions as to the judicial act of the bishop being reduced into writing. I doubt very much whether the acceptance by a bishop of the resignation of a clerk can be properly called a judicial act. In one sense it is a judicial act; because, when the resignation is presented to the bishop, he must consider, not arbitrarily, but reasonably, whether the resignation is for good ground, whether he is willing to receive it. He may think for some reason or other that it is not proper for him to accept the resignation. It may be made for simoniacal or other reasons, and then it is his duty, if he knows that, to refuse to accept it. In that way it is a judicial act. It is an act in respect of which he is to exercise a judicial discretion. The case of Gray v. Hesketh was referred to. When that case was in the King's Bench, Ryder, C.J., is reported to have said: "The ordinary is a judicial officer, and is intrusted with a judicial power to accept or refuse resignations as he shall think proper": Phill. Eccl. Law, p. 1121. That, in my opinion, means that he has a discretion to be exercised judicially, not arbitrarily, but with a due regard to all the circumstances of the case.

In Heyes v. Exeter College, Oxford, 12 Ves., at p. 345, there is an expression which strongly confirms my view, because Lord Erskine, C., is there reported to have said:—"The only doubt arises upon this, that having made the resignation before a notary duly qualified to receive it, the defendant did not leave it to him, nor did he mean himself to carry it to the bishop, but he constitutes two other notaries to signify it to the bishop. I found, however, upon conversing with a person of great eminence in the Ecclesiastical Court, that this act of the bishop is considered, not a judicial, but a domestic act, the law confiding to him that he will not permit resignation for improper purposes." If this is not to be considered a judicial act, that passage in the decree of the 4th Lateran Council, in my opinion, has no application to this case, and anyhow ought not to bind us to hold that any particular form of assent is necessary; for what the decree is dealing with is the question, what is, in ordinary circumstances, the proper form to be adopted by the ordinary in conducting his judicial proceedings? But the fact that any proceedings of the kind have been omitted would be a mere impropriety, an irregularity, not vitiating the act if otherwise effectually done. Moreover, I have heard nothing to satisfy me that the particular decree referred to has ever been adopted and acted upon in England as binding on the courts, or as part of the law of the land. Then it was urged that Heyes v. Exeter College, Oxford, did lay down that at least the signature of the bishop was necessary in order to show his assent. In my opinion it does nothing of the kind. In that case, as in this, there was the signature of the bishop to a formal document of acceptance, which also declared the benefice to be void, and when that was proved to be his signature, and that it was given at a particular time, that decided the question whether the clerk had been presented by Exeter College to the living to which he could not have been presented if he had held any other benefice at the time, and settled the question that the benefice had become void. But it is in no way laid down in that case that signature is necessary; though when it was shown there was a signature to a formal acceptance, the question whether the bishop had assented was, of course, at an end.

Before I leave this part of the case I ought to refer to the Constitution of Othobon (1 Phill. Eccl. Law, p. 510), which was pressed upon us both in the opening and in the reply. That, in my opinion, is entirely inapplicable to the present case. It deals merely with the evidence which was required to be presented to a bishop in order to show that the benefice was void before the patron could present, before the bishop could institute a clerk, and does not in any way deal with the particular formalities required as to the assent of the bishop to a resignation. Mr. Young, in reply, showed that this would have a bearing on the bishop instituting another clerk; but here, if judicial declaration be required, we have a declaration by the bishop that on the 1st of October the benefice was avoided by the resignation of the present plaintiff. Mr. Young, however, contended that, as the deed of resignation was executed in the diocese of Salisbury, therefore the declaration of the Bishop of Salisbury, and not that of the Bishop of Oxford, would be necessary in order to enable Queen's College to present, or the bishop to introduce a new clerk as on the avoidance of the living. But the whole argument on the part of the appellant was that the same deed was ineffectual till assented to by the bishop. But I think it became effectual by the assent of the bishop, and that the resignation was in the diocese of Oxford and not Salisbury.

I have also come to the conclusion that no particular form of assent is necessary. Was there an assent by the bishop before the 16th of July? In my opinion, if the assent does not require any special form, there can be no doubt in the present case that there was perfect assent on the part of the bishop to the plaintiff's resignation when he, without objection, received the deed of resignation on the 3rd of June. Before the 3rd of June, at the bishop's suggestion, assented to by the plaintiff, the deed of resignation had been executed by the plaintiff. When that deed of resignation was received by the bishop without objection, it being sent in at his suggestion, yielded to by the clerk, in my opinion the bishop fully expressed his assent to the resignation of the plaintiff.

Then there was another objection which I must deal with before I leave this part of the case. Undoubtedly, the bishop did not then declare the benefice to be void; and he refrained from doing so out of kindness to the plaintiff. The plaintiff's counsel say that in all the authorities the time when the power of revocation is at an end is the time when the benefice becomes avoided, and, therefore, that, until that time, the power of revocation continues, and that here the bishop, according to his promise, did not attempt to avoid the benefice till the 1st of October. I will deal presently with the question whether the act of the bishop in that respect was good; but, in my opinion, the authorities do not support the contention that the power of revocation continued till the 1st of October in this case. The authorities referred to deal with the case of a resignation to be acted on at once by the bishop by declaring the benefice to be at once and from that time vacant, and, therefore, they do say that when the bishop's assent has been given to the resignation the benefice is void, and the locus pœnitentiæ is gone. But it is the assent of the bishop, and not the avoidance of the living, which puts an end to the power of recalling the resignation. In my opinion, therefore, as far as we have gone, the objections do not prevail. There was a good deed of resignation, there was no power of revocation, and the resignation was assented to by the bishop.

But I must deal with the other objections raised, which are of a more serious and substantial character It is said that, under the circumstances of this case, the resignation and the assent of the bishop were void. The ground of that contention, as I understand it, was that the instrument of resignation sent in by the plaintiff was subject to a condition—namely, that contained in the promise of the bishop that the benefice should not be declared void till the 1st of October—and it was said that made the resignation entirely void. Undoubtedly in one sense that may be called a condition; and, undoubtedly, it is English law that a resignation must not be subject to condition, except certainly, in one instance, where it is for the purpose of an exchange of livings. But, in my opinion, this is not a condition which is touched by the rule of law that resignation must not be subject to condition. The rule means that a resignation must not be subject to anything which will render it, on the happening or non-happening of any event, null and void. But here there was no condition in that sense. Here there was merely a postponement, not by bargain of the bishop, but by his kind intimation of what he would do—a postponement of the effect of the resignation. It was a suspension of the avoidance in consequence of the resignation made by the clerk, and accepted by him; and, in my opinion, that in no way affects the resignation, nor does it make what took place between the bishop and the plaintiff liable to any of the objections which have been raised.

The case was said to be like that of a contract to resign, which is bad. In my opinion, that is not so. The resignation was put into the hands of the bishop, but the bishop simply said he was willing not to declare the benefice void till a future period. That was an arrangement, if you like to call it so, but it was not a contract. By the statute 31 Eliz. c. 6, there can be no bargain about a resignation, and not simply no bargain, but no corrupt bargain. Section 7 provides that, "if any incumbent of any benefice with cure of souls, after the end of the said forty days, do or shall corruptly resign or exchange the same, or corruptly take for, or in respect of, the resigning or exchanging of the same, directly or indirectly, any pension or sum of money," then "as well the giver as the taker of any such pension, sum of money, or other benefit corruptly, shall lose double the value of the sum so given, taken, or had." It is impossible to suggest that what was done by the bishop out of kindness to the plaintiff was in any way corrupt. He thought it necessary for the parish, and those committed to the care of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff should resign his benefice; but there was no corruption. What was done was done quite honestly, without any intention of providing any benefit to the bishop. It was done simply to allow this plaintiff, for various reasons, to continue up to the 1st of October, he promising to absent himself in the meantime. But could the avoidance be declared by the bishop in this way? In my opinion it could. It is curious that, although the Incumbents' Resignation Act (34 & 35 Vict. c. 44) does not expressly give, or purport to give, any power to the bishop to make a resignation to take effect at a future time effectual by making the benefice void, a form is given in schedule B. of a declaration by the bishop accepting the resignation and declaring the benefice void on and after a certain day. And in the 9th section of the Act there are these words:—"If the patron shall have declared his assent, or have not refused it as aforesaid, or if the archbishop shall decide that the resignation shall be accepted, the bishop shall cause a declaration as in schedule B. to be prepared, inserting therein the amount of pension so allowed out of the revenues," "and the day, not being less than one month after the date of the declaration, when the incumbency shall be void." So that it is there recognized that the bishop can make the avoidance take place from a day after the time when the resignation is made—after the day when he has declared his acceptance.

It would be difficult to come to the conclusion—even if there were more authorities, or any authorities, in favour of the appellant (for I do not think there are any)—when an Act of Parliament is framed in that way, that it would be wrong or invalid on the part of the bishop to suspend for a time the effect of a resignation or to declare that the benefice was void as from a future day. In my opinion there is nothing wrong in it. This court, in making orders, often directs them not to be drawn up for a particular time. That is suspending an order, which has its effect as from the time it is pronounced. Such a power might be exercised corruptly if one could suppose that a bishop could do such a thing. An arrangement as to suspending the operation or suspending the time from which the benefice was to be void might be come to improperly; but in this case there is not the slightest ground for contending that such was the case.

There is only one other point to which I need refer. It was suggested, during the course of the argument, that the intention of the bishop to accept the resignation, so as to avoid the public scandal of taking proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court against the plaintiff, was contrary to law and public policy. In my opinion it was not. The resignation would have the same effect as the highest penalty which the Ecclesiastical Court could have imposed, and, in my opinion, it cannot in any way be said to be contrary to public policy if the offending clerk is removed from the cure of souls to avoid the public disclosure of the act in reference to which the bishop thinks it right that he shall be removed. In my opinion all these objections to the deed of resignation fail, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Before proceeding to notice the various points of law raised by the appellant, it will be convenient to allude to one or two questions of fact. The correspondence warrants the inference, and I infer that there was an understanding, although no express promise, that if the plaintiff resigned no proceedings against him should be taken by the bishop. The correspondence also shows that it was agreed between the plaintiff and the bishop that the plaintiff's resignation should not be accepted so as to avoid the living before the 1st of October, 1886. The legal consequence of this will be examined hereafter. It was further arranged that the plaintiff should have leave of absence until the 1st of October, and, although no formal leave of absence was asked or given, the plaintiff, in fact, left the parish on the faith of this arrangement. It is perfectly clear from the correspondence in May that the plaintiff sent in his resignation at the request of the bishop in order that further scandal and hostile proceedings against the plaintiff might be avoided. It is also plain that the resignation required by the bishop was one on which he could act on the 1st of October, and that a resignation which might be revoked by the plaintiff before that date would have been useless for the purpose for which alone it was required.

The plaintiff has sworn that he never intended to resign absolutely and finally without retaining the power of revoking his resignation before the time fixed for its acceptance, and he appeals to his execution of a deed of revocation and to his going before a notary (10th and 11th of June) in proof of this contention. I have read this part of the plaintiff's evidence with pain, for even if when he sent in his resignation he did not intend it to be final and absolute (which I cannot bring myself to believe), it is clear that no hint of any such understanding was conveyed to the bishop. In dealings between man and man unexpressed beliefs, meanings, or intentions can only be regarded (if at all) when they are consistent with good faith and with the expressed intentions and objects of both parties, and it would, in my judgment, be contrary to sound legal principles to give effect to the plaintiff's belief or understanding that he was to be at liberty to revoke his resignation before the 1st of October, even if his evidence on this point could be believed. The plaintiff has also deposed that he sent his resignation to the bishop's secretary with instructions not to lay it before the bishop till the 1st of October. This is denied by the bishop's secretary, and is not supported by the written authority signed by the plaintiff, nor by the correspondence, and cannot be accepted as true.

The points of law relied upon by the plaintiff were mainly two—viz., first, that the resignation was wholly void; and secondly, that it was revocable, and had been revoked before it had been accepted by the bishop. The contention that the resignation was void was based on two grounds, one of form and one of substance. The objection to the resignation in point of form was, that it was not attested by a notary. It is laid down in books of authority, e.g., Gibson's Codex, p. 822, and 3 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, p. 541, that, "in practice there is no way of resigning, but either to do it by personal appearance before the ordinary, or at least to do it elsewhere before a public notary." But, although it may be quite true that the bishop may decline to receive a resignation made in any other way, no authority was cited to show that a bishop cannot dispense with these formalities, and accept a resignation of the genuineness of which he is satisfied by other evidence.

In this particular case the bishop's secretary, in his letter of the 31st of May (which accompanied the form of resignation to be executed by the plaintiff) expressly informed the plaintiff that attestation by a notary would not be insisted upon. Under these circumstances, and finding no authority to the effect that the bishop cannot lawfully waive the observance of the formalities usually required, I am of opinion that it is competent for him to do so, and that the plaintiff's resignation cannot be held invalid on the ground of its non-attestation by a notary. The objection to the resignation in point of substance was, that it was accompanied by an agreement or understanding, or by a condition or qualification which rendered it void in point of law. I have already stated what those were. It is contended that every resignation must be made purè, sponte, absolutè, et simpliciter, and that the plaintiff's resignation was not of this nature. It is to be observed that the instrument of resignation is in the nature of a deed poll. Resignation is the act of the incumbent; the instrument is his deed; the words of it are his words. The words are: "I, ——, for certain just and lawful causes me thereunto especially moving without compulsion, fraud, or deceit, purely, simply, and absolutely resign and give up my vicarage," &c. Those words are the incumbent's solemn assurance to his bishop that the resignation is one which the bishop may safely and properly accept, and that there is nothing simoniacal or otherwise improper in the transaction.

Now, the bishop was insisting on an unconditional resignation; the plaintiff knew this, and he sent in his resignation accordingly in the form in which he was required to make it. He cannot now turn round and obtain relief on the ground that his resignation was not in truth what he solemnly declared it to be: see Rumsey v. Nichol. This action is one in which the plaintiff is asserting rights based on a transaction to which he was a party, and which he now impeaches on the ground of illegality. It is contrary to well-settled legal principles to give relief in such a case. No doubt, if he were being sued by others, it would be competent for him to defend himself by showing the illegality of the transaction on which their right to relief was founded, and the plaintiff would not be estopped by his own deed from proving such illegality: Collins v. Blantern, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., p. 398. ut the position of a plaintiff seeking relief is wholly different, and to grant to the plaintiff equitable relief in the shape of an injunction upon the ground that his resignation was illegal and void is quite out of the question. It would not, however, be satisfactory to dispose of the question of illegality on the ground that, assuming it to be established, the plaintiff could not take advantage of it.

Having regard to the frame of the action and the argument addressed to the court upon it, the court in my opinion, ought to declare what the rights of the parties really are, and decide the question really in dispute between them—viz, whether the plaintiff's living did or did not become void on the 1st of October, 1886. The decision of this question renders it necessary to determine whether the plaintiff's resignation really was void or not. The determination of this point involves the solution of the following questions—viz., 1. What was the effect of the arrangement between the plaintiff and the bishop that he should not accept the plaintiff's resignation before the 1st of October, 1886? 2. What was the effect of the understanding that if the plaintiff resigned the bishop would not proceed against him under the Church Discipline Acts? In my opinion, neither of these understandings affected the validity of the resignation. It was said that they made it conditional, and therefore void. But, as already pointed out, the resignation does not express, or purport to express, or negative any agreement with the bishop; and I am by no means satisfied that the rule which requires resignations to be absolute excludes all terms and conditions of whatever nature which the incumbent may make with his bishop. In the next place, these so-called conditions are not conditions in the legal sense of the word. A promise not to proceed under the Church Discipline Act, assuming such promise to have been made, would be a mere collateral promise, not a condition affecting the resignation itself. Such a promise neither postpones the resignation nor defeats it. Nor would a breach of the promise render the resignation inoperative; still less is the postponement of the time for avoidance a condition in the proper sense of the term. The difference between annexing a condition to an act such as a promise or resignation, and fixing a term at which it is to take effect, is familiar to every lawyer. A promise to pay a sum of money at a future time is not a conditional promise; nor is a resignation to take effect at a future named day a conditional resignation. The resignation is absolute, although its operation is deferred. It would not, however, be satisfactory to dispose of this part of the case on any merely technical ground. It is desirable to examine the matter further, for collateral promises or even honourable understandings, if contrary to law, may make a resignation void. They may show that the resignation was really part of a transaction which was simoniacal or corrupt within the meaning of the statute 31 Eliz. c. 6, ss. 4—8. But I can find nothing in this case either simoniacal or corrupt. The bishop had to consider his duty to the plaintiff's parishioners and to the Church, and he came to the conclusion that it would be best for them if the plaintiff resigned without scandal. He also came to the conclusion that it was not necessary immediately to avoid the living, and that he could, consistently with his duty, postpone the avoidance of the living until the 1st of October if the plaintiff desired it, which he did. No authority has been cited to show that the bishop could not properly or lawfully act as he did. If he could secure the removal of the plaintiff from the parish, and could also avoid further scandal, there is no legal reason why he should not do so. There is no law which compels him to proceed against the plaintiff under the Church Discipline Act. The promise to postpone the avoidance of the living for a few months did not, in my judgment, in any way affect the validity of the resignation. The postponement was a kind concession to the plaintiff, and was injurious to no one. It is impossible to bring such a transaction as this within either the words or the spirit of 31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 7, and equally impossible to treat it as simoniacal.

There is no authority to show that a bishop cannot, for good and sufficient reasons, lawfully postpone the coming into operation of a resignation which he has received, and which he has approved. On the other hand, there is evidence that such a practice is common in the diocese of Oxford. It has obvious conveniences, and it is permitted by the Incumbents' Resignation Act (34 & 35 Vict. c. 44), s. 9, and schedule B. Such a power may undoubtedly be abused, but its liability to abuse does not show that the power does not exist. In the absence of authority, I cannot hold that a resignation is invalid because it is made on the understanding or faith of a promise by the bishop that it shall not come into operation the moment it is made. The decisions on resignation bonds do not touch this point, nor do the principles on which they proceed apply to a case like the present. A promise or understanding of the kind in question may, in some circumstances, be corrupt or simoniacal, and will, if corrupt or simoniacal, render a resignation on the faith of it illegal and void, but there is nothing of the sort in this case. Where, as here, the avoidance of the living is promised to be postponed by the bishop for a reasonable time, and bonâ fide, with a view to the interest of all parties concerned, a resignation made on the faith of such promise, in order to avoid scandal and legal proceedings under the Church Discipline Act, is, in my opinion, legal and unimpeachable.

There remains for consideration the question whether the resignation sent in by the plaintiff was revocable before the 1st of October, which was the time from which it was to take effect. Speaking generally, a resignation is revocable until it has been accepted by the bishop, and when it is accepted by him the living becomes void. But the authorities cited in support of this proposition are not addressed to the question whether an incumbent can revoke a resignation sent in by him to his bishop, at the bishop's request, and in order to avoid scandal and possible legal proceedings. I can find no authority which requires the bishop's approval to be signified in any particular form, although, in order to avoid disputes, the acceptance is usually put into writing and signed by the bishop. A resignation sent in under the circumstances now supposed is, in fact, approved before it is sent in, and in the case supposed no further approval appears to me necessary in order to render the resignation irrevocable. There is an ambiguity about the word "acceptance" which is apt to mislead. I am not at all sure that the words, admissio, approbatio, consensus, and the like, used by Von Espen and other canonists, mean such an acceptance of a resignation as avoids a living. It no doubt very often happens that all these expressions mean the same thing. But I am not aware of any authority which shows that an approval of a resignation is necessarily such an acceptance of it as immediately avoids the living contrary to the intentions as well of the incumbent as of the bishop. If, however, the law were as the plaintiff contends, the only effect would be that his living would necessarily have become void earlier than he intended. But this would not help him in this litigation. If he were right, both he and the bishop would have made a mistake on a matter of law; and such a mistake would not entitle the plaintiff to relief. In the view here taken of the facts and of the law it is unnecessary to determine exactly when the bishop affixed his signature to the acceptance of the plaintiff's resignation; whether the acceptance was signed before or after the attempted revocation is, in my opinion, immaterial. It is plain, as a matter of fact, that the bishop never intended his signature to operate as such an acceptance of the plaintiff's resignation as then and there to avoid the living. The acceptance in this sense was never intended to come into operation until the 1st of October, when it was formally announced. To hold that, under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff could legally withdraw his resignation after he had sent it in, would be to hold that the plaintiff could lawfully commit a gross breach of faith, and, in the absence of any authority which requires the court to hold that he has a right so to act, he ought to be held not to have it. For the reasons above stated I am of opinion that the plaintiff's appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed, with costs. But the order of the court ought, in my opinion, to be prefaced by a declaration that the benefice of Sparsholt became void on the 1st of October, 1886, by reason of the resignation thereof by the plaintiff on the 2nd of June, 1886, with the approval and consent of the Bishop of Oxford, and his acceptance thereof as on and from the 1st of October, 1886, and that the attempted revocation by the plaintiff of such resignation, after the receipt thereof by the bishop, was invalid and void.

LOPES, L.J.—At the time the correspondence between the appellant and the bishop commenced, the appellant had, by his misconduct, rendered himself liable to be proceeded against under the Church Discipline Act; and the bishop, having regard to the grave scandal occasioned by that conduct unless the appellant at once resigned his benefice, would have failed to discharge his duty if he had not directed such proceedings to be taken. In these circumstances a correspondence took place, the meaning and effect of which is most important to consider. A careful and anxious consideration of that correspondence has led me to the conclusion that there was an absolute and unconditional resignation of his benefice by the appellant in June, subject only to an understanding that the benefice was not to be avoided until the 1st of October. The resignation was suggested by the bishop, acquiesced in by the appellant, and approved of by the bishop when received by him. The resignation was, in my opinion, facta et probata when the bishop received it on the 2nd of June. This resignation, I am of opinion, the appellant had no power afterwards to withdraw. It was intended both by the appellant and the bishop that it should be absolute and irrevocable. Directly it was received by the bishop the resignation was complete, subject only to an understanding that the effect and the consequence of the resignation were to be suspended until the 1st of October. There was much argument with regard to the word admissio. In my opinion, admissio and probatio are equivalent terms, both meaning acquiescence or approval.

I will now shortly consider the grounds on which the appellant seeks to impeach his resignation. It is said that the deed of resignation is invalid because it was not executed before a notary public. There are several ways in which a valid resignation may be made. All these modes appear to have for their object the protection of the bishop, and are intended to secure him from the consequences of a mistake in avoiding a benefice. One of these modes is the execution of a deed of resignation before a notary public. I am of opinion that the execution of such a deed before a notary public is a formality for the protection of the bishop which he may waive if he thinks fit. The bishop waived this formality, and, in my opinion, the deed is not on this ground invalid. It was also contended that the resignation was illegal because a collateral condition was attached. The appellant says: "I resigned on the understanding that the benefice was not to be avoided until the 1st of October." Excepting only the case where the resignation is made for the sake of effecting an exchange, it is undoubted law that the resignation must be pure, spontè, absolutè, et simpliciter, and no collateral condition, by which in certain events the resignation may be defeated, can be annexed. The object was, no doubt, to exclude all corrupt or indirect bargains for money or any other valuable consideration. The object the bishop had in view, when he undertook not to give effect to the resignation and not to avoid the benefice until the 1st of October, is too clear for controversy. It was done in mercy and out of extreme leniency towards the appellant. The understanding, therefore, relied upon cannot be impeached on the ground that it was prompted by any indirect motive. It must be regarded, as, in truth, it was, as an honest stipulation. But was it in any sense of the word a condition by which the resignation was to be defeated? The bishop, according to my view, had, in June, in the most unequivocal way, accepted the resignation of the appellant, and would not have permitted it in any circumstances to be defeated or superseded. Out of extreme kindness he suspended its operation until the 1st of October. I know of no authority or law which prevents the bishop from so doing for honest and good reasons. In certain circumstances it would be highly inconvenient if the ordinary could not postpone for a reasonable time the avoidance of a benefice after he has approved the resignation of a clerk, and such postponement cannot, in my opinion, be said to be a condition annexed to the resignation, and cannot, either on authority or principle, be held to make the appellant's resignation invalid. I feel it unnecessary, after the judgments which have been delivered, to go into the matter at greater length, as the other members of the court have so exhaustively dealt with it. I should only be repeating what they have said, with all of which I agree.

County court — Equitable jurisdiction — Interlocutory order—Appeal—County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), s. 18.

An appeal upon a question of law lies under section 18 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, from an interlocutory order of a county court in a proceeding within its equitable jurisdiction.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

An action for dissolution of partnership was brought in the Lambeth County Court, and an order was made dissolving the partnership and that the partnership accounts should be taken, and the plaintiff was appointed receiver. On the 10th of May, 1887, an order was made that the defendant Harris should pay into court, within fourteen days, the sum of £65 14s. 6d., being moneys belonging to the partnership admitted to be in his hands, and that he should, within seven days, deliver to the receiver certain books and documents.

On the 2nd of August, 1887, the county court judge, upon the application of the receiver, made the following order (omitting formal parts):—"The court being of opinion, upon consideration of the facts disclosed, that the defendant Harris, in his fiduciary capacity as manager of the partnership business, has been guilty of a contempt of this court by neglecting to obey the order of the 10th of May, doth order that the said defendant Harris do stand committed to her Majesty's prison at Wandsworth for his said contempt."

Harris appealed from this order to the Queen's Bench Division, the ground of his appeal being that the judge was wrong in law in holding that Harris was a trustee or acting in a fiduciary capacity. Stephen and A. L. Smith, JJ., held that, as the appeal was from an interlocutory order of the county court, they had no jurisdiction to hear it. Harris appealed.

T. H. Richmond, for Harris.—The order of committal of the 2nd of August is an interlocutory order in a proceeding under the equitable jurisdiction of the county court. The order was made under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, the county court having now, by section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, power to grant relief in the same manner as the High Court, which power extends to interlocutory as well as to final orders: Richards v. Cullerne, 7 Q. B. D. 623, 30 W. R. Dig. 103. It has been decided that no appeal lies under section 14 of the County Courts Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 61), from an interlocutory order of a county court in a common law action: Carr v. Stringer, E. B. & E. 123, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 31. Section 18 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, which gives a right of appeal from the decision of a county court judge in any matter of equity, is wider in its terms than section 14 of the earlier Act. It speaks of "any matter of equity," and it empowers the Court of Appeal to make such final "or other decree or order as it shall think fit." Those words show that the court has power to deal with interlocutory orders in equity cases. The legislation as to appeals from county courts in common law actions is different from the legislation as to appeals in equity cases, because in common law cases, where the amount does not exceed £20, an appeal can only be brought by leave: 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 13; whereas in equity cases there is no such limit. Considering that county courts have jurisdiction in equity to the amount of £500, and that by sections 1 and 2 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, the judge has all the powers of a judge of the Court of Chancery, the Legislature must have intended to give an appeal from interlocutory orders, which are far more important in proceedings in equity than in common law actions.

He also cited Williams v. Williams, 37 L. J. Ch. 855, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 34; Cooper v. Busbridge, 16 L. T. N. S. 5, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 31; and Reg. v. County Court Judge of Croydon, 33 W. R. 68, 13 Q. B. D. 963.

Johnston Watson, for the plaintiff.—The words of section 18 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, are not wide enough to confer a right of appeal from interlocutory orders. The words, "may make such final or other decree or order," enable the court to deal with a final judgment of the county court either by making some final order upon it or by making an order which will not finally dispose of the matter, as by granting a new trial. This construction would bring the section into harmony with section 14 of the County Courts Act, 1850. The order of committal here was made under section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, for the purpose of enforcing obedience to an order of the court. There is no reason why an appeal should be allowed from an order of committal in an equitable matter and not from an order of committal in a common law action. The proper course to pursue in either case is to move for a prohibition.

Richmond replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—FRY, L.J.—In this case a question was raised in the nature of a preliminary objection, whether an appeal lies from the county court in this case. In the county court proceedings were taken for the purpose of winding up a partnership. The county court judge found that the defendant Harris owed a sum of money to the partnership, and, after hearing the evidence, the judge ordered him to pay this sum into court and to deliver up certain documents to the receiver. Harris neglected to obey this order, and an attachment was ordered to issue against him under the powers conferred upon county courts by section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, the order of committal stating that Harris had disobeyed the order while acting in a fiduciary capacity as manager of the partnership business. The question sought to be raised by this appeal is whether Harris was acting in a fiduciary capacity within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869. It is plain that those proceedings were taken under the equitable jurisdiction conferred upon county courts by the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865. It is plain that the order of committal was an interlocutory order, and the question we have to determine is whether an appeal will lie from an interlocutory order made by the county court when exercising its equitable jurisdiction.

It will be convenient, before coming to the Act of 1865, to state the law at the time of the passing of that Act. The County Courts Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 61), is the principal Act giving jurisdiction to county courts, and section 14 of that Act enacts that "if either party in any cause of the amount to which jurisdiction is given to the county courts by this Act shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the said court in point of law, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may appeal from the same to any of the superior courts of common law . . . and the said Court of Appeal may either order a new trial on such terms at it thinks fit, or may order judgment to be entered for either party." It is obvious from that that the nature of the relief which the Act allowed the court to give upon the appeal was not applicable to interlocutory proceedings, but was only applicable to final judgments in the county courts. Accordingly it was decided in 1858 in Carr v. Stringer that no appeal lay from interlocutory orders of county courts, and that point was finally decided by that case. That being the state of things, the Legislature, by the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, gave county courts jurisdiction in matters of equity up to £500, a very extensive jurisdiction and far wider than the jurisdiction in common law actions, and having conferred that jurisdiction the Legislature naturally thought fit to give an appeal. Section 18 giving an appeal is modelled upon the form of the section in the earlier statute giving an appeal in common law cases. The section says: "If any party in a suit or matter under this Act shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of a judge of a county court on any matter of law or equity, or on the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may appeal from the same to the Vice-Chancellor (now to the Divisional Court) . . . . and the said Court of Appeal may make such final or other decree or order as it shall think fit." We must contrast the power there given to the Vice-Chancellor with the power given to the court by the earlier statute in common law matters. The court by the earlier statute has power to order a new trial or to enter judgment for either party. The Vice-Chancellor by the later statute has power to make such final or other decree or order as he shall think fit. The language of the later enactment was obviously intended to be far wider than that used in the earlier enactment; and, as it seems to me, was intended to include interlocutory orders. Therefore, looking at the language of section 18 alone, or contrasting it with the language used in the earlier Act, a right of appeal in matters arising under the equitable jurisdiction of county courts was not confined to final orders, but extended to interlocutory orders. It is said that the Legislature must have intended the same result to follow in both statutes. I cannot say that the Legislature had any such intention, considering the difference in the language. Moreover, the reason of the thing is obvious. The greater importance of interlocutory orders in matters of equity, and the larger amount which may be in question, are strong to show that the Legislature may well have intended to give an appeal from interlocutory orders in equity. I think, therefore, that an appeal does lie from this order of the county court judge.

LOPES, L.J.—The question now raised is whether there is an appeal from interlocutory orders of a county court in equity cases, a question upon which there does not seem to have been any previous decision. In my opinion an appeal lies in such cases, and I come to that conclusion looking at the very general character of the words in section 18 of the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865. I can put no other meaning upon the words "the Court of Appeal may make such final or other decree or order as it shall think fit" than that they include interlocutory orders. Such a construction is eminently reasonable, because in equity cases the jurisdiction of the county court is very much larger than in common law cases, and interlocutory proceedings may be of more importance. Then if we turn to section 14 of the County Courts Act, 1850, which gave an appeal in common law cases where the amount was over £20, the language of that section is strong to show that the construction which I have placed upon section 18 of the later statute is the true one. The words are, "the Court of Appeal may either order a new trial on such terms as it thinks fit, or may order judgment to be entered for either party." They clearly refer to the final determination of the action in the county court. It was accordingly rightly decided in Carr v. Stringer that no appeal lay from an interlocutory order in a common law action. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that there is an appeal from an interlocutory order of a county court in equity cases, and that this objection ought to be overruled.

Objection overruled.

The COURT, however, declined to hear the appeal upon the ground that the point of law raised by the appeal was not taken before the county court judge, and that no request was made to him to take a note of the evidence relating to the point, and that no note of such evidence had in fact been taken.

Petition.

The testator, who died in February, 1887, by his will dated the 1st of April, 1879, appointed S. F. Widdrington, R. J. Cust, and Sir C. L. Cust to be his executors and trustees, and bequeathed to them two sums of £8,000 upon trust to invest and pay the income thereof to G. D. Bourne for life, and after his death to appropriate one of these sums, or the investments representing the same, as a portion for Hannah M. Bourne, upon trust for her for life, and after her death for her issue, and to appropriate the other sum as a portion for Louisa Bourne upon similar trusts in favour of her and her issue; and the testator directed that, in default of failure of their issue, these sums were to sink into his general personal estate. And he devised all his freehold estates to the use of Sir C. L. Cust for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainders over in favour of B. O. Cust and L. P. E. Cust and their sons, with an ultimate remainder to his own right heirs. The will contained the usual powers of sale and a declaration that the moneys arising thereby should be invested in hereditaments to be settled to the same uses; and the testator bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate, after payment of his debts and legacies, to his trustees upon the trusts before declared concerning the moneys to arise by the exercise of the power of sale. The will empowered the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee for the time being to appoint a new trustee or new trustees in the place of any trustee or trustees desiring to be discharged or refusing or becoming incapable to act.

Sir C. L. Cust renounced and disclaimed the offices of executor and trustee under the will, which was proved by the other two executors. All the above-named beneficiaries were unmarried. The two sums of £8,000 were duly appropriated, and were represented by two sums of Consols. S. F. Widdrington and R. J. Cust were desirous of being relieved of the trusts of the will, so far as they related to these two sums, as they were likely to continue for many years and were of a complicated character, but were willing to continue trustees of the real estate and of the residuary personal estate. Accordingly this petition was presented by the above-named beneficiaries and by Sir T. E. Moss, who was the heir-at-law of the testator, praying that two persons named might be appointed trustees of the will for the purposes of the two sums of £8,000, and that the two existing trustees might be at liberty to transfer to them the sums of Consols representing the same, and that the two existing trustees might be re-appointed, or might continue trustees of the will for all purposes other than the trusts of the two sums of £8,000.

The petition contained no statement indicating the particular sections of the Trustee Acts under which it was proposed that the order should be made, and the court observed that it would be convenient that the recommendation recently made by the Court of Appeal, that all petitions under the Trustee Acts should contain such a statement in the last paragraph thereof, should be followed (see 32 S. J., p. 17).

Marten, Q.C., and Cust, for the petitioners.—In Savile v. Couper, 35 W. R. 829, 36 Ch. D. 520, North, J., held that an appointment of a separate set of trustees of part of the trust property under section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, could only be made when new trustees of the whole trust property were being appointed. In this case a new trustee for the general purposes of the will can be appointed in the place of the one who has disclaimed. [KAY, J.—That would be a mere device to evade the effect of the decision, which is binding upon me, although personally I might have been inclined to give a wider interpretation to the section.] Separate sets of trustees were appointed in In re Hetherington's Trusts, 35 W. R. 285, 34 Ch. D. 211. [KAY, J.—There new trustees of the whole were appointed.] Independently of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, the court can appoint separate trustees of separate shares of the trust property under section 32 of the Trustee Act, 1850: In re Cotterill's Trusts, W. N., 1869, p. 183, and In re Cunard's Trusts, 27 W. R. 52. The decision in Savile v. Couper was not under this Act, but on an originating summons to determine the trustees' powers under section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882.

F. H. L. Errington, for the trustees of the will.

KAY, J.—I think I may do what is now asked, and that in the present case I am not bound by the decision of North, J., in Savile v. Couper. This application for the appointment of trustees is made under the Trustee Acts, and it seems from the cases which have been cited to me that even before the Conveyancing Act, 1882, the court was accustomed to allow trustees to retire from a part of the trusts, and to appoint new trustees of that part wherever it was expedient so to do. Here, therefore, I think I am at liberty, under the powers of the Trustee Acts, independently of section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, to allow these trustees to retire from that part of the trusts which has reference to the portions, and which is quite distinct from the other part of the trusts having reference to the residue of the property; and I do so without requiring the appointment of a new trustee to act in the trusts of the residue, because I do not wish to limit the power of the court in doing that which I think it has the power to do. The decision of North, J., in Savile v. Couper, as I understand it, was that under the powers given by section 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, or under a power of appointing new trustees such as that which is contained in the will of this testator, trustees are not at liberty, without the authority of the court, to retire from one part only of the trusts, and appoint new trustees of that part to act in their place. But that is a very different thing from an appointment with the authority of the court under the Trustee Acts. I think, therefore, I am at liberty to make the order which is asked for by this petition, but the petition must be amended by inserting a reference to section 32 of the Trustee Act, 1850.

HATTEN v. RUSSELL. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Mutuality—Repudiation of contract—Sale by tenant for life—Absence of trustees—Defect of title or of conveyancing—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 3, 22, 45 sub-sections 1, 3.

The contract on a sale of the fee by a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, fixed the date for completion on the 29th of September, but the court held, on the conditions of sale, that, in this respect, time was not of the essence of the contract. On examining the abstract, the purchaser took the objection, on the 25th of August, that there were no proper trustees for the purposes of the Act, whereupon the vendor, after some further correspondence, on the 6th of October, took out a summons for the appointment of trustees, and informed the purchaser that he had done so. The purchaser replied, on the 8th, that he repudiated the contract. On the 29th the order appointing trustees was made. They waived the notice of sale which should have been given to them by the tenant for life, and notice of the order and waiver was given to the purchaser. He, on the 3rd of November, commenced an action for return of the deposit.

Held, that the purchaser had nothing to do with the trustees except to pay them his purchase-money; that, before completion, there must be trustees for the purposes of the Act to receive the purchase-money, or to enable the tenant for life to direct payment into court under section 22; but that the absence of trustees was a defect of conveyancing only, not a defect of title, and the purchaser had no right to repudiate the contract. Even if it had been a defect of title, he ought to have given notice to remove the defect within a reasonable time, and not have put an end to the contract brevi manu.

Trial of action.

This was an action by a purchaser for return of the deposit by the vendor (a tenant for life) and the questions involved were whether the absence of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act was a defect of title, and whether, under the circumstances, the purchaser was justified in repudiating the contract without notice.

On the 28th of July, 1886, the plaintiff bought the property at an auction for £565 and paid £56 5s. deposit

The defendant purported to sell part of the property as equitable tenant for life under the will of his mother, and on the 29th of July he gave notice to the trustees of the will of his intention to sell. The conditions of sale provided that the purchase should be completed on the 29th of September, 1886, and that if from any cause whatever the purchase should not be completed on that day, the purchaser should pay interest to the vendor at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the remainder of his purchase-money, or that the vendor should at his option be entitled to the rents and profits until completion; and, further, that all objections and requisitions in respect of the title should be stated in writing and sent to the vendor's solicitors within fourteen days from the delivery of the abstract, and that all objections and requisitions not so sent should be considered to be waived, and that in that respect time should be of the essence of the contract. On examining the abstract, which was delivered on the 12th of August, the plaintiff discovered that there was no power of sale in the will, and therefore that the trustees were not trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and consequently that no notice had been given of the intention to sell; and on the 25th he wrote to the vendor's solicitors stating his objection.

On the 21st of September the vendor's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff contending that the trustees of the will were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act. The plaintiff insisted on the objection and on the 6th of October the vendor's solicitors wrote to him "We have taken out a summons in the Chancery Division for the appointment of two trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act. This we think will remove your only objection to the title."

On the 7th of October the plaintiff wrote "I cannot concur that the application to the court will remove all my objections to the title, and looking at it as a whole I think it will be best that the purchase should be considered to be at an end," and asked for a return of the deposit. On the next day, the 8th, he wrote that he would not trouble them to endeavour to perfect the title, and continued "I wish you thoroughly to understand that, as a good title has not been shown, and the day for completion has passed, the purchase is at an end."

On the 9th the vendor's solicitors wrote that they could not agree to cancelling the agreement.

On the 11th the purchaser wrote "Neither at the date of the contract nor since has the proposed vendor had the right or power to sell under statute or otherwise, and I must decline to wait while he obtains such right or power," and begged that they would not make any application to the court on his account.

The correspondence continued till the 29th of October, when the order was made appointing the trustees of the will trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act. On the same day the trustees waived, under the Settled Land Act, 1884, s. 5, sub-section 3, notice of sale by the vendor; and notice of the appointment and of the waiver was sent to the plaintiff.

On the 3rd of November the plaintiff issued his writ asking for repayment by the auctioneer of the deposit, and costs and damages against the vendor. The vendor counter-claimed specific performance of the contract.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiff.—The vendor could not make a title at the time fixed for completion, so we had a right to repudiate the contract: Hoggart v. Scott, 1 Russ. & My. 293; Forrer v. Nash, 14 W. R. 8, 35 Beav. 167; Brewer v. Broadwood, 31 W. R. 115, 22 Ch. D. 105; Wylson v. Dunn, 35 W. R. 405, 34 Ch. D. 569. [KAY, J.—It would be sufficient if he could make a title when the conveyance was tendered: Ellis v. Rogers, 29 Ch. D. 661, 32 W. R. Dig. 237.] The opinions of the Lords Justices in that case were pronounced only as dicta. The absence of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was a defect of title. By section 45 a tenant for life has to give the trustees a month's notice of his intention to sell; by section 5, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act, 1884, that notice may be notice of a general intention to sell, but notice is still necessary, and here we discovered from the abstract that there were no trustees at all. The trustees could waive notice under sub-section 3, but they did not do so in time. By section 45, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1882, a person dealing in good faith need not inquire about the notice, but that does not apply when he knows that there are no trustees: Duke of Marlborough v. Sartoris, 35 W. R. 55, 57, 32 Ch. D. 616, 623, 624; Parkinson v. Hanbury, 8 W. R. 575, 1 Dr. & Sm. 143. The tenant for life can sell under sections 3, 20, but the purchase-money must be paid to trustees: section 22. So the purchaser cannot get a good title where there are none. He cannot pay his money into court under that section, as the tenant for life can only exercise his option where there are trustees. Without trustees the tenant for life can make no title, except to the life estate. By section 53 he is placed in the position of a trustee, and a sale of the fee by him without trustees would be a breach of trust, of which we had notice so that we should not be protected by section 45, sub-section 3. By section 44 provision is made for the reference to the court of differences between the trustees and the tenant for life, which shows that they have other duties besides that of receiving the purchase-money—for instance, to take care that he exercises his power of sale properly.

Millar, Q.C., and C. Lyttelton Chubb, for the vendor.—The conditions of sale show that in respect of the date fixed for completion, time was not of the essence of the contract: Patrick v. Milner, 25 W. R. 790, 2 C. P. D. 342. The plaintiff could not repudiate the contract in this way. Even if there had been improper delay he could only have fixed a reasonable time for completion: Green v. Sevin, 13 Ch. D. 589, 599, 28 W. R. Dig. 172. If he could have done so, he has waived his right by continuing negotiations after the day fixed for completion: Webb v. Hughes, 18 W. R. 749; L. R. 10 Eq. 281. Under the Settled Land Act, 1882, the tenant for life is the only person who can sell, and he can sell alone, without trustees. The exception in the case of a mansion-house shows this: section 15. It is the scheme of the whole Act: sections 20, 21, 22, 31, 38, 45.

Dauney, in reply.—We did not continue negotiations after we took the objection. We had a right to refuse to be bound by the contract: Williams v. Glenton, 14 W. R. 294, L. R. 1 Ch. 200, 207.

KAY, J.—The principal action in this case is for rescission of the contract, and for return of the deposit, which can only be granted in case the contract has been rescinded or is now to be rescinded. The counter-claim asks for specific performance. The sale was by auction on the 28th of July, 1886, subject to conditions of sale which provided, amongst other things, that the remainder of the purchase-money should be paid on the 29th of September next—i.e., in 1886—and that if, for any cause whatever, the purchase should not be completed on that day the purchaser should pay interest to the vendor at five per cent. from that day until completion. Condition 7 is to the effect that all objections and requisitions are to be delivered within fourteen days, and that in this respect time shall be of the essence of the contract. The obvious inference is that the day fixed for completion, the 29th of September, was not of the essence of the contract.

The vendor was tenant for life and was selling under the powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1882, and a very important question has been raised under that Act. [His lordship referred to the correspondence concluding with the letter of the 11th of October, and continued.] Now the first question is whether or not that view of the case is correct. Was it the case that the absence of trustees, I should rather say the non-existence of trustees, for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, put the tenant for life in such a position that he had no power to sell? On the Act I do not come to that conclusion. The scheme of the Act seems to me to be that the tenant for life qua tenant for life is to have an absolute and (except in certain instances pointed out by the Act) unfettered right to sell.

It is true that the person to receive the purchase-money is not the tenant for life, but the trustees—either the trustees with power of sale of the settlement or trustees who are appointed by the court for the purposes of the Act; or, at the option of the tenant for life, he can direct the purchaser to pay it into court. The trustees have the right to give receipts, and a purchaser paying to them, unless otherwise directed by the tenant for life, would be quite safe; or if there were trustees and he was told to pay the money into court he would in that case also be quite safe; but in no case can he pay the purchase-money to the tenant for life himself.

The consent of the trustees is not required by the Act to anything except a sale of the mansion-house under section 15. I observe that in section 3, which gives to the tenant for life power to sell, in section 6, which confers on him powers of leasing, in section 13, which gives him power to accept surrenders of leases, and in section 31, which confers power to enter into contracts, there is not a word about the consent of the trustees being wanted, nor, indeed, any mention of them. But in section 15 it says, "The principal mansion-house, &c., shall not be sold or leased by the tenant for life without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court." Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. If in that case it is expressly stated that the consent of the trustees is necessary, the obvious conclusion is that in other cases it is not necessary.

I turn to the clauses concerning trustees, section 38, which gives power to appoint new trustees, and the subsequent sections, and there I find a power given to them by section 40 to give receipts; section 41 limits their liabilities; section 42 is in these terms [His lordship read the section as to the protection of trustees generally, and continued:—]; and in section 44 there is this provision, "If at any time a difference arises between a tenant for life and the trustees of the settlement respecting the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, or respecting any matter relating thereto, the court may, on the application of either party, give such directions respecting the matter in difference and respecting the costs of the application as the court thinks fit." That the expression, "the trustees of the settlement," includes trustees appointed for the purposes of the Act is obvious from section 38, for trustees appointed by the court are to become and be, for the purposes of the Act, the trustees of the settlement; and the definition clause provides—section 2, sub-section 8—that the trustees of a settlement with power of sale are to be trustees for the purposes of the Act; and, finally, by section 38, if at any time there are no trustees of the settlement within the definition of the Act, the court may appoint trustees who are to become and be the trustees of the settlement.

The position of the trustees, therefore, with regard to the question now before me is this. They have no such duty cast upon them of controlling the tenant for life as would make them personally liable if the sale was improper. At the same time it would be quite right of them if they thought it improper to submit the question to the court under the section I read last—section 44; but, except in such a case, the trustees, as I read the Act, have nothing to do with sales by the tenant for life and no power to exercise any discretion, and, therefore, their consent being quite unnecessary, and a purchaser having nothing to do with them except to pay his purchase-money to them, the fact that there were no trustees at the date of the contract, and, consequently, that no notice was given to them under section 45 of the tenant for life's intention to sell, is not a defect of title.

As to the notice, there is an express provision in section 45, sub-section 3, that "a person dealing in good faith with the tenant for life is not concerned to inquire respecting the giving of any such notice as is required by this section." But it is said that that does not apply where the purchaser knows that no notice has been given, and that in that case he might be liable if he completed the purchase and paid his money, though he knew that no notice had been given. With that question at present I have nothing to do, and I do not intend to give any opinion upon it. The fact that there were no trustees and no notice given was not a defect of the vendor's title to sell. The tenant for life had the right to sell, and the defect as between him and the purchaser was that there was no one to whom the latter could pay the purchase-money; and I say that advisedly, for under the Act—section 22—it appears that a purchaser cannot properly pay the money into court at the direction of the tenant for life where there are no trustees for the purposes of the Act. The section says that capital-money shall "be paid either to the trustees of the settlement or into court at the option of the tenant for life." The meaning of that is that he can choose between the two; but the option cannot be exercised where there are no trustees.

By section 53 a tenant for life is put in the position of a trustee. The clause says: "a tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position, and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties." Looking back to the powers, I find in the first power of all the power of sale, that section 4 contains the usual provisions which we find in a power of sale, best price, best consideration, and so on, so that I take the meaning of this 53rd section to be that, for the security of the remaindermen, as between the tenant for life and them, he, in the exercise of these powers, shall be treated as a trustee and have all the liabilities of a trustee exercising such powers. The consequence is that, if a purchaser knows that the tenant for life is acting improperly and committing a breach of trust, he has a right to refuse to treat with him any more. For instance, if the tenant for life asks him to pay the purchase-money to him he can refuse to do so, as it would be a breach of trust. The question is really not a question of title so much as a question, when the sale comes to be completed, whether the purchaser can properly pay the money to the trustees or into court at the option of the tenant for life.

The vendor, being at first wrong as he admits, proceeded at first to sell under the mistaken impression that the trustees of the will were trustees for the purposes of the Act. When his attention was called to the mistake he did not refuse to set the matter right, but he took out a summons on the 6th of October to appoint trustees under the Act, and it was not till after he had done that and given notice of it to the plaintiff that the latter repudiated the contract. Therefore the defect being, as I have said, rather one of conveyancing than of title, the question is whether the plaintiff acted within his rights in so doing, or whether his more proper course would not have been to say "I give you notice to remedy the defect, and if you do not remedy it within a reasonable time I shall repudiate the contract."

In my opinion that would have been the proper course for him to take, and if he were a willing purchaser that is what he would have done. It would have taken but little time, and, in fact, the order appointing trustees was actually made on the 29th of October; on the same day the trustees waived notice; and on the same day notice was given to the plaintiff that the defect was remedied. Up to that time he had taken no steps except repudiation by letter, and it was not till the 3rd of November that he issued his writ. He can only justify that course by saying that the time fixed for completion was of the essence of the contract, and that, as the vendor was not ready then to give him a receipt for the purchase-money he cannot insist on the contract now.

There are cases in which, where the defect is a defect of title, the purchaser is not compelled to wait for an indefinite time, but that doctrine has never been carried beyond a defect of title. That is why I have taken pains to show that the absence of trustees was not a defect of title, but a defect of conveyancing which could be remedied in a short time. But if it were a defect of title, there is a whole series of cases in which it is settled that a purchaser cannot, even then, brevi manu, put an end to the contract, but that he must give a reasonable time. Accordingly I think the purchaser is in the wrong, and as he did this deliberately after he knew that the defect was actually remedied and the vendor could give him a perfect conveyance and a perfect receipt for his money, I must dismiss his action and lay the costs upon him. There will be judgment on the counterclaim for specific performance, with costs.

Action dismissed, with costs.

Company—Inspection of register—Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16), ss. 45, 63—Jurisdiction—Injunction—Mandamus.

A company is bound, under sections 45 and 63 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, to allow a holder of stock and debentures to inspect the whole of its register, and has no right to require him to state his reasons for inspection. The proper remedy in case of a refusal to allow inspection is an injunction, not a mandamus.

Rex v. Wilts and Berks Canal Co., 3 A. & E. 477, explained.

Motion.

A holder of debentures and consolidated stock in the above-named company moved for an interim injunction to restrain the company and its directors from impeding him in the exercise of his statutory right to inspect and take copies from the company's register of shareholders. The defendants assented to the plaintiff's request to inspect the registers, so far as they related to his own stock, and permitted him to ascertain the names of the stock-holders, but declined to permit him to ascertain the amounts of their holdings.

Romer, Q.C., and Beale, for the motion, relied on section 45 and section 63 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845.

They also referred to sections 10 and 28 of the same Act.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Rowden, for the defendants.—The plaintiff must state his reasons for desiring inspection. His proper remedy is by writ of mandamus.

They cited Rex v. Wilts and Berks Canal Co., 3 Ad. & E. 477; Glossop v. Heston, &c., Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D, 102; North London Railway Co. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B, D. 30.

CHITTY, J.—It is said by the defendants that a stockholder is not entitled to ask to see the register unless he states his reasons, and if he does not do so the company are entitled to refuse him access to the register. However, what the defendants did in the present case was to refuse point blank, without raising the contention they have raised at the bar. Neither in section 45 nor in section 63 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, is contained anything supporting the defendants' contention. Section 45 says the register may be perused at all reasonable times, and section 63 that the register or "the book" shall be accessible at all seasonable times. The accessibility to be given is to the book, and not to part of the book or part of the register. The defendants have cited the case of the Wilts and Berks Canal Co. as an authority in their favour. In that case a point of fact was raised—namely, whether there had been a sufficient refusal of inspection so as to entitle the plaintiff to a mandamus. I am satisfied that the observations of the judges as to any necessity that the applicant desiring to inspect should state the object of the proposed inspection related to the point of fact, and were not intended to import into a statute a stipulation which had never been enacted. The defendants, in my opinion, have no right to require the plaintiff to state his reasons for inspecting when the statute contains no such stipulation, nor have they a right to refuse him inspection of a part when the statute speaks of inspection of the whole. The defendants have said that the plaintiff's remedy was by mandamus in the Queen's Bench Division. The case here, however, is that of a private individual who has a statutory right. In the case of interference with a statutory right the Court of Chancery had always, independently of the Judicature Act, jurisdiction to grant an injunction. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to an injunction in the terms of the notice of motion, but the words "at all reasonable or seasonable times" must be added to the terms of the injunction.

Marriage of female ward of court—Costs of settlement—Payment out of corpus of settled property.

The costs of a settlement of the property of a female ward of court, made upon her marriage with the sanction of the court, were ordered to be paid out of the corpus of the settled property.

Anonymous, 4 Russ. 473, followed.

Petition.

This was a petition by Mrs. De Trafford, the wife of G. A. Cathcart De Trafford, by her next friend, and by the trustees of her marriage settlement, asking that, subject to the payment of costs, certain funds in court in certain specified actions might be transferred to the trustees.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. De Trafford was at the time of her marriage, on the 20th of August, 1887, and was still, an infant. The marriage was with the sanction of the court, and the settlement, which comprised only her property, including the funds in question, was an ante-nuptial settlement made under the Infants' Settlement Act of 1855 with the approval of the court.

By the settlement the first life interest was given to the wife and the second to the husband. The settlement did not contain any provision as to the payment of the costs of its preparation.

Cookson, Q.C., and Dauney, for the petitioners.

R. F. Norton, for the husband.—The conveyancing costs of the settlement ought to be included in the costs which are to be paid out of the fund in question. The foundation of the rule that these costs were payable by the husband was that by the old law the husband was liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage: Helps v. Clayton, 13 W. R. 161, 17 C. B. N. S. 553; Haywood v. Fiott, 8 C. & P. 59; Davidson's Conveyancing, 3rd ed., vol. 3, p. 728. But now, by virtue of section 14 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a husband is liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage only to the extent of her property to which he has by his marriage become entitled. The reason for the old practice, therefore, no longer exists.

He also referred to Anonymous, 4 Russ. 473; and Wolstenholme's Conveyancing Acts, 4th ed., p. 331.

Dunning and J. W. Williamson, jun., for other respondents.

North, J.—I think the Anonymous case, cited from Russell, comes sufficiently near the present case for me to act upon it. I will order that the costs of all parties of the settlement (including the costs of the husband) be paid out of the corpus of the funds which are to be transferred to the trustees.

Kemp v. Haynes. (a.)

Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 48), s. 51—Tenant for life—Condition of forfeiture on non-residence—Validity.

A testator gave to his wife an annuity of £200, and also devised his mansion-house and five cottages upon trust to permit her to occupy the mansion-house and receive the rents of the cottages until (amongst other things) she should fail to comply with certain directions, one of which was that she should reside in the mansion-house, and not absent herself for more than three calendar months in any year, otherwise the annuity of £200 and her interest in the mansion-house and cottages were to cease. The widow remained away from the mansion house, nursing an invalid daughter, for more than three calendar months, but did not, as tenant for life of the property, let or sell the mansion-house before the expiration of that period.

Held, that the condition of forfeiture on non-residence was valid, except so far as it would prevent the widow, as tenant for life, from leasing or selling the property, and that, as she had broken the condition, the forfeiture took effect.

Adjourned summons.

Richard Haynes by his will bequeathed to his wife, Alice Woollery Haynes, a legacy of £100 and an annuity of £500 during her life, and also, in the event of there being a child of his living at his decease, a further annuity of £200 until, among other things, she should fail to comply with the directions thereinafter given in respect to her residence and conduct, in which cases the annuity of £200 was to cease. And the testator devised his real estate to trustees for the term of 1,000 years upon certain trusts, and, subject thereto, to his only daughter, Margaret C. A. H. Haynes in strict settlement, with remainders over. And the testator declared the trusts of the term of 1,000 years to be, as to his dwelling-house at Downend and five cottages, in the event of there being any child of his living at his decease, to permit his wife to occupy the dwelling-house and to receive the rents of the cottages until her death or marrying again, or until the death of all his children under twenty-one years, or until the youngest should attain that age or marry, or until his wife should fail to comply with the directions thereinafter given in respect of her residence and conduct, in which case the trust in her favour should cease. And after the determination of her interest, upon trust to permit his dwelling-house at Downend to be kept as a residence for his child or children until the youngest should attain twenty-one years or marry. And the testator directed that his wife should, during the continuance of her interest, reside at his dwelling-house at Downend, and should not absent herself for more than three calendar months in any year, or for more than three calendar months continuously at any one time, and that in case his wife should disobey the directions her interest in the dwelling-house and in the annuity of £200 should cease. And the testator appointed his wife, during her widowhood, guardian of his infant child or children.

The testator died on the 16th of February, 1887, leaving his wife, Alice W. Haynes, and one child, Margaret C. A. H. Haynes, an infant of the age of ten years, and an invalid.

Shortly after the death of the testator the widow, Alice W. Haynes, was advised by her medical advisers that it was absolutely necessary that Margaret C A. H. Haynes should leave the testator's dwelling-house at Downend, which was unhealthy, and go and live at Brighton, and Alice W. Haynes thereupon left Downend and took up her residence at Brighton, as her attendance was indispensable to her daughter's existence.

In June, 1887, before Alice W. Haynes had been absent from Downend for three calendar months, an application was made by her by summons in chambers for leave for her to absent herself from Downend for a limited time without forfeiting the interest in the dwelling-house at Downend and five cottages and the legacy of £200, notwithstanding the provisions of the will, and the judge decided that he had no power to give the leave asked for, but made an order declaring that Alice W. Haynes was trustee of the dwelling-house at Downend and the cottages within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and was entitled to demise the same in accordance with the provisions of the Act, notwithstanding the provisions in the will as to her residing in the house.

No tenant, however, could be found for the dwelling-house at Downend before the expiration of three calendar months from the time when Alice W. Haynes left Downend for Brighton, but she, nevertheless, decided to remain with her daughter at Brighton and allow the three calendar months to expire.

The summons was taken out by the trustees for a declaration whether, in the events which had happened, the annuity of £200 bequeathed to Alice W. Haynes had ceased, and also whether, in the events which had happened, the trusts in the testator's will contained to allow Alice W. Haynes to occupy the dwelling-house at Downend, and to receive the rents of the five cottages at Downend, had ceased.

Higgins, Q.C., and A. L. Ellis, for the summons.—We submit that the provisions in the will of the testator providing for the forfeiture of Mrs. Haynes' life interest in the dwelling-house at Downend and five cottages, and of the annuity, in the event of her non-residence in the house for more than three calendar months is void as tending to prevent her from exercising her powers as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that she has not forfeited them by residing with her daughter at Brighton for more than three calendar months.

They referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 51; In re Paget's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 898, 30 Ch. D. 161.

Giffard, Q.C., and Heath, contrà, were not heard.

NORTH, J.—It would not have been lawful for the testator to impose such a condition as to residence in his dwelling-house at Downend as would preclude the tenant for life from exercising the absolute power of disposition given by the Legislature, inasmuch as that would be taking away that power which the Legislature gives, notwithstanding any device of the settlor. It is clear that before the Settled Land Act, 1882, a residence clause was good. Section 51 of that Act provides shortly that any device which purports or attempts to forbid or prevent a tenant for life from exercising any of the powers under the Act, so far as it purports, or attempts, or tends, or is intended to have, or would or might have, such operation, shall be deemed void. It is void from the time at which the sale or disposition which it prevents from taking place is attempted. This is in accordance with the judgment of Pearson, J., in In re Paget's Settled Estates. I asked counsel in what way a provision for residence until the property is disposed of could fetter the absolute power of disposition of a tenant for life. It does not seem to me that a direction that the tenant for life should occupy the property until it is disposed of does fetter her power of disposition. The tenant for life has admittedly committed a breach of the condition in the will, which, so far as it does not in any way interfere with her power of disposition, is good; and, the condition not having been complied with, her interest has ceased. I must declare that, in the events which have happened, the annuity of £200 has ceased, and that the trusts as to the dwelling-house at Dowend and the five cottages in favour of Mrs. Haynes have also ceased.

LEEDS ESTATE BUILDING, &c., SOCIETY v. SHEPHERD. (a.)

Company—Directors—Manager of company—Auditor—Dividend not payable out of capital—Balance-sheet—Violation of articles in preparation of balance-sheets—Over-estimate of assets.

The directors of the company lent money on mortgage on the terms that the money lent, together with an addition representing interest, should be repaid by equal monthly instalments, extending over a period of years.

The directors delegated the preparation of the balance-sheets to the manager.

The articles prohibited the payment of dividends out of capital, and enjoined their payment out of profits arrived at upon estimates of account.

The manager, in preparing the balance-sheets, omitted to prepare, as prescribed by the articles, a statement of the income and expenditure of the company. He fixed the amount of dividend to be paid, and justified its payment on the accounts in which it was provided for by estimating future instalments as presently repayable, without proper discount. The valuation of some freehold property, part of which was used as the company's offices, was increased.

The auditor of the company, who stated that he did not look at the articles, although he knew of their existence, approved the accounts and dividends.

The directors relied entirely upon the manager and auditor, and declared dividends in accordance with the above accounts.

Large sums were expended in dividend under the above state of things which were attributable to capital.

Held, that the manager, auditor, and directors were liable for these sums so expended in dividend from time to time while they respectively held these posts.

Oxford Building case, 35 W. R. 116, 35 Ch. D. 502, followed.

This was an action by the Leeds Estate Building and Investment Co. (Limited) (now in liquidation) against certain of the former directors of the company (including the present secretary), the legal personal representatives of a deceased director, the present manager and secretary, Crabtree, who in 1870 ceased to be a director and was appointed manager and secretary, and the auditor, seeking to render them liable for various breaches of duty.

The company was formed in 1869, under the Companies Act, 1862, and went into voluntary liquidation on the 31st of October, 1882. It was insolvent, and the present action was brought for the benefit of its creditors. Among the breaches of duty charged against the directors, manager, and auditor were the alleged payment of dividends out of capital, wherewith this report is alone concerned.

The material articles were as follows:—

63. "The remuneration of the directors for the services performed previously to the first general meeting shall be determined by the company at the first general meeting. After such general meeting they shall be remunerated as follows:—When and so long as the company shall pay a dividend amounting to £5 per centum per annum, every director present at the weekly meeting of the board shall receive the sum of 10s. for every meeting which he shall attend; and when and so long as the company shall pay a greater dividend than five per cent. upon the paid-up capital, there shall be added to the above rates of remuneration the further sum of 2s. 6d. for every additional one per cent. of dividend, and fractional parts of one per cent. in any dividend shall, for the purposes of this clause, be carried to the credit of succeeding dividends."

79. "The directors may, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares. Such dividend may be declared either annually or half-yearly, as the directors may see fit to propose to the company in general meeting, and may be declared upon such estimates of account as the directors may see proper to recommend."

80. "No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company; but this clause shall not prevent the declaration of a dividend upon any such estimate of account as aforesaid."

(a.) Reported by HENRY T. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

86. "The directors shall cause true accounts to be kept of the estate and property of the company, of the sums of money received and expended by the company, and the manner in respect of which such receipt and expenditure takes place, and of the credits and liabilities of the company. The books of account shall be kept at the registered office of the company, and, subject to any reasonable restrictions as to the time and manner of inspecting the same that may be enforced by the company in general meeting, shall be open to the inspection of the members during the hours of business."

87. "Once at least in every year the directors shall lay before the company in general meeting a statement of income and expenditure for the past year or the past half-year, made up to a date not more than one month before such meeting."

88. "The statement so made shall show, arranged under the most convenient heads, the amount of gross income, distinguishing the several sources from which it has been derived, and the amount of gross expenditure, distinguishing the expenses of the establishment salaries and other like matters. Every item of expenditure fairly chargeable against the year's income shall be brought into account, so that a just balance of profit and loss may be laid before the meeting; and in cases where any item of expenditure which may in fairness be distributed over several years has been incurred in any one year the whole amount of such item shall be stated, with the addition of the reasons why only a portion of such expenditure is charged against the income of the year."

89. "A balance-sheet shall be made out in every year, and laid before the company in general meeting, and such balance-sheet shall contain a summary of the property and liabilities of the company, arranged under the heads appearing in the form annexed to Table B. of the Companies Act, 1862, or as near thereto as circumstances admit. In that balance-sheet one of the heads is 'Profit and Loss, showing the disposable balance for the payment of dividends,' &c."

90. "Once at least in every year the accounts of the company shall be examined, and the correctness of the balance-sheet ascertained, by one or more auditor or auditors."

99. "Every auditor shall be supplied with a copy of the balance-sheet, and it shall be his duty to examine the same, with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto."

100. "Every auditor shall have a list delivered to him of all books kept by the company, and shall at all reasonable times have access to the books and accounts of the company. He may at the reasonable expense of the company employ accountants or other persons to assist him in investigating such accounts, and he may, in relation to such accounts, examine the directors or any other officer of the company."

101. "The auditors shall make a report to the members upon the balance-sheet and accounts, and in every such report they shall state whether, in their opinion, the balance-sheet is a full and fair balance-sheet containing the particulars required by these regulations, and properly drawn so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs, and in case they have called for explanation or information from the directors, whether such explanation or information has been given by the directors, and whether it has been satisfactory; and such report shall be read, together with the report of the directors, at the ordinary meeting."

The facts, with the exception of the following letter, appear from the judgment:—

In 1871 Locking (the auditor) wrote to the directors a letter with reference to the "Stock Account." "The making of this account devolves more particularly on yourselves and the manager than the auditors. At the same time the items were fully explained by Mr. Crabtree, and I do not consider the estimate overdrawn or likely to give any shareholder cause to object. Of course, it would have been better if the parties had agreed to divide nothing for a few years till a good accumulation had taken place, but a dividend is, no doubt, a necessity.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the plaintiff company.—As to Crabtree, he is guilty of fraud on his own admission. The case against the directors is covered by In re Oxford Building Society, 35 W. R. 116, 35 Ch. D. 502. As to Locking, even if he acted in good faith, he did not use ordinary diligence in the fulfilment of the duties imposed upon him by the articles. The loss incurred by the company in making unauthorized payments out of capital is the direct result of his breach of duty: Mayne on Damages, 3rd ed., p. 468; Story on Agency, 9th ed., 217; that, therefore, is the measure of damages, and Locking is liable for that amount, except so far as he is protected by the Statute of Limitations.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., and E. W. Byrne, for one of the directors.—None of the directors were supposed to possess actuarial skill; they were obliged to employ competent agents, and are not liable for the mistake, negligence, or fraud of the agents: Rance's case, 19 W. R. 291, L. R. 6 Ch. 104. A director is not liable for mere imprudence, but only for crassa negligentia: Grimwade v. Mutual Society, 52 L. T. N. S. 409, 416, 33 W. R. Dig. 44; Overend, Gurney, & Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 E. & I. App. 480. In this case it was within the powers of the directors to declare dividends out of the estimated profits, and if, in so doing, they acted under a mistake or through wrong advice, they are not liable as for an act done ultrâ vires. There is no suggestion of any want of good faith or of any sinister motive on the part of the directors. The only authority relied upon by the plaintiffs is the Oxford case. We contend, first, that that case is distinguishable on the ground that there the directors were authorized to pay dividends out of realized profits only; and, secondly, that it is inconsistent with the earlier authorities, and ought not to be followed.

Pearson, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for another director, referred to In re Denham & Co., 32 W. R. 487, 25 Ch. D. 752; Stringer's case, 17 W. R. 694, L. R. 4 Ch. 475.

Finlay, Q.C., and Farwell, for the personal representatives of the deceased director.—Directors cannot be made liable on the basis of payment of dividends out of capital without knowledge and crassa negligentia: Turquand v. Marshall, 17 W. R. 935, L. R. 4 Ch. 376. [They referred, as to errors of judgment on the part of directors, to Lindley on Partnership, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 594.] Only an action for negligence was maintainable, and that has died with the individual director.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for Crabtree.—Crabtree was the servant of the directors. His responsibility for the balance-sheets ends with their preparation, and is a question between him and the directors. With the duty of the directors in declaring a proper dividend and laying the balance-sheets before the shareholders he had nothing to do. He is not liable for the fees paid to the directors, which he did not receive. Even if the dividends were not justified, the money paid in respect of the fees is not recoverable any more than money paid to the shareholders.

Bardswell, for one of the directors.

Decimus Sturges, for Locking, the auditor.—Locking was a servant of the directors, and not of the company: Spackman v. Evans, L. R. 3 E. & I. App., at p. 236, and fraud is not proved against him. Really the only case against him is for negligence; but this action contains no claim for damages. The only duty of an auditor is to see that the balance-sheets correspond with the books. I submit, first, that the duties imposed by the articles were reasonably and properly fulfilled by Locking, having regard to his remuneration; and, secondly, that the damage to the company is too remote.

Ingle Joyce (Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., with him), for Whitaker.—Whitaker stands in a different position from the other directors, as his connection with the company lasted for little more than a year, and at the most he can only be made liable for one dividend. A summons under section 165 of the Companies Act would have sufficed, and Whitaker ought not to be compelled to pay the additional costs caused by the plaintiffs' mode of procedure.

Sir H. Davey in reply.—Spackman v. Evans only shows that an auditor is not an agent of the shareholders for the purpose of binding them so as to deprive them of relief on the ground of acquiescence. Putting Locking's duty as low as possible, it was his business to see whether the balance-sheets could be framed from the books without violating the articles, which he ought to have looked at. If directors have performed their duty, and have been badly advised, they may escape liability: London Financial Association v. Kelk, 26 Ch. D. 167, 32 W. R. Dig. 41; but here the directors took no steps to inform themselves, and delegated their duties to Crabtree, and they are liable according to the test supplied by the decision in Rance's case.

Aug. 9.—Stirling, J.—It is settled by decisions of the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal that the capital of a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862, can be legally applied only for the purposes specified in the memorandum of association, and creditors and other persons dealing with the company are entitled to act in the faith that no part of the capital will be applied for any other purpose, and, in particular, that no part of the capital will be returned to the shareholders except in the cases and under the safeguards in and under which a reduction of capital is permitted by the various Acts of Parliament.

If (as is alleged) the directors paid dividends out of capital, their acts in that respect were beyond the powers of the company and contrary to law.

It was contended on behalf of the defendants, and I think rightly, that upon the true construction of article 80 dividends were payable (not, as in the Oxford case, out of realized profits, "or profits tangible for the purpose of division," but as in Stringer's case, out of estimated profits. In the words of Lord Justice Giffard, in the last-mentioned case, the dividends were to be paid "out of profits, although those profits were not profits in hand." The articles of association contain provisions with reference to the mode in which the accounts were to be prepared and made up for the purpose of being submitted to the shareholders.

The law as regards the case with respect to the payment of dividends out of capital is, perhaps, not yet properly settled. It follows from the decisions in In re National Funds Assurance Co. and Flitcroft's case that directors who make such payments, either with actual knowledge that the capital of the company is being misappropriated, or with knowledge of the facts that establish the misappropriation, are liable as for a breach of trust. The present case does not fall within those which I have just mentioned, for I am unable, on the evidence before me, to arrive at the conclusion that the directors had actual knowledge of the real state of the company's affairs.

I have, however, the guidance of the recent judgment of Kay, J., in In re Oxford Benefit Building and Investment Society, a case which was almost exclusively relied on by counsel for the plaintiff, and which, although it is not precisely identical with the present, nevertheless closely resembles it in many of its features. The judgment was given after an elaborate argument by a very eminent counsel, and after full consideration by the learned judge who decided it, and it is certainly an authority not to be departed from by a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction except on the clearest grounds. In that case, as in the present, it was contended that directors, who had continually paid dividends out of capital, could not be made liable unless their conduct amounted to fraud. "From that proposition," says the learned judge, "I must express my dissent," and he accordingly held that directors who had omitted to lay before the shareholders proper accounts of income and expenditure and balance-sheets, and who acted negligently or carelessly as regards the ascertaining of the profits which they professed to divide, were jointly and severally liable to repay the sums improperly paid out of capital by way of dividend.

It was, however, contended on behalf of the defendants that the case of the Oxford Benefit Building Society was inconsistent with previous decisions which were binding on me, and in support of that proposition there were cited Overend Gurney v. Gibb, Turquand v. Marshall, and other cases of the same class. These, however, are distinguishable on the ground that, as I have already endeavoured to point out, that they relate to acts within the powers of the directors, and not to acts (such as payment of dividend out of capital) which are beyond the legal powers of the directors as of the company. The law prohibits the payment of dividend out of capital, and it may well be that directors are called upon to exercise greater care when they are in danger of violating such prohibition than when they apply the capital for purposes unquestionably within the objects of the company. So if a company were formed for the purpose of working a mine, it might be the duty of those engaged in superintending its operations to exercise greater care when they approach the neighbours' property, and are in danger of committing a trespass, than when the scene of action is undeniably within the boundaries of the company's property.

Another case cited, and one which undoubtedly is in point, is Rance's case, decided in 1870. It was there sought to compel a director to refund a dividend or bonus alleged to have been improperly paid out of capital, and the application came in the first instance before Lord Romilly, who in his judgment laid it down that "In order to make directors liable in a case like this there must be either proof of distinct fraud, or else of such gross and wilful negligence as is equivalent to fraud"; and he held that in the particular case the director was not liable. If this statement of the law had been adopted by the Court of Appeal (who reversed Lord Romilly's decision) it would no doubt have been a strong authority in favour of the defendants, but neither of the very eminent judges who then constituted the Court of Appeal appears to me to take that view of the law. [The learned judge here referred in detail to the judgments of the Lord Justices in Rance's case, and continued:—] It seems to me that the views expressed by the learned judges who decided Rance's case are consistent with the proposition that directors who are proved to have in fact paid a dividend out of capital, fail to excuse themselves if they have not taken reasonable care to secure the preparation of estimates and statements of account such as it was their duty to prepare and to submit to the shareholders, and have declared the dividends complained of without having exercised thereon their judgment as mercantile men on the estimates and statements of account submitted to them, and if this be so the Oxford case does not in my opinion conflict with Rance's case. It was in my opinion the duty of the auditor not to confine himself merely to the task of verifying the arithmetical accuracy of the balance-sheet, but to inquire into its substantial accuracy, and to ascertain that it contained the particulars specified in the articles of association (and consequently a proper income and expenditure account), and was properly drawn up so as to be a true and correct representation of the state of the company's affairs. The preparation of these statements of account and balance-sheets was entirely intrusted to the defendant Crabtree, who was originally a director, but who became secretary and manager of the company at the salary of £200, out of which he was to pay a clerk. The terms of his employment were subsequently altered by resolutions of the directors.

On the 14th of May, 1872, a resolution was passed whereby the directors, "in consideration of the success which has attended the company's operations during the past year in enabling the directors to declare a dividend of six per cent.," granted to their manager and secretary, Crabtree, £100, being at the rate of £50 for each half per cent. dividend above five per cent.; this grant being also for his extra services in superintending the brickmaking. On the 24th of the same month it was proposed, "That the directors shall pay to the manager and secretary, Mr. James Crabtree, a salary of £275 per annum, out of which he shall find and pay the salaries of all clerks and assistants, and when and as often as it shall appear by the annual balance-sheet that the company has in any one year actually realized sufficient net profits that will pay to the shareholders a dividend or dividends exceeding £5 per cent., the manager and secretary shall have an additional sum of £25 for every one per cent. of such profits available for dividend over and above five per cent. per annum." There is another similar resolution in April, 1874.

Of the history of Crabtree previously to his connection with the company we only know that he had been manager of a flax mill in France. Of his qualification to make "estimates of account" mentioned in the articles of association there is no evidence; but all such estimates as were in fact made were made by him. He was prevented by illness from being examined before the court. A witness skilled in actuarial calculations says of him that, judging by the mode in which he kept the books of the company, he was not competent to make such calculations. He seems, however, to have been perfectly acquainted with the ordinary book-keeping, and accounts prepared under his directions in the years 1880 and 1882 convince me that he perfectly understood the nature of an ordinary profit and loss account, and was capable of framing such an account of income and expenditure as is required by articles 87 and 88.

The accounts were from 1870 to 1880 audited by the defendant Locking, who was, at the time of his original appointment as auditor, a clerk in a bank, and has since become the manager of a branch of the same bank. As to his qualifications the chairman of the company said: "As far as I knew Locking was sufficiently skilled to act as auditor; we believed him to be a man of fair ability, and well qualified to fulfil the duty placed in his hands." For the performance of that duty he received, at first, a fee of five guineas, then seven, then twelve.

The business of the company consisted, to a very considerable extent, of lending money on mortgage on the terms that the money lent, together with an addition representing interest, should be repaid by equal monthly instalments extending over a period of years. Thus one of the first transactions of the company was the advance of a sum of £600 on mortgage, in order to receive the sum of £744, payable in six years by monthly instalments of £10 6s. 8d. Such advances were termed "long loans." All the balance-sheets presented by the directors to the general meetings are in the same form. They purport to consist of a "share account," a "cash account," a "stock account," and a "profit and loss account." The first contains merely a statement as to the issued and unissued shares. The second, or "cash account," is merely an account of receipts and payments in which capital and income are mixed up together, and is plainly not such a statement of income and expenditure as is prescribed by articles 87 and 88. The "stock account," on some of the details in which I shall presently comment, appears to be in the nature of an estimate of account, prepared with a view to showing a profit. "The profit and loss account" is not such an account as one would expect to be so designated, but simply shows the proposed mode of application of the balance appearing from the stock account. There is nowhere contained any such statement of income and expenditure as the articles require, and this must have been obvious to any man of business who considered the matter. Taking the first statement of account—that for 1870—we find in the stock account an item, "moneys lent, £933." This does not represent, as primâ facie it might be taken to do, the sum total of advances made by the company to borrowers, but includes prospective interest in respect of long loans expected to be received by the company to the amount of £150 7s. 8d. This interest is taken at its full numerical value, although the payment of it is spread over five or six years, and both it and the principal sum advanced are assumed to be fully secured. By taking this interest in this way, the stock account is made to show a surplus of £116 6s. 7d., of which there is divided as profit £113 3s. 4d., and a sum of £3 1s. 3d. (which alone represents anything in the shape of discount) is carried over. It is plain that this dividend was partly, at least, paid out of capital. The balance-sheets for 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874 contain similar items for moneys lent, the amounts being arrived at in precisely the same way as in the balance-sheet for 1870. In the balance-sheets for 1874 and 1875 there is a difference. The item, "moneys lent," computed in the same way as before, continues to appear in the account, but there are some items under the head of "deferred interest" on the debit side. Those items do not, however, comprise the whole of the deferred or prospective interest on the long loans. Thus the item of deferred interest in 1874 is £3,030, whereas the total prospective interest then expected to be received by the company was £5,386 7s. 8d.; and in 1875 the amount appearing in the accounts was £4,155, the actual amount being £6,969 5s. 3d. From 1876 to 1880 the item of deferred interest falls out of the accounts, and we find simply the item of "moneys lent" on the credit side. This item no longer represents the full nominal amount of the principal and interest, but in each year a deduction (falling short of the total amount of prospective interest) is made. Thus in 1876 the total amount of prospective interest secured by the company being £9,594 2s. 11d., the deduction is £7,150. Beyond the deductions so made no allowance or provision was ever made for bad debts or losses or contingencies of any kind. All securities taken by the company appear to have been treated as sufficient to provide for the whole of the moneys (whether principal or interest) purported to be thereby secured. No such sums as those deducted in respect of prospective interest appear in the books of the company. Two expert witnesses examined on behalf of the plaintiffs state that these deductions are purely arbitrary, and cannot be referred to any principle. They are so contrived, however, that in each year a dividend of ten per cent. is paid, and a small sum under £50 carried forward. No attempt to explain the nature of these deductions has been made by any expert evidence on the part of the defendants, and I have come to the conclusion that they were simply made for the purpose of showing a profit sufficient for the payment of such a dividend as I have mentioned.

As against Crabtree this is established beyond question, by means of a deposition made by himself, which is evidence against him, though not against the other defendants. Being examined he says, "The principle on which we ascertained the sum of £4,855 18s. 10d. as margin was that we first ascertained the amount required for dividend and then left the balance of deferred interest as a margin. We did so in the subsequent year up to our stoppage. We first declared a dividend of ten per cent. and then treated the difference between the dividend declared and the deferred interest as a margin. In making up our balance-sheet, we first took ascertained items on both sides, then we calculated the amount required for dividend, and filled in the amount of moneys lent so as to balance the two sides. In my judgment these balance-sheets were prepared by Crabtree simply and solely with the view to the declaration of the dividend, and not with the object of exhibiting a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs. It is to be observed throughout that no statement of income and expenditure, such as prescribed by articles 87 and 88, was ever submitted to the directors or shareholders. The accounts already mentioned as having been prepared under Crabtree's direction 1880 and 1882 show that the preparation of such statements was perfectly feasible. The reason why they were not submitted to the shareholders is not, in my judgment, far to seek. The accounts prepared for 1880 and 1882 show loss, and the researches of the official liquidator prove that every such statement, except for the year 1876, must (according to the system of book-keeping adopted by Crabtree) have shown a large loss.

Such being the balance-sheets, I now turn to the certificates of the auditor. That for 1870 is as follows:—"I certify that I have examined the above accounts and find them to be a true copy of those shown in the books of the company. The vouchers and receipts correspond in all cases with the payments debited. I have gone carefully into the items as shown in the stock account, and consider the dividend which it is proposed to declare a just and fair division."

I have heard such explanations as Mr. Locking gave with reference to the certificate given in 1870, but I am unable to accept them. I do not believe that he, a bank clerk, and who may therefore be presumed to have known something of discount, could have failed to see that the balance-sheet of 1870 did not truly represent the state of the company's affairs. Indeed, the spirit in which Mr. Locking approached the balance-sheets may be inferred from the letter addressed by him to the directors in 1871. The auditor's reports are not in any sense such reports as are prescribed by article 101. It is true, in one sense, as stated in them, that the accounts to which the certificates are appended are copies of those shown in the books of the company, for, in each year, there was inserted in the ledger of the company a share account, a cash account, and a profit and loss account, as shown in the printed balance-sheet. But, except in this most literal sense, the certificates are not in accordance with fact; no such items as "Money lent, £21,289 9s. 8d.," or "Deferred Interest Account, £3,030," which occurs in the stock account for 1874, are to be found in the books of the company, and similar remarks apply to similar items to be found in the subsequent balance-sheets. The defendant Locking stated in his evidence that he did not, during the period of his auditorship, see the articles of association of the company. This statement, if true, seems to afford no excuse for him, for he admitted he knew of their existence, but it would afford some evidence as to the degree of care which the directors bestowed on the instructions given to him. Mr. Locking stated in his evidence that he did not consider it part of his duty to ascertain whether the deductions made by Crabtree were sufficient, or upon what principle they were made, and he admitted them to be arbitrary deductions which Crabtree considered sufficient. As regards the securities on which the moneys were lent, he appears to have simply asked whether they were considered to be fully equal to the amount stated, and to have accepted the statement that they were not only equal, but were worth much more than the amount placed against them. It appears, therefore, from his own evidence, that the duties of the auditors, as defined by the articles of association, were not in reality discharged by him.

Now the directors were all men of business, and appear to have regularly attended both the board meetings and general meetings of the company. Each of the directors, parties to this action, says that he was ignorant of the mode in which the balance-sheets were prepared, and of the inaccuracies contained in them, and that he trusted entirely in Crabtree and Locking. I see no reason to doubt these statements. Still the fact remains that they did not require either that Crabtree should present accounts or that Locking should report upon them in the form and manner prescribed by the articles of association, and I cannot but attach considerable importance to this circumstance, for if the annual accounts of income and expenditure had year after year shown (in accordance with the fact) that no profit was earned, it is almost impossible to suppose that the attention of members and possibly creditors of the company would not have been directed to the question whether or not dividends could, under the circumstances, have been properly paid; and the crisis in the company's affairs, which actually occurred in 1882, would, in all probability, have arisen at a much earlier period with the probable result that either a sounder mode of carrying on business would have been adopted, or else that the company would have been wound up before so great a loss was incurred. But the case does not rest there. In, or subsequently to, the year 1874 the attention of the directors was called to the item "Deferred Interest" which appeared in the stock accounts of 1874 and 1875: and they either then learned, or must be taken to have learned, that in each of the years 1870 to 1873 the item "Moneys lent" included not merely principal sums owing to the company, but the full nominal amount of the sums payable to the company in respect of future interest. The directors, as mercantile men, must have been aware that this particular asset was over-valued for each of the previous years, and that the accounts presented to the general meeting of the shareholders were erroneous, yet they take no step to ascertain the amount of the errors nor call on the auditor to explain how he came to report on them as he did. The defendant Shepherd, in his re-examination, stated that he believed the item "Deferred Interest" in the account for 1874 included all "Deferred Interest," so as to put the accounts right in previous years, but he did not profess that this belief was founded on any inquiry or examination; and indeed he admitted in his cross-examination that after 1876 he accepted Crabtree's figures for moneys lent and did not inquire how those moneys were arrived at or on what principle, and that he never formed any judgment of his own as to the correctness of the figures, but simply took them as correct. The same thing appears to be true of the other directors. I cannot believe that if they had been dealing with their own private business, and had throughout to make payments in respect of profits, they would, without any inquiry, have accepted the statements of a clerk, however able, as to the amount of those profits, more particularly if that very clerk had a direct interest in making out that a profit existed sufficient for the payment of a five per cent. dividend.

But there is another matter on these balance-sheets, which was much dwelt upon in argument on behalf of the plaintiffs, and which appeared to throw a light on the mode in which the directors dealt with the accounts presented to them by Crabtree. In the stock account for 1879-80 the freehold property of the company is entered at the value of £25,453 6s. 2d.; in the stock account for the following year 1880-81 the freehold property is entered at £28,043 17s. 5d., being an increase of £2,590 11s. 3d., of this difference £2,000 is, according to the evidence of the defendant Shepherd, attributable to an increase of value placed on certain freehold property know as the Albion-street property, part of which was occupied as the office of the plaintiff company. This property had, previously to 1880, been valued at £3,180, the amount of the cost price as it appeared in the books of the company. In 1879 or 1880 the company obtained from an insurance company a loan of £3,400 on the security of this property. No fresh valuation of the property was made on behalf of the plaintiff company, but it was stated to the directors by Crabtree that it had been valued by one Newsome on behalf of the insurance company at £5,000. On this mere statement, without requiring Crabtree to produce the valuation, which apparently Crabtree himself never saw, or even procuring any copy of it or communicating in any way with Newsome, the directors considered themselves justified in presenting to the shareholders the accounts in which the value of the property, previously taken at £3,180, was increased by £2,000; with the result that the company was thereby enabled to show an amount of profit for the year of £212 5s. No evidence has been given as to the existence of Newsome's valuation or the amount or terms of it. Now I do not say that a trading company, formed as this was for the purpose of engaging in speculative dealings with land, may not from time to time have valuations of the properties which it has acquired in the course of its operations, and I do not stop to inquire whether the permanent office of the company stands in any different position from other property. Neither do I say that where the articles of association authorize (as in the present case) the payment of dividends upon an estimate of accounts, the directors may not, in proposing or recommending dividends, act upon the valuation so made from time to time. The present case appears to me to be widely different. No real estimate of the value of the property was made, and I cannot think that the directors acted as prudent men of business, or as they would have done in conducting their own private affairs, in acting on the unsupported statement of their secretary as to the existence of a valuation which he never saw, and thus converting accounts which would have otherwise shown a loss into accounts showing a profit available for the payment of a dividend of five per cent. [His lordship having read some of the evidence continued:—]

The conclusion at which I have arrived upon a consideration of the whole evidence is that the directors never exercised any judgment at all with reference to these accounts, but accepted, without inquiry or verification, whatever Crabtree and Locking told them. In this respect they failed to perform the duty cast upon them by the articles of association. That duty was to cause estimates of accounts to be prepared and upon these estimates to recommend a dividend. In the performance of that duty they were no doubt entitled to avail themselves of the advice and assistance of their secretary and manager, and to obtain by that advice and assistance such materials as were proper for the purpose of enabling them to recommend a dividend; but, having so done, they were bound to exercise their judgment as mercantile men on the materials which they had obtained. This, in my opinion, they never did, but in truth delegated to Crabtree the exercise of that judgment and discretion which it was their duty to take upon themselves. Upon the whole, although the directors were, I believe, ignorant of the true state of the company's affairs, and although I find no trace of their having acted with the view of obtaining an improper benefit for themselves, I feel compelled to hold that they have fallen short of that standard of care which, having regard to the Oxford case, they ought to have applied to the affairs of the company in the following respects: (1) They never required the statement of accounts and balance-sheets to be made out in the manner prescribed by the articles; (2) they failed properly to instruct the auditor, or at all events to require him, to report on the accounts and balance-sheets in the mode prescribed by the articles; and (3) they were content throughout to act on the statements of Crabtree, without inquiry and verification of any kind, other than the imperfect audit of the accounts by Locking. Those accounts and balance-sheets did not truly represent the state of the company's affairs; and, that being so, I think that, according to what is laid down in Rance's case, the onus is laid on them to show that the dividends which they paid were paid out of profits. This, upon the evidence before me, they fail to do. The liquidator has made out a series of balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts such as ought to have been prepared by the directors in accordance with the articles of association. In those accounts the figures (with the exception of those relating to long loans) are taken from the books and accounts of the company. The instalments received in respect of long loans have been dealt with in the same way as similar payments were dealt with in the Oxford case—that is, the first instalment is treated as applied in payment, in the first place, of the interest up to the time of payment on the whole principal sum advanced, and next in payment of part of the principal. The second instalment is treated as applied in payment, in the first place, of the interest on the reduced principal, and the next in payment of a further portion of the principal, and so on. The rate of interest has been ascertained in each case by an actuarial calculation in which the principal sum lent by the company is taken to be the present value of the monthly or other instalments agreed to be paid by the borrower for a term of years. In this way, according to the expert evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs (which has not been met by any expert evidence whatever on the part of the defendants), the very utmost sum which could be properly treated as income has been ascertained. The result is that in every year a loss appears to have been incurred, and consequently in every year the dividend was paid out of capital. It was admitted by the plaintiffs' expert witnesses that these calculations were of considerable difficulty, and required actuarial skill which the directors of the company did not, and could not be expected to, possess; and it was contended on their behalf that the making of an estimate of accounts for the purpose of declaring a dividend was a piece of work which could not be done by themselves, but could only be done upon the advice of skilled persons; that they took and accepted in good faith the advice of such skilled persons—namely, Crabtree and Locking; and that even if it turned out that such advice was erroneous, the directors ought not to be held liable. In order that this argument might prevail it would seem to me to be necessary that stronger evidence than was adduced by the defendants should have been given of the fitness of Crabtree and Locking for the task assigned to them; but, in truth, it does not appear to me that there was any such difficulty as suggested in dealing with the accounts of the company from a business point of view. It possibly may have been a task of some difficulty to ascertain with mathematical accuracy the precise sum which in any year could be treated as profits, just as (to recur to an illustration which I have already made) it might be difficult in working a mine underground to ascertain with precise geometrical accuracy the boundary which corresponded in the underground workings to one defined on the surface; nevertheless it would be easy in the case of the mine to make sure practically that the mining operations were confined within the proper limits; and possibly this result might be attained in more ways than one. In the present case the evidence convinces me that there was no difficulty at all in forming (possibly in various ways) estimates of those profits which would have been perfectly sufficient for the purpose of business men, and would have prevented the payment of dividends out of capital. Not one of the directors has applied his mind to the formation of any such estimates. Everything was left in the hands of Crabtree, with the result that, according to the balance-sheets prepared by the liquidators in a manner most favourable to the directors, a sum of £3,394 18s. 10d. has been paid out of the capital of the company in the shape of dividends. The several defendants who were directors at the time when these dividends were respectively paid are, in my judgment, jointly and severally liable for the amounts improperly paid away in each year of their directorship, and must (as in the Oxford case) be ordered to repay such amounts, with interest at 4 per cent.

It is further sought to make the directors liable for sums amounting to £540 2s. 6d. paid to themselves as remuneration, and the sums amounting to £900 paid as bonuses to Crabtree under the resolutions to which I have referred. The directors were not entitled to any remuneration nor was Crabtree entitled to any bonus unless the company paid a dividend of five per cent. The balance-sheets prepared by the liquidator show that in no year could any such dividend have been properly paid, and in accordance with the decision in the Oxford case, I must hold that the directors are liable to make good the sums in question.

I have next to consider the liability of Crabtree. It was his duty, as the secretary and manager, to prepare balance-sheets such as were required by the articles, and exhibiting a true and correct view of the state of the company's affairs. He never prepared any account of income and expenditure at all, and the balance-sheets prepared by him did not and were not intended to represent truly the state of the company's affairs; and, as I have already stated, I think that if proper accounts had been prepared either the company's course of business would have been altered or its career brought to an earlier close. It was hardly contended that he was not liable for the bonuses which were paid to him on the faith of the accounts and balance-sheets which he prepared; and it further appears to me that, as the balance-sheets were prepared for the purpose of showing that a dividend was payable, and on the face of them treated the dividends which were actually paid as properly payable, the payment of those dividends was the natural and immediate consequence of the breach of duty on Crabtree's part, and he is liable for damages to the amount of the dividends so paid.

Locking, the auditor, also appears to me to have been guilty of a breach of duty to the company. He has, however, pleaded the Statute of Limitations by way of defence, and the plaintiffs, without arguing the question, have admitted the validity of the plea, which will cover all the accounts except those for the years 1878-9 and 1879-80. In each of those years Locking certified that the accounts were a true copy of those shown in the books of the company. That certificate would naturally be understood to mean that the books of the company showed (for example) that on the 30th of April, 1879, the company were entitled to "moneys lent" to the amount of £29,515 16s. This was not in accordance with fact, and the accounts in this respect did not truly represent the state of the company's affairs, and it was a breach of duty on Locking's part to certify as he did in reference to them. The payment of the dividends actually paid in those years appears to be the natural and immediate consequence of such breach of duty, and I hold Locking liable to the amount of dividends so paid.

His lordship made an order as to the general costs against the directors, Crabtree, and Locking. As to Whitaker, limited to such costs as the plaintiffs would have been entitled to if the case against him had only referred to the one dividend in 1882 declared while he was a director. The order in the Oxford case to be followed.

EVANS v. MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Canal company — Subsidence due to mine-owner — Injury by percolation to adjacent owner—Liability for damage.

A canal company, under the powers of a special Act, constructed a canal, which subsequently became vested in a railway company, subject to the same rights and duties as the canal company had held it. A mill was built close to the canal, and, by reason of the owner of the mines and minerals under the canal working them, the mill and canal subsided, but the railway company retained the canal at the original level by elevating the banks on both sides. Water percolated through the banks and damaged the mill.

Held, that the company were liable for negligence in not preventing the water from percolating, and that the fact that the mine-owner's working the mines was the ultimate cause of the injury did not affect their liability.

Held, further, that, as the subsidence could not have been prevented, and could not be prevented in the future, no injunction ought to be granted, but the plaintiff must claim compensation under the provisions in the special Act.

Trial of action.

By the Act 34 Geo. 3, c. xxvi., a company was incorporated under the name of "The Company of Proprietors of the Peak Forest Canal," with power to make and maintain a canal called "The Peak Forest Canal." The canal was made, and in pursuance of subsequent Acts became vested in the defendants, the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., with all the powers and subject to all the duties and liabilities of the Canal Co.

The Act incorporating the company contained the following clauses relating to damage caused by the canal.

Section 15. "If any injury or damage shall happen to be done to the owner or occupier of any mill, edifice, lands, or hereditaments by the breach of any reservoir to be made for the purpose of the said intended canal or cut or any of the locks or works of the said navigation, or by the water flowing from the said canal or cut or any such reservoir, or from any other accident, then and in every such case full compensation shall be made to the owner and occupier of and all other persons interested in any such mill, edifice, lands, or hereditaments by the said company of proprietors for all such injury and damage, which injuries and damages, and the compensation to be made in respect thereof, shall be settled and determined or assessed by the ways and means herein directed with respect to other damages to be done by making and completing the said navigation.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 27 provided for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the amount of such damages.

Section 51 provided that if the owner of any mine should work near the canal so as to endanger or damage the same, it should be lawful for the company to treat with the owner of the mine, and, in case the company and the owner disagreed, the commissioners or jury were to assess what satisfaction the mine owner ought to receive from the company, on payment of which the owner was to be perpetually restrained from working the mine within the limits for which satisfaction extended. In the year 1849 the Union Mill, Dukinfield, was built contiguous to the canal, and eventually became vested in the plaintiff, the executor under the will of Miss Anne Evans. The plaintiff alleged that, owing to the defective construction or present state of the canal of the defendant company immediately adjoining to the Union Mill, considerable quantities of water had, by reason of the negligence of the defendant company, flowed from the canal into the Union Mill, and caused damage thereto, and that if such passage of water were allowed to continue, the mill would be greatly injured, and its letting value seriously diminished. The owner of the minerals under the canal had commenced to work the minerals, causing a subsidence under the mill as well as under the canal. The defendant company, in order to maintain their canal at its original level, raised the banks, and the mill continuing to sink bodily was, at the date of the action being brought, some nine feet below the canal instead of being above it.

The other facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Barber, Q.C., Jeune, and Farwell, for the plaintiff.—A public body is bound to take all reasonable precautions, whether under their powers by common law or under their statutory powers, to secure the rights of other persons from injury: Geddis v. Proprietors of the Bann Reservoir, 3 App. Cas. 430, 26 W. R. Dig. 259. There was no express liability in that case on the proprietors to cleanse the Muddock, but Lord Hatherley clearly indicated they were so liable. Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 E. & I. App. 330, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 17, also lays down the rule quite clearly. If the railway company, or, rather, their predecessors, had exercised proper precautions, they could have prevented the escape of the water, but they merely bought the surface owner's rights without making arrangements which would have prevented the owner of the minerals from working them so as to lower the canal. Unless it can be shown that what has happened would necessarily have happened when they carried out the statutory obligation on them of bringing the water where it was, then, on the principle of those cases, they are liable. It comes to this, according to Fletcher v. Rylands, if you bring a wild beast upon your premises, you insure and guarantee that he will be kept there safely, negligence or no negligence; but if an Act of Parliament permits you to bring the wild beast there, then the person who complains has to show that you have not performed your duty in keeping him there: Dunn v. The Birmingham Canal Co., 20 W. R. 573, L. R. 7 Q. B. 244, 21 W. R. 266, L. R. 8 Q. B. 42; Bagnall v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., 10 W. R. 232, 7 H. & N. 423; Sellors v. The Local Board of Health for Matlock, Bath, 14 Q. B. D. 928, 33 W. R. Dig. 127; Flower v. The Local Board of Low Leyton, 25 W. R. 423, 5 Ch. D. 347. It does not relieve the defendants that it was a third party who actually caused the injury by working the mines: Dunn v. The Company of Proprietors of the Birmingham Canal Navigation, 21 W. R. 266, L. R. 8 Q. B. 42. If the plaintiff shows negligence a right of action arises, and this is not a case for the application of the compensation clauses. [Kekewich, J.—As I understand the case cited, the neglect to purchase the mines, which certainly might have been done, was not negligence, and as at present advised I should not see my way to holding that neglect to buy the mines was negligence. "Neglect at your own peril" and "negligence" are two very different things.] The existence of a compensation clause does not make any difference to our right of action: The Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill and others, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193. The ratio decidendi there is that a small-pox hospital may be established without being a nuisance, and therefore it shall be so established. The last case on this kind of question is The Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, 33 W. R. 892, 15 Q. B. D. 1. The company here are, no doubt, expressly authorized to raise the canal, if there is a subsidence, so as to keep the canal open for navigation. It would be no answer to an action for damages for the company to refer to an Act of Parliament if they simply turn their water down the bank on either side. They have piled water on the top of water without any banks on either side.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Sampson, for the defendants.—The plaintiff must establish negligence against the defendants. Compensation under the 15th clause of the Act is the only remedy they have left. The main scheme of the Act was to form a convenient tribunal for assessing all species of injury which could be in any sense incidental to carrying out the undertaking. The real wrongdoer in this case was the mine-owner, who let down the surface by working his mines. The canal is there under a statutory power; hence the owners of it cannot be made liable for the negligence of a third person in reference to it. The plaintiff himself substituted a wall for the bank of the canal, and must, therefore, take the consequences of any percolation.

Barber, Q.C., in reply.—There ought to be an injunction granted in this case, as the damage is irremediable. There should also be an inquiry. It is for the canal company at their own expense and risk to keep the water in, and that liability is clear on the Act. Then, as to whether the plaintiff should have retained the mines, the defendants might have purchased them when they heard they were to be worked. Charles v. Finchley Local Board, 31 W. R. 717, 23 Ch. D. 767, shows that even if the damage is caused by a third party that makes no difference, the persons directly responsible can be sued. If the defendants succeed it would be saying that on every subsidence the mill-owners ought to raise the bank, and not the canal owners.

Kekewich, J.—I have always thought, and still think, that it would be a very great advantage to the public (by which I mean that portion of the public which happens for the time being to be represented by suitors in the High Court) if there were some summary method of determining what points in a complicated case ought to be tried before the court itself at the trial, and what points, whether of law or fact, should be determined beforehand, so that directions might be given for inquiries on the spot if necessary, and for the settlement of the case, stating the facts, and, if necessary stating the issues. Some progress has been made of late years towards that end; but practically it has amounted to very little. I remember hearing so experienced a judge as the late Lord Justice Lush say that something of the kind ought to be done, and regret the waste of time and money occasioned by the inability of the court to deal with cases in the way which I have suggested; but, notwithstanding his regret, and, no doubt, his anxious endeavour to bring about the desired result, it has never yet been done, and no one knows better than myself that there are enormous difficulties in the way of doing anything of the kind. Still, I cannot neglect the opportunity of expressing my opinion that, in the interests of the public, it is extremely desirable something of the kind should be done.

It seems to me there are several questions of fact to be decided in this case—practically four. [The learned judge here specified the four questions of fact, and held on the evidence, first, that there was water on the plaintiff's premises, coming from the canal; secondly, that this was caused, in the first instance, by the subsidence occasioned by mining works under the canal and the mill; thirdly, that this water caused some damage to the plaintiff, but there was no satisfactory evidence to show that this damage was more than nominal; fourthly, that the injury occasioned by the presence of water coming from the canal was not preventible in the past, and would not be preventible in the future, by any reasonable means and at any reasonable cost. The learned judge proceeded as follows:—]

The first question of law I have to consider is this—Are the defendants liable for damages in the past, and will they be so in the future? It is the same question. If they are liable for the damages in the past, they will be liable for the damages in the future, if it occurs.

As to the legal principles applicable to the facts, generally speaking, every man may use his own property as pleaseth him best, but this use must be such as not to cause injury to his neighbour—that is, harm or loss of that kind which is regarded by English law as the subject of civil action. If, therefore, he chooses to bring on to his own land water, stench, or filth, he must keep it there at his own peril. If it escapes, he is liable for the injury caused, and it is no answer to say, "I could not help it; I took the best advice, I employed the best workmen, and I have done everything that modern science could suggest, but the circumstances have been too much for me, and the injury has been caused against my will and against my best endeavours."

The injured neighbour is entitled to reply, "You should have thought of this before you exercised your right of property, as you were entitled to do; and the consequences are also yours." That is an imperfect summary of the case of Fletcher v. Rylands, which is a case of extreme interest to lawyers and also to the public, and all the more so because it went to the House of Lords, and the doctrine there established is established by that paramount authority, but the judgments in the House of Lords were not much more than an affirmation of the full and considered judgment of Blackburn, J., in the Court of Exchequer Chamber. In that judgment he uses that language which is referred to by Lord Cairns as being a statement of the true rule of law:—"He" (that is, the person who brings on his land a wild beast, or water, filth, or stench, and allows it to escape) "can excuse himself by showing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default; or, perhaps, that the escape was due to vis major or the act of God." Of course, it will be an answer to a plaintiff that he has contributed, or mainly contributed, to that which he is complaining of; but the only other two examples which the learned judge admits as possible are vis major and the act of God. That judgment of Blackburn, J.'s, which deserves to be read at length and studied, affirmed a judgment of Bramwell, B. Bramwell, B., dissented from the other barons of the Court of Exchequer in the court below; so that, even apart from the high authority of the House of Lords, it had that high authority that attaches to every judgment of Lord Bramwell's and the present Lord Blackburn. Of course, being a decision of the House of Lords, it could not be departed from properly; but, as far as I am aware, there has been no decision which in the slightest degree impugns the principle as laid down in that case—a principle which, it must be observed, is very neatly expressed in a headnote in the report of the case in the Exchequer of the judgment of Bramwell, B., (3 H. & C. 774):—"That the defendant was responsible on the ground that he had caused water to flow into the plaintiff's colliery, which, but for the defendant's acts, would not have gone there."

Then I have to consider, is this principle applicable to a railway or canal company, which is a body empowered by Act of Parliament to take land, and thereon to construct such and such works, or to employ such and such machines, that is to say, coming within the wild beast class. In some sense railway companies and canal companies exercise merely rights of ownership, but, on the other hand, much that they do is done by reason of their statutory powers, and what can be referred to those powers must be treated as done under those powers. There are many things in our ordinary experiences of everyday life that a railway company does which has nothing to do with their statutory powers. If they employ a cart to carry material, it can scarcely be said that their liability in consequence of improper drawing or any other carelessness has anything to do with their statutory power. They would be sued in such a case as the owner of the cart would be sued. These are not the cases which we have to deal with here. The greater part of their acts are necessarily and properly referred to their statutory powers. Lord Blackburn, in Geddis v. The Proprietors of the Bann Reservoir, says, "I take it that it is now thoroughly well established that no action will lie for doing that which the Legislature has authorized, if it be done without negligence, although it did occasion damage to anyone; that an action does lie for doing that which the Legislature has authorized, if it be done with negligence, and I think that, if by reasonable exercise of the powers either given by statute to the promoters or which they have at common law the damage can be prevented, it is within this rule negligence not to make such reasonable exercise of their powers." That is the distinction drawn there with reference to these companies, and, subject to one exception, I find no departure from that in other cases. The one exception is that which depends on The King v. Pease and Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Co. In those two cases it was held that where the Legislature has authorized in an unqualified manner the use by a railway company of a certain machine, as, for instance, a locomotive engine, from which necessarily sparks are occasionally thrown out, the company are not liable for the ordinary use of that machine so authorized. There have been attempts from time to time to pass away those decisions, by holding in different cases that there has not been an unqualified authority given by the Legislature. A case of that class is Jones v. The Festiniog Railway Co., where the railway company did not in the first instance contemplate the use of locomotives, and, therefore, the court saw its way to holding that as the damage was caused by a locomotive there was no acquired authority, and that the case did not fall within The King v. Pease and Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Co. But Lord Bramwell more than once, I think I am right in saying, expressed his disapproval of those cases, and in the case of Powell v. Fall, 5 Q. B D. 597, he distinctly said they were wrongly decided. He said that the arguments he had heard in that particular case of Powell v. Fall hardened his previous conviction that The King v. Pease and Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Co. were wrongly decided, and not only did Baggallay and Thesiger, L.JJ., agree in the decision, but it was a decision which affirmed a decision of Mellor, J., and in which he managed to distinguish the two cases without overruling them, but evidently did not desire to follow them unless he was obliged to. Therefore, I think, we may regard those two cases now as practically out of the way, and consider the law laid down by Lord Blackburn in that case in the House of Lords as really stating the whole principle without any such exception as was introduced by those two cases. Has there been any negligence here on the part of the defendants?

In order to consider the difficult question of negligence I must consider what negligence means. Bowen, L.J., in a recent case, thus states it:—"The ideas of negligence and duty are strictly co-relative, and there is no such thing as negligence in the abstract. Negligence is simply neglect of some care which we are bound by law to exercise towards somebody." Now I have to consider what was the care which the defendants were bound by law to exercise towards the plaintiff. Applying the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, the case seems to me to be plain enough. They were bound to prevent, if they could, the escape of water from their canal to the plaintiff's premises. They were bound to exercise that care, and if, unfortunately by reason of some unforeseen acts which they could not reasonably have so anticipated as to prevent, the escape of water has occurred, they are bound to make compensation for their negligence and for the result of that negligence. I find no difficulty, having regard to the principle laid down in these cases, in finding that that care was not properly exercised. Therefore, having the duty neglected, I have also the negligence. But, I repeat, the negligence, to my mind, is not that of preventing the subsidence or preventing the consequences of subsidence, which could not be sufficiently foreseen, but in not making good the damage when the damage occurred or in not preventing damage at the moment of the occurrence, which, of course, was far more possible and, it may be said, altogether possible—that is to say, by not damming up the water by proper and sufficient puddling or walls at the moment that the subsidence took place and before the water actually escaped. This, to my mind, is the position, this is the want of the exercise of care; therefore the negligence and therefore the responsibility falls on the defendants.

I hold that here, in accordance with Mr. Henn Collins' argument, the mine-owner under the canal (it only applies to land under the canal) was a wrong-doer when he worked the mines under the canal so as to cause the subsidence. But, having got so far (and I think it necessary to say so much because the point has been urged), I, for my part, do not see that it leads to any consequence whatever. The mine-owner may have been wrong. Mr. Henn Collins argued that, because the mine-owner was wrong, the present plaintiff cannot sue. I am sure he meant to put an argument which was intelligible, and on grounds which were tenable, or at least arguable. But I have been unable myself to see the connection between the mine-owner and the plaintiff, having regard to the title which has been put in before me, which would justify me in saying that because the mine-owner was wrong in working the plaintiff cannot sue. Then it is said that here there is a wharf wall, and that that wall was built by the millowner. The wharf wall must, however, have been the wall of the defendant company. Whether it was built for the convenience of the millowner, whether it was built by the millowner as a matter of employment of his workmen, or whether it was paid for by the millowner, seems to me to be immaterial. It is the retaining wall of the canal, and the owners of the canal are bound to have a proper retaining wall—that is to say, in the shape of stone or puddle or something else they are bound to keep the water in, and if they have been foolish enough, for the sake of getting somebody else to pay for the erection of the wall for his convenience to allow him to put in an inefficient wall, that is their fault and not his. If they have any contract with him they may sue him upon the contract, but the wall I must regard, by whomsoever constructed, as the wall erected by the defendants' company in discharge of their duty to prevent the escape of water of the canal; and the mere fact that it has been used by the millowner as a wharf or as a boundary to his mill seems to me to be utterly immaterial. I lay down the defendants are liable for damages in the past occasioned by the escape of water from the canal into the plaintiff's premises consequent on the subsidence of the ground, and that they will be liable for like damage if it happens in the future.

Now I come to a very practical question. That being so, finding the facts mainly in the plaintiff's favour, finding the law also in the plaintiff's favour, what is the remedy; I confess to having had considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon this point. No doubt it is negligence in the sense of something not authorized by the Act of Parliament or negligent use of the company's powers, primâ facie, that give rise to a right of action; and if there were no clause in this particular Act of Parliament in the way, I should certainly hold in this case that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain an action against the defendants for the damage occasioned, and that he would be entitled again whenever that damage recurs.

But then I turn to the Act of Parliament, and I find there is a clause—clause 15—which provides as follows:—[His lordship then read the clause set out above.] Now the question I have to consider is whether what has happened here has happened by the water flowing from the said canal or cut or any such reservoir, or from any other accident. It has happened by the water flowing from the canal. That is my finding in the plaintiff's favour. There is no doubt about that. But then it is said, not by water flowing by reason of accident, but by reason of negligence. Now it seems to follow, and it does to my mind follow, from my conclusion that they could not have prevented this subsidence, and therefore could not have prevented the cause of the escape—that is, the causâ causans of the damage is an accident. I think I have already said that negligence arises after, not before, the accident occurs, not when the subsidence takes place, but when the water escapes by reason of that subsidence. It was not argued, either in opening the case or in the reply, that the defendants were liable for this subsidence by reason of their having permitted the mines to be worked. The point was not tenable, and was very properly not urged. That being so, and following my own conclusion, I think I must further hold that what has happened here is an accident within the meaning of this clause—an accident for which they are responsible in damages, and damages which must be, if the parties cannot unfortunately agree, assessed in the manner provided by the Act of Parliament, and not by reference to the chief clerk or to the official or other referee.

I have been very much pressed to grant an injunction. If I am right in the view which I take of that clause, of course I should not grant an injunction. It is a case provided for by the section for which damages must be assessed from time to time as damages accrue. But I think it is as well to say that in no event should I have granted an injunction in this case. I suggested to Mr. Barber that an injunction really, in a case of this kind, is of little value as against the defendant company, who can only be reached by sequestration; but, apart from that, I think it would be wrong to enjoin a company or an individual from permitting that to be done which is really beyond his control—not beyond his control in this sense, that there is a vis major or an act of God standing over him paramount, but beyond his control in the sense I have already mentioned, that it cannot be said that by any scientific means now available, by any precaution or by any works, he is able with any reasonable certainty to prevent that happening which all interested in the case contemplate as likely. I think it would be an extremely hard thing to move against a defendant for committal (and I must put it as if it were an individual defendant) because he has permitted that to be done—perhaps an escape of water suddenly in the night—which he could not foresee at that particular time, and could not reasonably prevent. My conclusion upon that part of the case, especially as regards the injunction, depends entirely upon my finding as regards the questions of fact which I mentioned at the commencement of my judgment. It may well be that, if my finding upon those questions are wrong, my conclusions as to the injunction are also wrong. The remedy ought to follow and ought to be made, as far as possible, commensurate with the right. The right depends upon the facts. I think that, because it would not be commensurate with the right, but would go far beyond that, I ought not, in any event, to grant an injunction, and if I am right in the construction I put upon this clause, I ought certainly not to grant an injunction.

The order will run that it is the opinion of the court that water has escaped from the canal to the plaintiff's premises, for which the defendant company are liable to make him compensation; and I see no reason, having regard to the evidence, why I should not further declare that the defendants are liable, and will be liable, to make good to the plaintiff any damage occasioned by the escape of water from the canal on to the plaintiff's premises consequent upon any further subsidence of the canal to the plaintiff's land. The evidence so clearly contemplates that further subsidence, and the question has been put in issue here, that I think there is no impropriety in doing that which is generally not desirable—namely, making a declaration with regard to the future.

I have only to deal with one more important subject, and that is the question of costs. I have on two important points decided in favour of the defendants. I have decided that they ought not to be enjoined, and I have also decided that the question of damages, which I must say again I look upon as a very trifling one, is to be determined in the way pointed out by the Act—the way which I suppose at present has no practical existence—and not by means of an inquiry; in other words, I have decided the question of construction of the Act on these points in their favour. But, on the other hand, I have looked through the pleadings carefully, and I am satisfied that, though every point was intended to be fairly raised on the pleadings to get the relative rights of the parties settled as far as they could be by the decision of the court, the defendants came here substantially to say, "We are not responsible to the plaintiff"; and they go even further than that, because they say, in the first place, there has been no injury done at all, and, further, we are not responsible to you if there has been any injury done. Upon these two questions, which are questions of substance, I have decided in favour of the plaintiff. I think the plaintiff has succeeded in the main, and that it is not a case in which I ought to distribute the costs; but having regard to the main question, and the result of the decision of the main question, the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the action, and on the higher scale.

Q. B. Div. (Stephen and Wills, JJ.) July 15, 20.

COLQUHOUN v. BROOKS. (a.)

Income tax—Business in Australia—Partner resident in England—Liability—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 100, 106, 108—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D.

A partner in a firm carrying on business solely at Melbourne himself resided wholly in England. A portion of this partner's share in the profits of the business was remitted to England, and was duly returned by him for assessment to income tax under schedule D. The larger portion, however, of his share was left in Australia, and had never been remitted to him in England, although standing to his credit in the books of the Australian firm. Upon appeal by the Crown,

Held, by Stephen, J. (dissentiente Wills, J.), that the respondent was liable in respect of the whole of his share as being "profits or gains arriving or accruing to a person residing in the United Kingdom from a trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere" within the meaning of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D.

By Wills, J., that the respondent's share of the profits not received by him in this country was "foreign property," and, as such, not liable under the Income Tax Acts.

Case stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Income Tax Commissioners on the requisition of the Surveyor of Taxes, who was the present appellant. The present respondent, Brooks, was a person who resided in England, but was a partner in a firm which carried on business exclusively in Australia. The Income Tax Commissioners were of opinion that Brooks was only liable to be assessed in respect of his interest in the Australian firm on the sums from time to time received by Brooks in England in respect of that interest. The Surveyor of Taxes considered that Brooks was liable in respect of the whole of his share in the profits of the Australian firm, whether received here or not.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and A. V. Dicey, for the appellant.—The respondent is liable to pay income tax on profits earned outside the United Kingdom. The Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and The Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428, are conclusive of this case. In those cases (as here) the profits were earned abroad; and about two-thirds of such profits were not received in England, yet all were held liable to income tax. Those cases were followed in Imperial Continental Gas Association v. Nicholson, 37 L. T. N. S. 717, 26 W. R. Dig. 102.

Charles, Q.C. (Jeune with him), for the respondent.—Profits which are earned abroad and are not received in the United Kingdom are not liable to income tax. In Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson the companies had a home in England, and the business was in fact carried on there by the directors. That case would apply if the present respondent carried on the business in Australia by means of his clerks, but it is in fact carried on by the partners who reside there. Sulley v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 711, reversing Attorney-General v. Sulley, 7 W. R. 666, 4 H. & N. 769, shows that these profits are not liable to income tax. Section 5 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 adopts the machinery for raising and levying income tax contained in 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, and that Act provides no means of levying a tax on profits earned abroad and not received in the United Kingdom. The rules in section 100, 106, and 108 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 limit the general language of schedule D., and are to be applied only to profits which are covered by schedule D. From section 106 of that Act it is clear that the business must be carried on either "wholly or in part in the United Kingdom," unless section 108 applies when the duty is to be "charged by the commissioners acting for the places at, or nearest to, which property shall have been first imported into the United Kingdom." These sections show that profits made abroad are to be taxed if and so far as they are sent into the United Kingdom. Moreover, by section 29 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 the respondent is to be taxed on dividends, &c., arising out of foreign investments when payable in the United Kingdom. Why should profits arising from a foreign business be liable, whether payable in the United Kingdom or not?

Dicey, in reply.—If the respondent comes within the words of schedule D. that is enough, for the schedule lays down the principle, and the machinery by which that principle is to be carried out cannot restrict it. Where it is intended to limit the words of schedule II. it is done expressly. By the structure of the various provisions of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 it is plain that the Legislature meant to include every kind of property yielding income: per Martin, B., in Attorney-General v. Black, L. R. 6 Ex., at p. 85.

Wills, J.—The question to be decided is whether a person resident in this country, a member of a firm which carries on business exclusively in the colony of Victoria, is liable to be assessed to the income tax in respect of the whole of his share of the profits of that business, or only of that portion which he actually receives in this country. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D., the duty is payable "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, to be charged on every 20s. of the annual amount of such profits and gains." It is contended by the Crown that these words are amply large enough to cover the present demand. It is replied by the respondent that the provisions of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, applicable to schedule D., more especially sections 100, 106, and 108, show that there must be some limitation to be inferred to the effect that the duty is chargeable only on the amounts received in this country from the business carried on abroad by the person charged. Undeniably the generality of the words in the first portion of the schedule is cut down by the above enactments of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 specifically enacting that the computation of profits on securities and possessions out of the United Kingdom shall be made on the amount received in this country. Otherwise, unless section 6 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 is to be construed as making persons taxable, liable to duties beyond those upon the profits of such possessions or securities received in the United Kingdom—which cannot be seriously argued—a person who had paid income tax upon the whole of his receipts in this country from profits in foreign or colonial securities or possessions would still be liable to a penalty for not returning the amount not remitted to this country. But it is urged by the Crown that, from the very fact that the Act does impose such limitation in the case of profits from such securities, no such limitation is to be inferred, as not being expressed in the case of the profits of a trade carried on abroad. The method of construction summarised in the maxim "Expressio unius exclusio alterius" is one that requires to be watched with great care. The application of such a rule varies so much, and is open to so many qualifications, that it rarely helps one to arrive at what is meant. A far more important inquiry, to my mind, is whether there is any general rule as to the extent to which English Acts of Parliament dealing with property in general are to be treated as applying to foreign property, using that word as including colonial property, and I mean by that property which, whether situate in England or elsewhere, is not, at the time to which the discussion relates, English property. It seems to me there is such authority, and that it runs in a well-defined current. "It is quite clear," says Lord Westbury, "that you cannot apply an English Act of Parliament to foreign property whilst it remains foreign property": Attorney-General v. Campbell, 21 W. R. 34, n, L. R. 5 H. L. 524, 530.

Nothing can be more general than the terms in the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 2, by which the word "succession" is defined and the liability imposed, and the duties are imposed "in respect of every succession"; but all the law lords agree in that case that "it is quite clear you cannot apply an English Act of Parliament to foreign property whilst it remains foreign property; but after the purposes of administration have been answered, if a party taking a part distributed under the administration comes to this country and invests it upon trust, it assumes the character of a British settlement and property, and it is no longer to be dealt with as if it were merely a portion of a foreign testator's estate to be received in the course of administration." There are similar decisions on the Legacy Duty Acts: Thomson v. Advocate-General, 12 Cl. & F. 1; The Attorney-General v. Jackson, 2 Cl. & F. 48. The matter is fully discussed, too, in Mr. Dicey's very interesting work on Domicil, 1st ed., p. 318, but the essential principle does not seem to me to be touched, which is that the property to be operated on must be British property. The question in every instance seems to be one of fact: "Is the property sought to be affected British property or not?" The test of domicil is fully discussed in In re Cigala's Trusts, 26 W. R. 257, 7 Ch. D. 351; but it is admitted on all hands that domicil has nothing to do with the present question, and it seems to me that there is absolutely nothing to give a British character to the unremitted portion of the profits made in Melbourne by a business carried on in the colony of Victoria only.

It would be sufficient, in my opinion, to stop here, but it is worth while to point out that the Act provides for assessment of the firm jointly. If the profits of the foreign business had been assessable at all, the court would have been justified in holding, as they did in Attorney-General v. Sulley, that a partner resident in England in a firm carrying on business abroad was bound to make a return of the whole of the profits of the foreign firm of which he was a partner. That involved the consequence that he was liable to pay income tax upon the whole of the profits of a foreign business, though the question, however, was only as to his liability to make a return of the whole of the profits of the business, but this judgment was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber (5 H. & N. 711), and upon this point it is there laid down that "the profits which come home to this country as the share of the individual partner resident here are taxable; the profits which go into the pockets of the partners in America are not." The principle of the decision is, therefore, that profits of a business carried on abroad, and not in the United Kingdom—profits made abroad, and never remitted here—are not taxable; and the decision is in harmony with the view I have expressed, and the reasoning by which I have endeavoured to support it. They are not, in the language of Lord

Westbury and of Jessel, M.R., "British property." They lack, indeed, every element of British nationality. As to the cases of Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and The Calcutta Jute Co. v. Nicholson, the Exchequer Division held, and, as it seems to me, rightly, that each of the companies was "resident" in the United Kingdom, and that the whole of their profits, and not merely the portion actually remitted to, and divided in, England, were liable to income tax. The greater part of the judgment is occupied with this question of whether they were "resident" in England or not. The determination of where the business is really carried on pretty nearly gives the answer as to the test of liability, although I do not think the Lord Chief Baron meant to lay that down as the actual test; but in those cases, England being, as it were, the natural and only home for those profits to come to, the profits were of English nationality, and were, again, English property, and the decision in those cases also is in harmony with the principle I have laid down. It is clear that, so far as the profits derived from foreign or colonial securities or possessions are concerned, the Act itself proceeds upon the same principle. I can conceive no reason why a distinction should have been made in favour of the profits of foreign securities as compared with those of foreign business, and why the profits of the business should be taxable, whether remitted to the partner resident or not, whilst the profits of foreign securities or possessions should escape taxation unless remitted. No ground of principle for such a distinction has been, or can be, suggested. There is no reason, therefore, why the maxim, Expressio unius exclusio alterius, should apply; whereas the provisions made in respect of the tax upon the profits of foreign possessions or securities are in strict accordance with what I have shown to be a recognized principle of English law. It is far easier to suppose that the omission of any special mention of the case of a person resident here, and not receiving the whole or part of the profits of a business carried on abroad by a firm of which he is a partner, is an accident, than that there should, in respect of an isolated case of this kind, be a departure, without express words, from a well-established principle regulating the application of Acts of Parliament in general, and, as has been shown, repeatedly recognized and acted upon in respect of fiscal statutes. The provisions relating to the profits of foreign securities are, however, important as pointing out what, for the purposes of this Act, effects the conversion of foreign into British property, and thus renders it liable to taxation, though probably the same conclusion might have been arrived at without their help. The profits of the foreign trade, like the trade of foreign securities, become British property, and, as such, become liable to the operation of the Acts of Parliament when they are received in this country, and not till then.

I am of opinion, therefore, that in this case the respondent is entitled to our judgment.

STEPHEN, J.—In this case I have the misfortune to be unable to agree with the judgment of my brother Wills. I have, however, had the advantage of reading it, and I fully agree with the way in which he has stated the facts of the case and the questions that arise upon them. I also think that the cases which he has referred to contain the grounds upon which the decision of the present case ought to proceed. The difference between us lies in the view which we take of them. I shall thus be enabled by his judgment to state very shortly the grounds on which I have arrived at a different conclusion. Shortly, my opinion is that the words of schedule D. cover the facts of the present case, and that the authorities to which my brother Wills refers do not warrant the restriction which he would put on those words. The relevant words are "in respect of the annual profits and gains arising out or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any . . . trade . . . whether the same shall be carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere." To this my brother Wills would add such words as these, "except such part of those profits and gains as the person entitled thereto may not bring into the United Kingdom." The reasons for adding this exception are, firstly, that in the case of Attorney-General v. Campbell, which was decided in 1872, a principle is laid down which is thus expressed by Lord Westbury (at p. 530): "You cannot apply an English Act of Parliament to foreign property whilst it remains foreign property." This principle, it is suggested, would be violated if the proposed exception were not made, because the property in this case is "foreign property." I do not understand the case in the same manner. Lord Westbury's words seem to me to mean by "foreign property" only the property of a person domiciled abroad at the time of his death, and his reference to statutes appears to me to be limited to statutes imposing duties on property, when by the the death of its owner it changes hands. To understand the meaning and application of this principle to the case of Attorney-General v. Campbell it should be read in connection with the earlier cases of Thomson v. Advocate-General, decided in 1845, and Wallace v. Attorney-General, L. R. 1 Ch. 1, decided in 1865. My brother Wills has stated the facts of these cases; I will state the principle which applies to them all as I understand it. It is stated most authentically and forcibly in Thomson v. Advocate-General, a case of the highest possible authority, as it was the unanimous decision of the House of Lords, founded upon a unanimous opinion of the judges whom they consulted, and it is as follows:—

The personal property of a deceased person is considered by English law as subject to the law of the domicil of the deceased. Therefore the property of a deceased person domiciled in Demerara, though situated in England, is not liable to English legacy duty, but is treated as if it were in Demerara: Thomson v. Advocate-General. Neither is the property of a deceased person domiciled in France liable to succession duty, though it is situated in England, but is treated as if it were in France, the difference between succession duty and legacy duty being nominal rather than substantial in reference to this matter: Wallace v. Attorney-General. If, however, such property is, by the will of a person domiciled abroad, made the subject of an English settlement, the trustees of which are English, and the subject of which is stock in the English funds, and if, under the provisions of that settlement persons wherever domiciled receive a benefit on the death of a living person, the cestui que trustent are liable to succession duty because their rights are dependent on English law. A man domiciled in Portugal creates by his will a trust in England to secure his sister an annuity for life, and directs that after her death the moneys appropriated to that purpose shall be distributed amongst his children, to whom he had left the rest of his property. On the sister's death the children's shares are chargeable with legacy duty. It was with reference to this doctrine that Lord Westbury stated the principle which I have quoted. It appears to me to have no relation to this case, in which there is no question of domicil. I think that the question of British property and foreign property does not arise in this case at all. The Act is directed to taxation of persons, not to distribution or management of things, and I see no reason why an Act which in terms taxes residents in England for the profits of trade carried on abroad should be cut down by implication so as to apply to those parts only of the profits which are brought home.

The two cases of Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson appear to me to be direct authorities to show that the Act has the effect contended for by the Crown. In each case the court held that the company was in the position of a person resident in England, and was, as such, liable to be taxed upon all its profits, though a large part of those profits was never brought to England at all. In the case of The Attorney-General v. Sulley the contention was that the shares of the American partners ought to be returned by the English partners to be taxed here, but the trade was held not to be carried on in this country. It was not disputed that the defendant's share was to be taxed, and it appears to have been assumed that it was sent home to him here. It does not touch this case.

With respect to the sections of the Act of 1842, which are referred to in support of the defendant's contention, two remarks will be sufficient. Agreeing with much that is said by my brother Wills of the maxim about the expression of one thing being the exclusion of others, I think that in this case the mention of a particular way of computing the profits of foreign securities and possessions adds something to the silence of the Act about foreign trade. At all events, it makes rather against the defendant than for him. But the really important matter, in my mind, is the language of schedule D. It is nothing like so general as the language of the Succession Duty Act, or the schedule imposing legacy duties. These Acts, taken literally, would impose duties on all persons being entitled to legacies or successions all over the world, and whether British subjects or not, which, of course, would be absurd. Some limitation being required, the limitation as to domicil was natural. I see no reason for any limitation of the plain words of schedule D. in the present case; language could hardly be more specific. The words are "annual profits arising to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere." These, with other words which I need not quote, are specific as to the time when, and the persons to whom, schedule D. applies, as to the places where the income referred to is to be made, and the person chargeable is to reside, and I do not see what further particulars could be given or required. I think, therefore, that the appellant is entitled to judgment.

Wills, J., as junior judge, withdrew his judgment, in accordance with the old practice in the Court of Exchequer.

Kellard v. Rooke. (a.)

Negligence—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-sections 2, 3; s. 8—Person intrusted with superintendence or entitled to give orders—Foreman of a gang of labourers.

K. was employed with other workmen in stowing bales of wool into the hold of a ship. He was one of a gang of labourers of which B. was the foreman. B. was himself a labourer, but stood at the top of the hatchway to signal to the men below when the bales were being lowered. K. was injured by one of the bales, which fell upon him in consequence of his not being warned by B. of its coming. K. sued his employer under section 1 of the Employers' Liability Act for compensation.

Held, that K. could not recover, as there was no evidence that his injuries were due to the negligence of a person who had "any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence," or to "the negligence of any person to whose orders the plaintiff was bound to conform while conforming to the said orders."

This was an appeal from a decision in the county court of Southwark.

The action was brought to recover compensation for injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, under the following circumstances. The plaintiff was employed with other workmen by the defendant to assist in stowing bales of wool on board the ss. Albatross in St. Katharine's Dock. The workmen were divided into, and employed in, gangs with a foreman to each gang. The foreman of the plaintiff's gang was one Bodfield. At the time when the accident occurred the bales were being hauled to the hatchway and dropped down for the purpose of being stowed, while Bodfield, who was at work on deck, gave signals to the men below before the bales were dropped. The plaintiff was struck by a bale, which, he said, was dropped into the hold without any warning.

The judge nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no evidence that Bodfield was a person who had superintendence intrusted to him within the definition of section 8 of the Employers' Liability Act.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ellis (Cock, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—Bodfield was a fellow-workman "intrusted with superintendence," and the accident occurred owing to his negligence "while he was superintending." The plaintiff, as one of the gang, was bound to obey his orders, and was doing so when the accident occurred. It was so held in the case of a carman and a boy attending him in Millward v. Midland Railway Co., 33 W. R. 366, 14 Q. B. D. 68. The principle there laid down applies here.

Tatlock, for the defendant.—The "superintendence" referred to in section 1 of the Act is shown by section 8 to be that of one "whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour." Bodfield was a labourer and engaged at the time of the accident upon the same work as the plaintiff. The accident was not due to compliance with any order given to the plaintiff by Bodfield.

Hawkins, J.—I am of opinion that this nonsuit ought not to be disturbed. With reference to the sub-section which has been relied on (sub-section 2 of section 1), and which entitles a workman to compensation for an injury caused to him "by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence intrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence," I made this observation in the course of the argument. Supposing Bodfield (the person who is said to have been intrusted with superintendence) to be for any purpose a superintendent, there is no question at all that he was also engaged in manual labour—that is to say, he was engaged in hauling and throwing these bales of wool into the ship's hold; and the injury was sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of a bale put in motion by Bodfield, in the exercise of a duty that was cast upon him, as an ordinary workman engaged in such manual labour, falling upon the plaintiff. Assuming that to be so, it comes to nothing more than this, that the man who was a superintendent for some purposes, and who was also an ordinary workman engaged in the work in which the plaintiff was likewise engaged, was guilty of negligence, whereby his fellow-workman was injured. But how can that be said to be an injury caused by Bodfield whilst he was in the exercise of such superintendence? The negligence of Bodfield was whilst in the exercise of the manual labour in which he was engaged (see section 8), and not in the exercise of superintendence at all. I think that disposes of the 2nd sub-section of section 1. With regard to sub-section 3, the words of which are, "By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed," supposing I were to concede, for the purpose of the discussion (which I by no means do), that Bodfield was a person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the plaintiff at the time of the injury was bound to conform, I fail to see any order which was given by him to which the plaintiff was bound to conform. And, if Bodfield gave him no order, the injury the plaintiff complains of could not have resulted from his having conformed to an order which was never given.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the plaintiff must bring himself within either sub-section 2 or sub-section 3 of section 1. He must allege and prove that the accident occurred to him by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of the employer who had superintendence intrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence, or, in the alternative, he must allege and prove that the injury occurred by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions he, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform and did conform, and that such injury resulted from his having so conformed.

Now, it must be patent to anyone reading these two sub-sections that the Legislature only intended to fix the master with liability for the negligence of two classes of persons—viz., one a person who has what may be termed superintendence, and another a person to whose orders the workman is bound to conform. This accident, as it is alleged, took place by reason of the negligence of Bodfield, a person in the service of the defendant, who had superintendence intrusted to him, he having, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence, thrown down a bale of wool into the hold of the ship where the plaintiff was working and injured him. At the close of the plaintiff's case it was submitted for the defendant that Bodfield did not come within the description of superintendence mentioned in the Act, or, in other words, that the case did not come within sub-section 2 of section 1; that "superintendence" in that sub-section must refer to a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. That is the definition of the expression given in section 8 of the Act. If you have a person whose sole or principal duty it is to superintend the work of others, the master will be liable for injuries to those who act in obedience to his orders, even though such superintendent should himself casually do manual labour. But how can it be said that a "ganger," the foreman of a gang of labourers, who is working with his hands all the day, is a person whose sole or principal duty is superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour?

It is only necessary to state the proposition to show that the case is not within section 1, sub-section 2. That, as it seems to me, was the only ground taken before the learned judge of the county court. But it is now said that the county court judge ought not to have nonsuited the plaintiff, because Bodfield, if not intrusted with general superintendence, was at all events a person to whose orders the plaintiff was bound to conform within sub-section 3 of section 1. I doubt if that point is open to the plaintiff upon this appeal, but I will assume that it is; and if I thought there was evidence upon which the learned judge might have given judgment for the plaintiff I should have been disposed to send the case down for a new trial, the plaintiff bearing all the costs up to the present time. But, upon the evidence which was before him, I am satisfied that the judge ought not to have found that Bodfield was a person within the sub-section; and for this reason a mere foreman of a gang of labourers will not do: the master is to be liable where the injury is caused "by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform." That is the person for whose negligence the master is responsible. But sub-section 3 does not stop there, it goes on "and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed." The meaning of sub-sections 2 and 3 in my judgment is this—the employer is to be liable for the negligence of one whom he places in the position of being intrusted with the giving of orders, where the workman is injured by reason of his having conformed to an order or direction which he receives from such person. But where is the evidence here that Bodfield (assuming him to have been so intrusted) did give any orders by conforming to which the plaintiff sustained injury? There is no such evidence. But the plaintiff's counsel relied upon Millward v. Midland Railway Co. as an authority to show that an order may be implied from the circumstances. The ratio decidendi, however, in that case was, that the plaintiff was acting under the orders of a person whose directions he was bound to obey, and was doing, with the knowledge of that person, what it was the ordinary course of business for him to do; whereas here the injury sustained by the plaintiff was caused by the inadvertent act of Bodfield whilst in the execution of his duty as a fellow-labourer of the plaintiff.

The judgment of nonsuit must be upheld.

Appeal dismissed.

Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser, & Co. (a.)

Marine insurance—Insurance on ship and machinery—Perils insured against—General words—Words ejusdem generis—Bursting of donkey-engine used for pumping up the boilers.

By a policy of marine insurance on a steamship and machinery, including donkey-engine, boilers, pumps, and all connections, the perils insured against were the usual perils—namely, of the seas, men-of-war, fire, &c.—and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the insurance. For the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump water into the main boilers by means of the donkey-engine and pump in the usual way; but, owing to a check-valve being stopped, the air-chamber in the pump became filled with water, and split.

Held, that the damage, whether caused by negligence or not, was not covered by the words "perils of the seas," or by the general words.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 674, 17 Q. B. D. 195) reversed.

West India and Panama Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 92, 6 Q. B. D. 51, disapproved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting) affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.).

The questions were argued upon a special case, the necessary facts in which are fully stated by Lord Herschell in his judgment.

Feb. 15, 17.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. (French, Q.C., and Synnott with them), for the appellants.—"Perils of navigation" are not specifically insured against, and are not covered by the words "perils of the seas." In order to make the underwriters liable under this policy there must be a "peril of the seas" or one ejusdem generis. It has never been held that the value of a broken screw-shaft can be recovered under the words "perils of navigation," much less could it be under "perils of the sea": Phillips v. Barber, 5 B. & Ald. 161; Fletcher v. Inglis, 2 B. & Ald. 315; Cullen v. Butler, 5 M. & S. 461; Butler v. Wildman, 3 B. & Ald. 398; Bishop v. Pentland, 7 B. & C. 219; De Vaux v. l'Anson, 5 Bing. N. C. 519; Davidson v. Burnand, 17 W. R. 121, L. R. 4 C. P. 117; Merchants' Trading Co. v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 2 Maritime Law Cases, N. S. 431, cited in Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 22 W. R. 914, at p. 918, L. R. 9 Q. B. 581, at p. 596. It may be that a thing would be a "peril of the seas" if it happened during the voyage, and would not be if it happened at another time. The principle of ejusdem generis must be applied; it was departed from in West India and Panama Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Co., 19 W. R. 52, 6 Q. B. D. 51—at all events in the judgment of Lord Selborne, and the decision in that case should be reversed. Taylor v. Dunbar, 17 W. R. 382, L. R. 4 C. P. 206, should be followed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Myburgh, Q.C. (J. Gorell Barnes with them), for the respondents.—The case finds that "for the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump up the main boilers by means of the donkey-pump and engine in the usual way, and it follows that this was a peril of navigation, whether a peril of the seas or not. First, the case comes under the general words, which do not include only perils ejusdem generis. In all cases where the principle of ejusdem generis is applied there is some one characteristic common to all the enumerated things. Here there is no common characteristic: Fenwick v. Schmalz, 16 W. R. 481, L. R. 3 C. P. 313; Bishop v. Pentland; Maxwell on Statutes, p. 303. Secondly, the loss comes under "perils of the seas," which includes all accidents of and incident to navigation: Carruthers v. Sydebotham, 4 M. & S. 77. If this loss is not covered by the word "perils" it is by the word "adventures," which means something different to perils. "Adventures and perils" include every accidental circumstance, not the result of wear and tear, or delay, or caused by the act of the assured himself, happening and incidental to the navigation of the ship.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., replied.

July 14.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In this case a policy of marine insurance for twelve months was effected upon, among other things, a pump on board The Inchmaree steamer.

The adventures and perils which the capital stock and funds of the defendant company were made liable to by the policy of insurance were of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, and quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of insurance or any part thereof.

It is certain that a loss or misfortune has happened to the pump while the pump was being used for the purpose of filling the boilers of The Inchmaree, and the sole question is whether the loss or misfortune which did happen was one of the losses or misfortunes against which the insuring company agreed to indemnify the owners of The Inchmaree.

If understood in their widest sense, the words are wide enough to include it; but two rules of construction, now firmly established as part of our law, may be considered as limiting those words. One is that words, however general, may be limited with respect to a subject-matter in relation to which they are used. The other is that general words may be restricted to the same genus as the specific words that precede them.

There is, perhaps, a third consideration which cannot be overlooked, and that is that where the same words have for many years received a judicial construction it is not unreasonable to suppose that parties have contracted upon their belief that their words will be understood in what I will call the accepted sense. And it is to be remembered that what courts have to do in construing all written documents is to reach the meaning of the parties through the words they have used.

Now the facts here are very simple. A part of the pump was burst because a valve which should have let the water into the boiler was stopped up while the pump was being worked by a donkey-engine. On the one side it is said that filling the boiler was necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage; on the other it is said that the accident, peril, or misfortune had nothing to do with the sea, and was in no sense of the like kind with any of the perils or misfortunes specifically enumerated.

In the long line of cases quoted at the bar there was only one (with which I will attempt to deal presently) which enunciated any different principles of construction from those I have endeavoured to set forth above, although I think there is some difficulty in reconciling the facts with respect to which some of them are decided with the principle upon which they profess to be decided—conspicuously, I think, De Vaux v. P'Anson, where Tindal, C.J., rests upon authorities which, as applicable to the particular facts of the cases to which he refers, hardly support the decision there arrived at.

The great difficulty I have had in this case is the decision of Lord Selborne, C., and Cockburn, C.J., in the case of The West India and Panama Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Co. I cannot agree with the Master of the Rolls that that case does not, as matter of reasoning, cover the present case. With the utmost respect I can draw no real distinction between the explosion of the boiler and the bursting of the air-chamber of the pump, nor can any real distinction depend upon whether it was steam generated by fire which caused the explosion, or air and water forced into the chamber by ordinary mechanical action. But before your lordships that case is open to review, and I cannot think that that case is reconcileable with the principles upon which policies of marine insurance have hitherto been construed. It introduces analogy as the guide by which you are to ascertain the genus to which the different species are to be attributed; so that in the future one must introduce as the true exposition of general words not the genus you find as applicable to the species enumerated, but any analogous genus. Sea perils or the like become enlarged into perils whose only connection with the sea is that they arise from machinery which gives motive power to ships.

I cannot think that, even were the analogy perfect—which I do not think it is—this is a satisfactory mode of ascertaining what the parties meant by the words they have used; and, as I have said, this is the real function of a court in construing an instrument. It might be reasonable for the parties to provide for such a peril, and one knows that "dangers of and incident to steam navigation" are words which have been used to provide for such casualties. But I cannot think that such casualties were in the contemplation of the parties when using the old familiar words of this policy. I think the subject-matter, marine risks, limits the meaning of the general words. I think the genus "perils of the sea" limits the meaning. I think the meaning attributed to these words for more than half a century, by decision, makes it probable that the parties used them in that accepted sense. I, therefore, think the judgment of the Court of Appeal wrong, and I move your lordships that it be reversed.

Lord Bramwell.—I cannot agree with the judgment in this case. The donkey-engine was insured. The adventures and perils which the defendants were to make good specified a great many particular perils, and "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid matter of insurance, or any part thereof." Words could hardly be more extensive, and if the question, I ought to say a question on them, arose for the first time, I might, perhaps, give them their natural meaning, and say they included this case. But the question does not arise for the first time. It has arisen from time to time for centuries, and a limitation has always been put on the words in question. Definitions are most difficult, but Lord Ellenborough's seems right: "all cases of marine damages of the like kind with those specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes." I have had given to me the following definition or description of what would be included in the general words: "Every accidental circumstance not the result of ordinary wear and tear, delay, or of the act of the assured, happening in the course of the navigation of the ship, and incidental to the navigation, and causing loss to the subject-matter of insurance." Probably a severe criticism might detect some faults in this. There are few definitions in which that could not be done. I think the definition of Lopes, L.J., in Pandorf v. Hamilton, 34 W. R. 488, 16 Q. B. D. 629, very good. "In a seaworthy ship damage to goods caused by the action of the sea during transit not attributable to the fault of anybody" is a damage from a peril of the sea.

I have thought that the following might suffice: "All perils, losses, and misfortunes of a marine character, or of a character incident to a ship as such."

I put it forward with distrust, but it would comprehend all the cases cited where the assured has recovered, save perhaps the West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co. For example, it would include the case of the ship blown over while in dock, of the ship damaged by its moorings giving way, of the ship fired into by a ship. It would not include the cases put by Lord Esher, M.R., nor the case I put of the captain seized with giddiness dropping the chronometer into the hold; nor would it include the present case. The damage to the donkey-engine was not through its being in a ship or at sea. The same thing would have happened had the boilers and engines been on land if the same mismanagement had taken place. The sea, waves, and winds had nothing to do with it.

As a matter of principle and reasoning I think the decision wrong. I think the judgment in the West India and Panama Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Co. wrong on the reasoning I have used. With most sincere respect, though it is true that what the winds are to a sailing vessel steam is to a steamer, that does not decide the question, for it is not every damage to sails that would be covered by the policy. Suppose damage by rats or mildew to spare sails. As to Lord Esher's judgment in that case, I concur in his criticism on it in the present case. And I agree with Lopes, L.J., that the word "fire" in the policy will not sustain that judgment. The Lord Justice puts the case of a spar falling on the deck, while getting under sail, and being broken, and says it would be within the policy. Perhaps; but if it would it would be because it was a loss in navigation, a loss which could not have happened except on a ship. But suppose the spar was being used to erect an awning on deck to give shelter to dancers, or the like, and was broken, the case would not be covered by the policy. It would not be a marine loss, not a loss with which the sea, or navigation, or the ship, as a ship, had anything to do.

I do not like cutting down the natural meaning of words; there is always great difficulty in saying what should be substituted. But it is admitted that some limit must be put on those in question here. I think a proper limit would exclude this loss. So that the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., is, I think, right, and that of the other judges wrong, and their decision should be reversed.

Lord Herschell.—This action undoubtedly raises an important question. It turns on the construction to be put upon the general words which follow the specific enumeration of the risks against which the insurance is effected in an ordinary marine policy.

The policy sued on was a time policy for twelve months, from the 20th of August, 1883, to the 20th of August, 1884, and the subject-matter of insurance, "the hull, masts, spars, sails, boats, materials, and all stores, valued at £20,000; and machinery, shafting, propellers, boilers, and connections, including donkey-engines and boilers, pumps, and all connections, valued at £11,000.

The facts lie in a narrow compass. They are set out in a special case, stated by agreement between the parties. On the 2nd of March, 1884, The Inchmaree (the vessel insured) was at anchor off Diamond Island, awaiting orders, and for the purposes of the voyage i was necessary to pump up the main boilers, by means of a donkey-pump and engine, in the usual way. A pipe led from the donkey-pump to the boilers, and at its junction with one of the boilers there was a check-valve, capable of being opened or closed by a screw, which ought to have been kept open and clear when the boilers were being pumped up. This valve had either been left closed or had become salted up when the donkey-pump was set to work off Diamond Island, so that the water could not pass into the boiler. The consequence was, that when the donkey-pump was set to work, the pipes and water-chamber in the donkey-pump, and the air-chamber therein, became overcharged, and the water was forced up into the air-chamber, which in consequence split, and the pump was thereby damaged.

It was admitted for the purposes of the case that the check-valve was either allowed to remain closed or to become salted up by the negligence of one of the engineers, or was accidentally salted up without being noticed, though reasonable care was taken by the engineers. It was also admitted that the closing or salting up, and accident, were not due to ordinary wear and tear.

The costs of replacing the pump was about £72 10s. The ship and freight were warranted free from average under three per cent. unless the ship were stranded. But as she did become stranded during the voyage, the loss was not excluded from the warranty. The parties were unable to agree as to whether there was negligence in allowing the check-valve to remain closed or to become salted up; but as the plaintiffs contended that the defendants were liable, whether there was negligence or not, it was agreed to leave that question for trial (if material) after the decision of the case.

The questions stated for the opinion of the court were, whether the defendants were liable under the policy in respect of the loss, (1) if it could have been avoided by proper care and occurred through negligence; (2) if it occurred accidentally without negligence.

The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and this judgment was affirmed by the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), the Master of the Rolls dissenting.

It was not contended at the bar on behalf of the respondents that the loss was within any of the specific risks enumerated. Reliance was placed exclusively upon the general words, "All other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof."

It cannot be denied that, if these words are to be taken without any limitation, a loss or misfortune did come to the damage of a part of the subject-matter of the insurance. But it is contended on behalf of the appellants that these general words, following a specific enumeration, must be limited to perils ejusdem generis with those specified, or, to put it in another way, that they must be construed with reference to the scope and purpose of the instrument in which they occur—viz., a policy of marine insurance. If the matter now presented itself for consideration for the first time, untouched by authority, I should not myself be inclined to construe these general words without some limitation. Indeed, the learned counsel for the defendants themselves did not contend for so wide an interpretation. The view which they put before the House was, that they should be confined to accidents happening to the subject-matter of the insurance in the course of and incidental to the navigation.

I think it will be found upon examination of the authorities that the general words in a marine policy have received from the courts, for a long series of years, a construction to which your lordships would do well to adhere. The instrument is one in daily use, and if your lordships were to put a new construction upon it you would be likely to defeat, and not to give effect to, the intention of the parties. Nothing would be more dangerous, in my opinion, than to depart from a construction which the authorities have put upon words in common use in a mercantile instrument, even if the propriety of the decision might originally have been open to question.

In a case which came before the Court of King's Bench as long ago as 1816, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, in clear and unambiguous terms expressed their view as to the meaning of the words in question. I refer to the case of Cullen v. Butler. It was an action on a policy of insurance where the ship and goods had been sunk at sea by another ship firing upon her in mistake for an enemy. The court inclined to the opinion that the loss was not one by "perils of the sea," but held that it was covered by the general words. Lord Ellenborough said:—"The extent and meaning of the general words have not yet been the immediate subject of any judicial construction in our courts of law. As they must, however, be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special words, they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have due effect assigned to them in the construction of the instrument, and this will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes."

No case was cited at the bar from the date when this opinion was expressed (unless it be the recent case of West India and Panama Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Co., to which I will presently advert) which has proceeded upon a construction of the policy different from that enunciated by Lord Ellenborough.

I will briefly review the subsequent authorities. The first is Butler v. Wildman. There the captain of a ship had thrown a large quantity of dollars overboard to prevent their falling into the hands of an enemy by whom he was pursued. It was held that, if not a loss by jettison, it was covered by the general words. Abbott, C.J., says:—"If not, strictly speaking, jettison, it is ejusdem generis, and therefore falls within the general words." The other judges concurred in this view, Holroyd, J., saying that the general words include "all losses of the same nature with those described in the enumerated risks." Next in order of time comes Phillips v. Barber. A vessel placed in a graving dock for repair was, by the violence of wind and weather, thrown over on her side, whereby she struck the ground with great violence and was bilged. Abbott, C.J., in a judgment holding that the underwriters were liable, after quoting the general words contained in the policy, said, "These general words are, indeed, restrained in construction to perils ejusdem generis with those more particularly enumerated in the policy. In this case, however, the loss was occasioned by the violence of the wind and weather in port, and it seems to me, therefore, to have been produced by a peril ejusdem generis with those specified, and to fall within the general words of the policy."

The next case, De Vaux v. l'Anson was much relied on by the counsel of the respondents. But though I feel some difficulty in explaining the grounds of that decision, it certainly purported to be based upon the antecedent authorities, and not upon any different view of the law. The ship had, in that case, been put into a dry dock for repairs. These being completed, preparations were made for getting her afloat; she was for this purpose made fast by four cables, whilst the workmen removed the sand which was under the vessel, and which consolidated the shores upon which the ship was resting. The cables strained the vessel, forcing in the ribs. The stanchions of the keelsons having all fallen from the force of the lower masts upon the keel, the garboard streak gave way, and when at last the ship was no longer upon the shores she sank into a muddy sand. At the time of her sustaining the injury the depth of water in the dock was about four feet. She was abandoned as a constructive total loss, and the question arose whether she was lost by perils insured against. Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, held that she was. He said, "It is to be observed the words in the policy are very large; the policy not only enumerates 'perils of the sea,' but 'all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the insurance.' And the cases cited and relied on by the plaintiffs, Carruthers v. Sydebotham, Fletcher v. Inglis, and Phillips v. Barber, are sufficient authority to show that a loss occasioned by the endeavour to get the vessel afloat from the dock in which she had just been repaired was a loss within the policy." It is not easy, I confess, to see how the authorities referred to were sufficient to establish the propositions they are supposed to support. In Carruthers v. Sydebotham the pilot navigating a vessel had fastened her to the pier of a dock basin in the Mersey by a rope to the shore. She took the ground, and when the tide left her fell over on her side and bilged, in consequence of which when the tide rose she filled with water and her cargo was wetted. It was held that this was a stranding entitling the assured to recover for an average loss upon the goods. After a careful perusal of the judgments in this case, I am unable to see its bearing upon the point which had to be determined in De Vaux v. I'Anson. Nor do I see the application of Fletcher v. Inglis. A vessel insured for twelve months was in a habour with a hard uneven bottom; the tide having left the vessel, on its return there was a considerable swell in the harbour and the ship struck the ground hard several times and was found to be considerably injured. It was held that this was a loss by peril of the sea. Still less am I able to perceive the applicability of Phillips v. Barber, to which I have referred above. There was nothing in De Vaux v. I'Anson that I can see corresponding with the wind and weather in port which was held in Phillips v. Barber to be ejusdem generis with a storm at sea. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the decision in De Vaux v. I'Anson was correct. It cannot be regarded as throwing any doubt upon the canon of construction laid down by Lord Ellenborough and more than once recognized and acted upon by Lord Tenterden. Nor is it possible to evolve any principle from it applicable to other cases. No reasons are given for the judgment, which is based solely on prior authorities, and when these authorities are examined they only determine, the one, that a ship damaged by a storm when in dry dock is damaged by causes similar to perils of the seas, the others, that vessels injured by ceasing to be waterborne, and being driven against the ground by the action of the tide, are injured by "perils of the sea."

The last case to which I need refer on this point is Davidson v. Burnand, where Willes, J., expressly recognised the rule of construction laid down in Cullen v. Butler. He said: "The question is not whether the loss here was strictly one occasioned by the perils of the sea, but whether it was such other loss within the policy, which, of course, must be a loss of the same or a similar kind to one happening from the perils of the sea."

I think, therefore, that the case now before your lordships must be determined by a consideration of the question whether the loss falls within the general words as construed by Lord Ellenborough—that is, whether it is a case "of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes." When the facts are borne in mind, it seems necessary only to state the question in this way to see that the answer must be in the negative. To which of the specially-enumerated perils is it similar? The only one that could be suggested is "perils of the sea." The damage here arose from the air-chamber of the donkey-pump giving way under an excessive pressure of water, owing to the proper outlet being closed. It is, I think, impossible to say that this is damage occasioned by a cause similar to "perils of the sea" on any interpretation which has ever been applied to that term. It will be observed that Lord Ellenborough limits the operation of the clause to "marine damage." By this I do not understand him to mean only damage which has been caused by the sea, but damage of a character to which a marine adventure is subject. Such an adventure has its own perils, to which either it is exclusively subject, or which possess, in relation to it, a special or peculiar character. To secure an indemnity against these is the purpose and object of a policy of marine insurance.

The respondents placed their main reliance upon the case of West India Telegraph Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co., and naturally so, because the majority of the Court of Appeal thought the present case undistinguishable from it. Lord Selborne, C., and Cockburn, C.J., in that case held that the damage done by the explosion of the boiler of a steamer was covered by the general words of a marine policy. Lord Selborne, after referring to the effect given to these words in De Vaux v. I'Anson, said:—"I think it is at least as proper to hold that in the case of a steamship they cover damage occasioned by the explosion of the boiler in which the motive power necessary to her navigation is generated. What the winds are to a sailing vessel, steam is to a steamer; and it is as reasonable that marine insurers should bear the risks incident to a navigation by that kind of power, whether from excess of pressure in the boilers, or from defects of safety-valves, or from neglect or mismanagement, making that dangerous which otherwise would not be so, as that they should bear losses occasioned by excessive pressure of wind and defects, or mismanagement of a ship's sail or tackle." I have already given my reasons for doubting whether De Vaux v. I'Anson involved any principle which could possibly be extended by analogy to a case not precisely similar in its facts. Moreover, it is to be observed that in De Vaux v. I'Anson the damage done was done to the ship as such. It arose from her being constructed for the purpose of being waterborne, and thus needing some substituted support, if the support of the water was withdrawn; and the damage to the ship was due to her grounding, and the failure to keep her safely supported. It is on this view alone, I think, that the case can be sustained. But the explosion of the boiler on board The Panama had no marine character at all. It might have happened in precisely the same way and done the same kind of damage if the steam-engine had been in use for the purpose of moving manufacturing machinery on shore. The real ground of Lord Selborne's judgment appears to have been the analogy between damage done by the excessive pressure of the winds in the case of a sailing vessel and the excessive pressure of steam in the boiler when the motive power used to propel the vessel is steam. I am not satisfied that this analogy is a sound one; but, even if it be so, I am unable to see how it can be treated as an authority in the present case, still less as concluding it. The water in the donkey-engine, the over-pressure of which caused the damage, was certainly not to the steamer "what the winds are to a sailing vessel," and the damage was not, as it seems to me, in any way similar to the injury done to a sailing vessel by a storm of wind.

The present Master of the Rolls, although he concurred in the judgment of the majority of the court in The West India Telegragh Co. v. Home and Colonial Insurance Co., differed in his reasons. He based his judgment solely on the ground that the explosion was ejusdem generis with fire, and therefore the loss was within the general words. In the case now under appeal he intimated that this reasoning was somewhat fanciful, and that he should not be sorry to see it dissented from. I am certainly disposed to prefer the latter view of the learned judge; but it is not necessary to discuss the point, as it is obvious that such a ground of decision can have no bearing upon the case we have to deal with. I may add, however, that since the term "fire" has been added to the specially-enumerated risks (which has taken place in comparatively recent times), I think the general words may properly be extended to similar risks which would not have been included before.

Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the court below was correct. I believe it not only to have been in accordance with the authorities, but in harmony with the common understanding of those who enter into contracts of marine insurance. Several instances were put in the course of the argument of disasters which are of common occurrence and would seem to be just as much within the general words as that which is now in question, but in respect of which it has never been suggested that the underwriters are liable. I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Macnaghten.—In March, 1884, The Inchmaree was off Diamond Island lying at anchor and about to prosecute her voyage. It was necessary to fill up her boilers. There was a donkey-engine and a donkey-pump on board, and the donkey-engine was set to pump up water from the sea into the boilers. Those in charge of the operation did not take the precaution of making sure that the valve of the aperture leading into one of the boilers was open. This valve happened to be closed. The result was that the water, being unable to make its way into the boiler, was forced back and split the air-chamber, and so disabled the pump. That was the beginning and the end of the misfortune.

At this time The Inchmaree, with her machinery, including the donkey-engine, was insured by a time policy.

The question is, was the loss which resulted from this mishap covered by the policy or not? The policy contained the common clause describing the risks which the underwriters were content to bear. The clause begins in the usual way by specifying certain particular cases—perils of the seas and other well-known risks—to which the indemnity was to extend. Then follow general words, apparently providing for every conceivable loss or misfortune that could happen to the subject-matter of the insurance.

It was not contended that the mishap in question fell within any of the particular cases enumerated. The argument turned on the effect of the general words. According to the ordinary rules of construction these words must be interpreted with reference to the words which immediately precede them. They were, no doubt, inserted to prevent disputes founded on nice distinctions. Their office is to cover in terms whatever may be within the spirit of the cases previously enumerated, and so they have a greater or less effect as a narrower or broader view is taken of those cases. For example, if the expression "perils of the seas" is given its widest sense, the general words have little or no effect as applied to that case. If, on the other hand, that expression is to receive a limited construction, as apparently it did in Cullen v. Butler, and loss by perils of the seas is to be confined to loss ex marinæ tempestatis discrimine, the general words become most important. But still, ever since the case of Cullen v. Butler, when they first became the subject of judicial construction, they have always been held or assumed to be restricted to cases "akin to" or "resembling" or "of the same kind" as those specially mentioned. I see no reason for departing from this settled rule. In marine insurance it is above all things necessary to abide by settled rules and to avoid anything like novel refinements or a new departure.

It was objected by Mr. Cohen that the rule of ejusdem generis does not apply unless you can find a common characteristic running through or underlying the previous words. I do not know that this is so, at any rate where several cases are enumerated leading to a common result or intended to be met by a common remedy. A familiar instance occurs in the Companies Act, 1862, and the earlier Act of 1848, in the sections which provide for winding up. There are several sub-sections specifying various cases in which a winding-up order may be made, and then there is a sub-section providing that the court may make an order whenever it thinks it just and equitable. Under both Acts those general words have always been held to be restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, and not to give the court a general power to make an order whenever it thinks right to do so.

Your lordships were asked to draw the line and to give an exact and authoritative definition of the meaning of the expression "perils of the seas" explained or enlarged by, or in connection with, the general words. For my part I decline to attempt any such task. I do not think it is possible to frame a definition which would include every case proper to be included, and no other. I think that each case must be considered with reference to its own circumstances, and that the circumstances of each case must be looked at in a broad common-sense view, and not by the light of strained analogies and fanciful resemblances.

In the present case, although the Court of Appeal has properly treated the general words as restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated, the majority of the court has held the accident within the policy. I am unable to adopt their conclusion. The accident, in my opinion, was not due to the "perils of the seas," using that expression in the widest sense that I can give to it, nor did it result in sea damage of any kind.

I am therefore of opinion that the view of the Master of the Rolls is correct, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

C.,* 1883, ord. 58, r. 15—Appeal set down—Dismissal of appeal by consent of all parties—Application to court necessary — Counsel — Implied authority to compromise—Undertaking not to appeal.

The provision in section 32 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, requiring a deposit of £20 to be made with the registrar of the Stannaries Court on appeals from the Vice-Warden, is not abrogated by the Judicature Acts or by any of the rules made thereunder, and is still in force.

An undertaking not to appeal given, after the delivery of judgment on the matter at issue, but before the judge had decided the question of costs, by counsel on behalf of the unsuccessful litigant, on condition of his client not being required to pay the costs of the successful litigant, is within the implied authority of counsel, and cannot be withdrawn in the absence of misapprehension or surprise inducing the undertaking.

An appeal once set down cannot be withdrawn by the appellant on merely obtaining the written consent thereto of the respondent, but an application to the court for leave to withdraw the appeal is necessary.

Appeal from an order of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court.

The West Devon Great Consols Mine Co. was being wound up in the Stannaries Court, and the registrar of that court was the official liquidator. In 1886 H. L. Phillips, the late "Purser" of the company and the defendant in an action of Simmons v. Phillips, was directed by an order of the Court of Appeal, reversing a judgment of A. L. Smith, J., (inter alia) to pay the costs of that action.

Phillips and his solicitors having paid these costs, claimed in the winding up to be repaid the same out of the assets of the company. This claim was opposed by certain contributories of the company, and the matter was referred to the Vice-Warden for his decision. The official liquidator meantime sanctioned a call being made to provide for certain debts of the company, including this claim, and the contributories gave notice of motion before the Vice-Warden to discharge the order for a call. Both the motion to discharge the order for a call and the adjourned summons to admit the validity of the claimants' claim came on together for hearing by the Vice-Warden, first on August 30, 1887, and the hearing was then adjourned till October 21. On October 21 the Vice-Warden gave judgment in favour of the greater portion of the claim being admitted on the ground that the terms of a certain resolution, passed at a meeting of certain shareholders of the company on October 10, 1885, and which the Vice-Warden considered was binding on the company, authorized Phillips as defendant in the action of Simmons v. Phillips to claim his costs in that action out of the assets of the company. After the delivery of the judgment, but before the Vice-Warden had given any decision on the question of the costs of the applications before him, a discussion took place between the counsel who then appeared for the contributories and the counsel then appearing for the claimants. The result of which, as it appeared from the evidence, was that the then counsel for the contributories gave an undertaking on behalf of his clients not to appeal against the order of the Vice-Warden in consideration of counsel for the claimants agreeing not to press for payment by the opposing contributories personally of the costs of the applications before the Vice-Warden, but that the costs of all parties of, and incidental to, the hearing of the said claims should be paid out of the assets of the company. This undertaking was embodied as follows in the minutes prepared of the order of October 21:—"And the . . . opposing contributories undertaking, by their counsel, not to appeal or to raise any objection in the winding up as to bearing their respective shares of the said claims, it is further ordered that the taxed costs of all parties of, and incidental to, the hearing of the said claims be paid out of the assets of the company." Only one of the opposing contributories was personally present when the undertaking in question was given by their then counsel, and that contributory assented to the undertaking; the other opposing contributories who were not present had not authorized counsel to give the undertaking, and, objecting to it before the order of October 21 was drawn up, passed, and entered, they moved the Vice-Warden to vary the order by striking out the words relating to the undertaking given by their then counsel. The Vice-Warden, on November 25, 1887, refused this motion, with costs.

The contributories appealed from this order of refusal.

On the appeal being opened,

Stock, for the registrar of the Stannaries Court, who was also official liquidator of the company, and as such had been served with notice of the appeal, took the preliminary objection that the appeal ought not to proceed until a deposit of £20 should be made by the appellant in the hands of the registrar of the Stannaries Court. —The Stannaries Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 19), s. 32, provided that, in cases of appeals from an order of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court, a deposit of £20 should be made in the hands of the registrar, to be paid to the opposite party when the order is not reversed unless the Vice-Warden should otherwise direct. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 18, sub-section (3), transferred the jurisdiction of the Court of the Lord Warden on appeals from the Vice-Warden to the Court of Appeal; but there is no section of the Judicature Acts nor any order or rule under them by which the provision as to deposit contained in section 32 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, has been abrogated, and that section remains unrepealed. Section 23 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that where no specific provision is made in the Act or Rules with reference to the exercise of the jurisdiction transferred, then that jurisdiction "shall be exercised as nearly as may be in the same manner as the same might have been exercised by the respective courts from which such jurisdiction shall have been transferred.

He referred to Lee v. Nuttall, 27 W. R. 805, 12 Ch. D. 61.

Higgins, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.—The old procedure on appeals from the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court was by way of petition, and it was in connection with that procedure that the deposit of £20 was required, just as it was required in the old procedure in the Chancery Court on petitions of appeal. The intention of the Judicature Act was to put all appeals on the same footing, and establish one system of procedure, and as it abolished the old system of appeal by way of petition to the Lord Warden, it, by implication, did away with the right of claiming a deposit. R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 1. Since the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, it never has been the practice to require a deposit to be paid on an appeal from the Vice-Warden. In any case it is now too late to raise this objection, as this appeal was in the paper and came on for hearing on January 11 of this year, and no such objection was taken, but the case stood over on the application of counsel for the claimants (the present respondents) for leave to file further affidavits, and the registrar of the Stannaries Court, as official liqidator, has taken advantage of that and filed a further affidavit.

The COURT, on the undertaking of the appellants' solicitor to pay the £20 deposit in case the court should be of opinion that, under the present practice, payment of the deposit was still necessary, allowed the appeal to proceed.

Higgins, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.—Counsel had no express authority from the present appellants to give the undertaking he gave. No doubt Matthews v. Munster, ante., p. 178, decides that counsel conducting a cause in court has implied authority to consent to a compromise upon terms, and that an undertaking, deliberately given without misapprehension or surprise by counsel acting under such implied authority, cannot afterwards be withdrawn. But there is a difference between an order made by consent of counsel stopping the trial, and this case, where the judgment was delivered before any undertaking was given, and the undertaking itself was only by way of an addition with reference to costs: SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 1876, p. 542. Again, the undertaking here given was induced by misapprehension and surprise. Counsel, after hearing the Vice-Warden's judgment, assumed that the resolution of October 10, 1885, was a ratification by the company of the course pursued by the claimant Phillips in defending the action of Simmons v. Phillips, but, in fact, that resolution was nothing like such a ratification. Counsel had no opportunity of verifying the Vice-Warden's statement, as the "costs book" of the company was not then in court. There is also a discrepancy between the terms of the undertaking embodied in the order and the undertaking actually given. Harvey v. Croydon Union Sanitary Authority, 32 W. R. 389, 26 Ch. D. 249; Rogers v. Horn, 26 W. R. 432; Holt v. Jesse, 24 W. R. 879, 3 Ch. D. 177, were referred to.

Buckley, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the respondents.—The "costs book," though not in court on October 21, 1887, was in court when the case first come on before the Vice-Warden on August 30, and the counsel then appearing for the present appellants had therefore opportunity of reading the resolution of October 10, 1885. It is well within the implied authority of counsel to agree not to appeal, and on grounds of public policy it is necessary he should have such authority. [They were stopped by the court.]

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application by way of appeal to withdraw a consent given by counsel on the hearing of two motions before the Vice-Warden.

It is now well settled—by the Court of Appeal in Harvey v. Croydon Union Sanitary Authority, notwithstanding a dictum of the late Master of the Rolls to the contrary—that, even though the order made by consent has not been drawn up, the consent given cannot be withdrawn, unless made under some misapprehension or error. Have the appellants here shown any misapprehension or error so as to be relieved from the consent? It was suggested that the consent was not given in the terms embodied in the order. But the appellants have not sworn that, and therefore it must be taken that, as a matter of fact, this undertaking was given in the terms embodied in the order. There were two applications before the Vice-Warden, the first to discharge the order for calls, and the second to admit the claims of the claimants. The Vice-Warden gave his decision in favour of the claims being admitted. But the matter was not over until he had decided what should be done with respect to costs. Then this compromise was entered into—counsel for the present appellants gave an undertaking not to appeal or to raise any objection in the winding up as to his clients bearing their respective shares of the claimants' claims, and the costs of all parties of and incidental to the application were directed to be paid out of the assets of the company.

The questions raised by the appellants are, whether counsel had power, under his implied authority, to agree not to appeal, and whether counsel had power to do so after the judgment of the court had been delivered on the main question.

In my opinion every compromise of a litigation by counsel involves the point that there shall be no appeal, as the compromise is drawn up by consent, and therefore it is not beyond the authority of counsel to undertake not to appeal on condition of being allowed the costs of an unsuccessful litigation, and the rest of the undertaking here is well within the authority of counsel.

But has the undertaking here been given under any misapprehension or mistake? If that were shown, of course the court would relieve the appellants by allowing the undertaking to be withdrawn. It may be that counsel relied too much on what the Vice-Warden said as to the nature of the resolution of October 10, 1885, and as to what would be done in the winding up; but, in my opinion, that is not a misapprehension which would relieve counsel from the undertaking given. I see no evidence to justify the court in coming to the conclusion that counsel entered into this arrangement under any misapprehension or mistake of fact.

Then, as to the point raised as to a deposit of £20 being required on an appeal under section 32 of the Stannaries Act, 1869. It was contended that that requirement was done away with by the Judicature Acts, and that security for costs on an appeal is now only required to be given under special circumstances, and on an application for that purpose to the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, however, section 32 of the Stannaries Act, 1869, gave to the litigant who was successful before the Vice-Warden a special protection by requiring this deposit of £20 to be made in case of an appeal, and that protection has not been done away with by the Judicature Acts, nor by any of the Rules of the Supreme Court—even if the Rule Committee had power to make a rule doing away with such special protection, as to which I express no opinion. In my opinion, therefore, on appeals from the Vice-Warden a deposit of £20 must be made.

As to the point of waiver, the registrar of the Stannaries Court, who is also the official liquidator of this company, did not appear when the application was made by the other respondents for this appeal to stand over, and though he afterwards filed further affidavits, he was entitled to do so without depriving himself of the right to raise this preliminary objection now. But all the registrar, as official liquidator, can claim is his costs of the unsuccessful appeal, and if he desires it the court will require the solicitors of the appellants to undertake that the costs of the official liquidator be paid. As to the respondents represented by Mr. Buckley, they, not having raised this objection on the former occasion, must be taken to have waived it, and therefore cannot now insist on it.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I entirely agree.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the point as to payment of the deposit it seems to me that the maxim "Generalia specialibus non derogant" is applicable, and that the rules referred to under the Judicature Acts are not to be construed as going the length of depriving a litigant of any special protection given him by statute. I feel almost certain that there is a decision of the Court of Appeal on that very point with reference to appeals from county courts.*

Application dismissed, with costs.

Feb. 17.—Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants, applied for leave to withdraw the appeal from the final judgment in this matter.—This appeal had been set down for hearing, but owing to the above decision of the Court of Appeal on the interlocutory application refusing to allow the appellants to withdraw the undertaking not to appeal given by counsel, it had become necessary for the appellants to submit to an order dismissing their appeal on the main question with costs. Counsel said that the appellants were willing that such an order should be made, but that the respondents had refused to give a written consent thereto, on the ground that the consent of the court was required. Under these circumstances he made the present application, but submitted that the respondents were not entitled to the costs of this application.

Bramwell Davis, for the respondents, submitted that an appeal once set down could not be withdrawn without the consent of the court, and therefore that this application was necessary, and that the respondents were entitled to be paid the costs of this application.

COTTON, L.J.—During the ten years I have been in the Court of Appeal I have never known an appeal once set down to be dismissed by consent of the parties merely and without an application to the court. The appeal will be dismissed with costs, including the costs of this application.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J.

This was an action for the administration of the estate of G. W. Marrett.

The testator was born in India about the year 1813, his father being an officer in the service of the East India Co. He was himself an officer in that service, and he never left India until the year 1870. He left the service in 1868, and from that time till his death he was in receipt of a Government pension. Early in 1871 he left Hyderabad and went to reside at Darmstadt. He purchased a house there in 1873, and lived there until the time of his death, with the exception of short visits to England in each of the years 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874; a visit to India in 1874 for the purpose of obtaining a pension from the Nizam; and some short visits to friends in Germany. His will was made in 1874, on the occasion of a visit by him to Wiesbaden. It was in the English form, and by it he gave his property to his grandchildren, to the exclusion of his children, whom, by the German law, it is not competent for a testator to disinherit.

On the 2nd of June, 1881, an order was made directing the usual accounts, and an inquiry as to the domicile of the testator at the date of his will and at the date of his death.

The chief clerk found that the testator was domiciled in Hesse Darmstadt at both these dates.

On the 27th of January, 1887, the plaintiff, the executor, applied to vary the certificate.

A good many witnesses deposed to their belief that the testator was dissatisfied with Germany and desirous to live in England.

Stirling, J., refused the application.

The plaintiff appealed.

Pearson, Q.C., and Carson, for the appellant.—The evidence shows that the testator never intended permanently to reside in Germany, and he therefore never lost his original domicile. Assuming, however, that he did, and that he acquired a German domicile, we say that that domicile was relinquished by him, and that his domicile of origin thereupon revived. An intention to relinquish a domicile of choice is sufficient to revive the domicile of origin without actual change of residence.

They referred to Brown v. Smith, 15 Beav. 444; Bell v. Kennedy, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 307; Udny v. Udny, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 441, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 5; In re Patience, Patience v. Main, 33 W. R. 500, 29 Ch. D. 976; In the Goods of Raffenel, 11 W. R. 549, 3 Sw. & T. 49.

Hastings, Q.C., and Farwell, for the respondent.—A mere intention to relinquish a domicile of choice is not sufficient; there must also be an actual change of residence, with an intention of permanently relinquishing that domicile. The evidence here is sufficient to show that the testator acquired a German domicile.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Pottinger, 9 W. R. 578, 6 H. & N. 733; Douglas v. Douglas, 20 W. R. 55, L. R. 12 Eq. 617; In re Steer, 3 H. & N. 594, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 50.

Carson replied.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal on the question what was the domicile of the testator at the time of his death and at the time of making his will. Those are two distinct periods, and must be dealt with separately.

The facts are not brought before us very satisfactorily, for we have only affidavit evidence, and very little of the correspondence which must have passed between this gentleman and his friends and members of his family is before us, but we must decide, as best we can, upon the evidence as it stands.

It is an admitted fact that the testator's domicile of origin was Anglo-Indian. The question is whether he had, before either of those two periods, acquired a domicile of choice, and whether he retained the domicile of choice at either of those two periods.

The law, as I understand it, is this, that the domicile of origin clings to a man unless he has acquired a domicile of choice by residence in another place with an intention of making it his permanent place of residence

*Matthews v. Ovey, 13 Q. B. D. 403, 32 W. R. Dig. 57, is the case referred to; it was decided in 1884, and subsequently by R. S. C., December, 1885, ord. 59, rr. 9—17, new rules were made dealing with the mode of procedure on appeals from county courts; see also Hughes v. Finney, 35 W. R. 807, 19 Q. B. D. 522, which shows that even the rules made in 1885 do not apply to appeals from county courts in cases where the issues have been remitted to the county court for trial, and that on appeals in such cases the old practice of applying for a rule nisi still obtains.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If a man loses his domicile of choice, then without anything more, his domicile of origin revives; but in my opinion, in order to lose the domicile of choice once acquired, it is not only necessary that a man should be dissatisfied with his domicile of choice, and form an intention to leave it, but must have left it with the intention of leaving it permanently. Unless he has done that, unless he has left it both animo et facto, the domicile of choice remains. It may be lost animo et facto, and if lost, then the domicile of origin, there being no other domicile, revives and attaches again; but the mere fact that a man when he has once acquired a domicile of choice begins to doubt whether he has done right or wrong, whether it would not have been better for him not to have taken up his residence in that country, does not destroy the effect of the residence taken up with the intention of permanently residing there. The fluctuations of a man's mind during his residence in a particular place are important in considering whether he ever, during his residence there, had a settled intention to make it his permanent residence; but if we arrive at the conclusion that he had, the subsequent fluctuations do not, in my opinion, if unaccompanied by change of residence, destroy the effect of the residence with intention permanently to reside there.

Lord Westbury, in Bell v. Kennedy, which is a remarkable case, says this (at p. 321):—"The true inquiry, therefore, is, had he this settled purpose the moment he left Jamaica or in course of the voyage of taking up a fixed and settled abode in Scotland?" To gain a new domicile the testator must have resided in the country with a fixed and settled purpose to make a permanent residence there; but if subsequent fluctuations of intention are to be taken into account, it would be almost impossible ever to determine whether a domicile of choice was acquired. The case of Bell v. Kennedy was a very curious case, because, although the gentleman went to Scotland, and did, in fact, reside with his mother-in-law, his letters and conduct showed that he had not at all made up his mind whether he should buy an estate to live on in Scotland, or whether he should buy an estate in England for the same purpose. The point in that case was the death of the wife, when there was a dissolution of the community of goods which was effected by the marriage, and up to that time, on the evidence, he had a very doubtful state of mind as to whether he should fix himself in England or Scotland.

Having stated what I understand to be the law applicable to the case, I will proceed to consider the facts. [His lordship then stated the facts and his reasons for coming to the conclusion that the testator had acquired a German domicile, and continued:—] In my opinion the finding that at the time of his will and at the time of his death the testator was domiciled at Darmstadt, in Germany, is correct.

BOWEN, L.J.—On the law, as it has been stated by the Lord Justice, I have little to add.

We are considering a case of change of domicile, and the question we have to determine is whether the domicile of origin can be shown to be abandoned, and a domicile of choice substituted for it. When a man takes up his residence in a new country the problem which has to be solved is whether there has been such a fixed and settled intention permanently to reside in the new country as, concurring with the actual residence there, amounts to an adoption of a domicile of choice instead of the domicile of origin. That being the inquiry, the various fluctuations in the man's intention about a permanent residence which take place after the residence in the new country has been taken up are very material as throwing light on the question whether there has been at any time that fixed and settled intention of residence in the new country which is a necessary element to the idea of domicile. But when you have once arrived at the conclusion that there has been a fixed and settled intention of permanently residing in a new place, coupled with an actual residence in that new place, then the change of domicile is effected, and change of domicile once effected will not be undone by mere subsequent fluctuations of opinion on the part of the settler as to whether his choice of the new residence has been wise, or by expressions which lead one to think that he entertained vague and floating ideas of going to reside elsewhere. [His lordship then referred to the evidence, and expressed his concurrence with the conclusion arrived at by the Lord Justice.]

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I shall endeavour to be short in stating the conclusions I have arrived at. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence, and stated his conclusion that the testator intended to make Germany his permanent home.]

Bill of sale—Avoidance in part—Assignment of chattels other than personal chattels—Severance of covenants—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 6, 9—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 5.

A bill of sale not made in accordance with the statutory form purported to assign, along with personal chattels, certain machinery, being property other than personal chattels.

Held, that, as the legal part of the security could be severed from the illegal, the security was good as to the machinery.

Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408, distinguished.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ., reported ante, p. 128) affirming the decision of the county court judge declaring a bill of sale void.

The relevant facts of this case were as follows:—On June 25, 1886, Burdett executed to Byrne & Furze a deed of security. By this deed, in consideration of goods of the value of £50 to be immediately delivered to Burdett by Byrne & Furze, and of £150 due from Burdett to them for money lent, Burdett assigned to Byrne & Furze certain chattels described in the schedule as security for £200 and interest, and by the deed the borrower declared that he would pay the £200 and interest by certain instalments. It was admitted on the one hand that the bill of sale did not comply with the terms of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and, on the other, that amongst the property described in the schedule there was trade machinery within the exception in the 5th section of the Act of 1882, and therefore, not personal chattels for the purposes of that Act.

Robson, for the bill of sale holder.—The bill of sale may be void as far as the personal chattels are concerned, but the machinery which is here separately assigned is not to be considered personal chattels by section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878: Roberts v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 605, 13 Q. B. D. 794. The bill of sale is good as mortgage of the machinery: In re O'Dwyer, L. R. 1 Ir. 19. The case of Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408, is distinguishable. So a bill of sale for transferring the property in a ship by way of mortgage was held void for want of reciting the certificate of registry, yet the mortgagor was liable to be sued upon his personal covenant in the same to repay the money lent: Kerrison v. Cole, 8 East 231; Davenport v. Whitmore, 2 Myl. & Cr. 177.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the trustee.—This bill of sale is void under the case of Davies v. Rees, there is one assignment of the personal chattels and machinery which are comprised in one schedule; the covenants are not separable, and the avoidance, being by statute, destroys the validity of the whole security: Payne v. Mayor of Brecon, 6 W. R. 801, 3 H. & N. 572; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway, 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235, 250.

Robson replied.

Jan. 30.—FRY, L.J., read the judgment of the COURT (Lord EHER, M.R., and FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.). After stating the facts as above, and saying that the bill of sale was plainly void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, so far as regarded the personal chattels, his lordship proceeded:—We will first consider the question as to whether the bill of sale is equally void as regards the properties which are not personal chattels upon principle. In our judgment, clauses in statutes avoiding transactions or instruments are to be interpreted with reference to the purpose for which they are inserted, and when open to question are to receive a wide or limited construction, according as the one or the other will best effectuate the purpose of the statute (per Turner, L.J., in Jortin v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 3 W. R. 190, 6 De G. M. & G. 275). Furthermore, we adopt the language of Willes, J., in Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235, 250, where he said that "the general rule is that when you cannot sever the illegal from the legal part of a covenant the contract is altogether void; but where you can sever them, whether the illegality be created by statute or by the common law, you may reject the bad part and retain the good."

What, then, was the object and purpose of the Legislature in enacting, by section 9 of the statute of 1882, that all bills of sale not in accordance with the scheduled form should be void? It was to impose certain conditions and terms on instruments by which securities were created on personal property without the transfer of the property. The Legislature were not concerned, and the statute is not concerned, with the borrowing on real estate or on chattels real, or on chattels excepted from its operation by section 5, or with the forms of the instruments by which such borrowing may be effected. We ought, therefore, in our opinion, if the language of the statute be open to that construction, to lean towards construing the statute as affecting securities on personal chattels only, and not securities on other kinds of property. Now, in our opinion, not only do the words of the statute make this construction possible, but they lean towards it, for what is avoided is the bill of sale, and not any instrument, however complicated or comprehensive its nature, of which a bill of sale is part. But then arises the question, Can the illegal part of the security be severed from the legal? In our opinion the nature of the instrument in question permits such a severance to be made, because a security given on properties A, B, and C is a security for the whole amount on each of the three properties, and on every part of each of them. The excision of one property, in law, by a statute, or, in fact, by an earthquake, effects a separation between the properties and withdraws one of them from the operation of the instrument, but leaves the instrument intact and still operative as regards the rest. In our opinion, therefore, the elimination of the personal chattels from the security leaves it good as to the machinery, which is not a chattel for the purposes of the Bills of Sale Act.

On principle, therefore, we think the decision of the court below is not correct. But that decision proceeds, not upon principle, but on the authority of the case of Davies v. Rees, which was binding on the Divisional Court and is binding on this court. In that case the court decided that, where a bill of sale contained a covenant to pay, and an assignment of chattels personal and of no other property, and was bad under the statute as an assignment, the covenant to pay was also avoided by the 9th section of the statute. The court decided that the whole of the instrument then in question was void, not that the whole of every instrument in which a void bill of sale may be embodied is also necessarily void. The principle of that decision we take to be this: that the 9th section made the whole of a bill of sale, as those words were used in the section, and not merely the assignment contained in it, void, as was shown by a comparison of the language of the 8th and 9th sections; that the same 9th section showed, by its reference to the schedule, what it meant by a bill of sale; and that on reference it appeared that a covenant to pay was an integral part of the form, and, therefore, of a bill of sale within that section. There were three possible areas over which the avoidance might operate—viz. (1) the assignment of chattels only, or (2) everything which appeared as part of a bill of sale in the scheduled form, or (3) every part of every instrument in which a bill of sale might be contained. The court rejected the first as too narrow, but did not accept the third, which, we think, would have been too wide.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the deed in this case was not avoided by the statute as regards the chattels excepted from its operation by the 5th section of the Act, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6—Petitioning creditor's debt—Amount of—Costs of abortive execution.

The costs of an abortive execution cannot be added to a judgment debt so as to make up the amount necessary to enable a creditor to petition under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

This was an appeal by the debtor from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Haslitt.

The petitioning creditors had obtained a judgment for £49 8s. They issued execution by way of fi. fa. which proved abortive, the costs of issuing execution amounted to £1 5s., making the petitioners' debt £50 13s.

Channell, Q.C., and Yelverton, for the debtor.—By section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "a creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless . . . (6) the debt is a liquidated sum payable either immediately or at some future time." The costs of issuing an execution are not "a liquidated sum payable" by the debtor. Such costs are not a debt for which an action can be brought. They are only recoverable out of the proceeds of the execution, and if there is a return of nulla bona the costs are not recoverable at all Ord. 42, r. 15, of the Rules of Court is equivalent to section 123 of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, which deals with the power of retaining the costs out of the levy. The interpretation put upon that section in Marquis of Salisbury v. Ray, 8 W. R. 462, 8 C. B. N. S. 193, which decided that the expenses of a previous abortive fi. fa. cannot be taken under a ca. sa. is in our favour.

They also cited Howes v. Young, 24 W. R. 738, 1 Ex. D. 146.

H. Real, for the judgment creditors.—There is no distinct authority on the point, but Bayley v. Potts, 8 Ad. & El. 272, seems to show that the debtor is under a liability to pay these costs. The statute 43 Geo. 3, c. 46, gave the plaintiff power to recover them, and though that statute has been repealed, ord. 42, r. 15, seems to cover the case. In Ex parte Liverpool Loan Co., In re Bullen, 20 W. R. 1028, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 732, where the sheriff levied for a debt, and the sum taken, including the costs of the execution amounted to over £50, though the debt itself was less than that sum. Section 87 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 applied, there having been an "execution for a sum exceeding £50 in respect of a judgment."

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that the case of Lord Salisbury v. Ray, which has been cited to us, is conclusive to show that the costs of an execution cannot be recovered otherwise than out of the proceeds of the levy. If that is so, those expenses cannot be added to the amount mentioned in the statute as necessary to constitute a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt. The appeal must be allowed.

Llewellin v. Williams. (a.)

Tenant for life—Growing timber—Application of "capital money"—Payment of "costs incidental to the exercise of any power" under the Settled Land Act—Difference between party and party and solicitor and client costs—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 21, sub-sections 9, 10.

A tenant for life was authorized by the will to fell timber beginning to decay and sell the same for his own benefit.

Held, upon a sale, under the Settled Land Act, of the land and the timber, some of which was decaying, but had never been severed, that the tenant for life had never become absolutely entitled to any of the timber, and was not, therefore, entitled to any part of the purchase-money of the timber, either by virtue of the will or the Settled Land Act.

Costs properly incurred by a tenant for life in defending an action to restrain the exercise of his power of sale are costs incidental to the exercise of his powers, in discharge of which capital money may be applied under section 21, sub-section 9, of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

An action by remaindermen to restrain trustees and the tenant for life from exercising a power of sale under a will was dismissed, with costs. While the proceedings were pending, the Settled Land Act came into operation, and the property was subsequently sold under the powers of that Act.

Held, that the tenant for life was entitled to have paid to him out of the purchase-money the difference between his party and party and solicitor and client costs of so much of the action as related to the exercise of his powers under the Act.

Certain freehold and copyhold hereditaments were devised by the will of the Rev. Henry Llewellin, who died in 1838, to the use of E. T. Llewellin during his life, with divers remainders over, and the will gave the trustees, at the request of the tenant for life, power to sell the same.

The will also contained a declaration that no tenant for life in possession of the real estate should have power to commit any manner of waste, spoil, or destruction upon the same or any part thereof, except that he or she might fell and cut any timber or other trees which might begin to decay, or which might materially injure the underwood, and might sell and dispose of the same and apply the produce to his or her own use.

In the year 1881 the trustees, at the request of the tenant for life, determined to exercise their power of sale. An action (Thomas v. Williams, 31 W. R. 943, 24 Ch. D. 558) was thereupon commenced by the remaindermen against the trustees and the tenant for life to restrain them from selling. The action was dismissed with costs on the 21st of March, 1883, and on the 21st of May, 1884, an appeal from that decision was also dismissed. The tenant for life accordingly became entitled to party and party costs of that action.

On the 15th of December, 1885, the Settled Land Act having in the meanwhile come into operation, the property was sold by auction under the combined powers of that Act and of the will, one of the conditions of sale being that the timber was to be purchased at a valuation. The purchase-money of the land was £18,000 and the valuation of the timber amounted to £1,404 12s.

Of this £1,404 12s. the tenant for life claimed £787 18s. 8d., as representing timber which at the time of the sale had begun to decay and was materially injuring the underwood, and he also claimed to be entitled to a further sum of £154 3s. 4d., being one quarter of the balance of the purchase-money of the timber, under section 35 of the Settled Land Act. The tenant for life further claimed to be paid out of the said purchase-moneys the difference between his party and party and solicitor and client costs of the action of Thomas v. Williams, and any party and party costs which it might be found impossible to obtain from the plaintiffs in that action.

An originating summons was taken out by the tenant for life to determine these questions and for other purposes. The summons was adjourned into court, and now came on for hearing.

Section 35 of the Settled Land Act is as follows:—"Where a tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of timber and there is on the settled land timber ripe and fit for cutting, the tenant for life, on obtaining the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court, may cut and sell that timber or any part thereof. Three fourth parts of the net proceeds of the sale shall be set aside as and be capital money arising under this Act, and the other fourth part shall go as rents and profits."

Pearson, Q.C., and Mulligan (C. Gurdon with them), argued, as to the question with regard to the costs, that section 53 of the Settled Land Act constituted the tenant for life a trustee, and that, consequently, he had the same rights as a trustee would have to be indemnified out of the trust estate for every liability as to costs.

They cited Sebright v. Thornton, W. N., 1885, p. 176.

Pearson, Q.C., replied.

[Stirling, J., in the course of the argument, referred to Walters v. Woodbridge, 26 W. R. 469, 7 Ch. D. 504.]

Stirling, J. (after stating the facts, proceeded)—There were not in this case separate sales of the land and of the timber. The conditions of sale provided that the highest bidder should take the land, and pay for the timber at a valuation. The amount of the valuation was really an addition to the price, and must, I think, be treated as capital money under section 21 of the Settled Land Act. The tenant for life can, therefore, only claim it if he can make out that he is entitled under sub-section 9 of that section, which provides that capital money arising under the Act may be applied "in payment to any person becoming absolutely entitled." Was, then, the tenant for life, when he sold, absolutely entitled to the timber? I think he was not. Many cases have been cited to show that growing timber is part of the inheritance, and I need only refer in addition to Swinburn v. Ainslie, 33 W. R. 910, 30 Ch. D. 485. In that case Cotton, L.J., said:—"Trees which are severed from the soil are personal estate, and trees which are not severed belong to the inheritance. The life and growth certainly afford no test as to whether a tree is or is not affixed to the soil." Even trees which are dead, so long as they remain affixed to the soil, form part of the inheritance. So long, therefore, as timber remains unsevered, the tenant for life is not absolutely entitled to it. In the present case the timber had not been severed at the date of the sale, nor, as regards the Settled Land Act, had the tenant for life obtained the consent of the trustees to the severance. All he had obtained was their consent to the sale. He is, therefore, in the position which a tenant for life, impeachable for waste, selling under a power, occupied under the old law, a position which is exemplified by Doran v. Wiltshire. He never became absolutely entitled to any part of the timber, and the first claim, therefore, fails.

The question whether the tenant for life is entitled to the difference between his party and party and solicitor and client costs of the action of Thomas v. Williams depends upon the Settled Land Act. It was contended that, by virtue of section 53, the tenant for life is a trustee, and as such entitled to his costs. It is not necessary to decide this point, but my view is rather against it, for I regard section 53 as casting upon a tenant for life the responsibilities of a trustee rather than as conferring any rights upon him. The question in this case seems really to depend upon section 21, sub-section 10, of the Act, which allows capital money to be applied in payment of costs, charges, and expenses of or incidental to the exercise of any of the powers or the execution of any of the provisions of the Act. I have to consider what force is to be given to the word "incidental." It seems to me that the meaning is that the tenant for life is to have, not merely costs, charges, and expenses which directly and necessarily arise out of the exercise of the powers or provisions of the Act, but also those which are incurred casually and incidentally in the course of that exercise. The costs now in question may be described as incidental to the exercise of the power of sale. They were incurred in removing an obstacle improperly placed in the way of the exercise of the power of sale by the remaindermen. A trustee is entitled in an ordinary case to recover the costs of an action properly defended by him. That is illustrated by Walters v. Woodbridge. That is not entirely this case, because here the action was brought against both the tenant for life and the trustees, and was before the Settled Land Act came into operation. The tenant for life is not, I think, entitled to all the costs, for that would be contrary to section 55, sub-section 3. The taxing master must tax the costs of so much of the action as related to the exercise of the power under the Act, and then ascertain what are the party and party costs which have been paid to the tenant for life and are attributable to the same subject-matter, and the difference will be paid to the tenant for life as incidental to the exercise of his power of sale under the Act.

Eagleton v. Horner. (a.)

Will—Construction—"Children"—Illegitimate children—"Representatives."

A testator, by his will, dated in 1868, after giving his residuary real and personal estate to trustees on trust for sale, conversion, and investment, directed his trustees to stand possessed of a certain share in the trust fund upon trust to pay the income thereof "to my sister C., the wife of T. H.," during her life, and, after her death, to pay and divide the share unto and between all "her children who should be living at her decease, and the "representatives" of such of them as should have died in her lifetime leaving issue living at her decease, who should have attained the age of twenty-one years, "equally share and share alike, but so, nevertheless, that the representative or representatives of such of them so dying shall take only the share to which the deceased child would have been entitled had he or she survived" C.

C. was not the wife of T. H. at the date of the will or at any other time. T. H. was, previously to 1845, married to another woman, who was, at the date of the will, living and his lawful wife. In 1845 C. went to live with T. H., with whom she cohabited from that time down to her death in 1886. Of this union several children were born. The testator knew all the circumstances of the case, visited his sister, was on intimate terms with T. H., and recognized the children as his nephews and nieces.

Held, that the illegitimate children of C. and T. H. were intended and were entitled to take under the will.

Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, 6 E. & I. App. 265, discussed and followed.

Held, also, that the word "representatives" must be construed as next of kin or as descendants (which of the two was not, in this case, material), and not as "executors or administrators."

Adjourned summons.

Charles Palmer Horner, by his will dated the 21st of January, 1868, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same into money, and to invest the proceeds thereof as therein mentioned, and he directed his said trustees to stand possessed of the said moneys and investments as to one-third part thereof to pay the income to his brother, William Horner, for life, and after his decease "to pay and divide the said third part unto, between, and amongst all his children who shall be living at the time of his decease, and the representatives of such of them as may have died in his lifetime, who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, equally, share and share alike, but so, nevertheless, that the representative or representatives of such of them so dying shall take only the share to which the deceased child would have been entitled had he or she survived the said William Horner, and, if there shall be but one such child, then I give and bequeath the whole of such third part to such only child. And I direct my said trustees to stand possessed of one other third part of my said residuary estate upon the like trusts for the benefit of my sister Charlotte, the wife of Thomas Horner, and her child or children, as are hereinbefore expressed concerning my said brother, William Horner, and his child or children, and to stand possessed of one other third part of my said residuary estate upon the like trusts for my sister, Sarah Carpenter, widow, and her child or children. And I direct that the interests of each of my said sisters under this my will shall be paid to, and taken by, her for her sole and separate use, free from marital control and without power of anticipation, and that her sole receipt shall be a sufficient discharge for the same."

The testator died on the 22nd of February, 1870. His will was proved shortly afterwards. Charlotte Horner was not the wife of Thomas Horner at the date of the will or at any other time. Thomas Horner was married before the year 1845 to another woman, who was living and his lawful wife at the date of the will. In the year 1845 Charlotte Horner left her father's house, and from that time to her death, which happened on the 20th of November, 1886, she cohabited with Thomas Horner. Of this connection there were four children, two of whom were alive at the date of the will, and survived the testator, and the youngest of them was born in the year 1850. The testator knew all the circumstances of the case, was in the habit of visiting his sister, was on intimate terms with Thomas Horner, and recognized their children, though illegitimate, as his nephews and nieces.

Two questions arose for decision—namely (1) whether the children of Thomas and Charlotte Horner were entitled under the will, notwithstanding that they were illegitimate; and (2) what was the meaning of the word "representatives" in the gift.

A. Whitaker, for the executors and trustees of the will.

Pearson, Q.C., and Humber, for the children of Charlotte and Thomas.—On the first question, the word "children" may denote a class including illegitimate children when that is the plain and clear intention of the testator: Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R. 137, 6 E. & I. App. 265. There are two classes of cases where the primâ facie meaning of legitimate children is departed from—(1) where it is impossible from the circumstances that any legitimate children could take under the bequest, as in the case of a bequest to the children of a deceased person who had no legitimate children; (2) where there is on the face of the will a clear intention to include illegitimate children; and in order to interpret the words of the will it is the duty of the court to have regard to the knowledge of the testator as to the state of the family (per Lord Cairns in Hill v. Crook). In Hill v. Crook as in this case, the testator, having full knowledge of the facts, described the mother of the illegitimate children as the wife of the reputed father. These children take under the will as personæ designatæ.

They cited also Dorin v. Dorin, 23 W. R. 570, L. R. 7 E. & I. App. 568, 573; In re Brown's Trust, 21 W. R. 721, L. R. 16 Eq. 239; In re Humphries, Smith v. Millidge, 24 Ch. D. 691; In re Bryon, Drummond v. Leigh, 30 Ch. D. 110, 34 W. R. Dig. 218; In re Haseldine, Grange v. Sturdy, 34 W. R. 327, 31 Ch. D. 511.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General, adopted this argument, and cited Perkins v. Goodwin, W. N., 1877 p. 111.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and T. Dale Hart, contrà.—The word "children" means legitimate children, unless some repugnancy or inconsistency would result from that interpretation—per Lord Selborne in Dorin v. Dorin. The mere fact that the testator has described his sister as the wife of Thomas Horner is not sufficient to deprive the word "children" of its ordinary legal meaning: In re Ayles' Trusts, 24 W. R. 202, 1 Ch. D. 282. [Pearson, Q.C.—Hill v. Crook was not cited in that case.] Hill v. Crook went upon the ground that a form of marriage had been gone through which the testator recognized as constituting a valid marriage; and it is so explained in Megson v. Hindle, 28 W. R. 866, 15 Ch. D. 198, and In re Haseldine, Grange v. Sturdy. Perkins v. Goodwin is distinguishable on the same ground. The result of the cases is that very strong circumstances are required to displace the rule in favour of legitimate children. And the mere improbability of the existence of future children does not entitle illegitimate children to take: In re Overhill's Trust, 1 W. R. 208, 1 Sm. & G. 362; Paul v. Children, 19 W. R. 941, L. R. 12 Eq. 16. [Stirling, J., referred to Theobald on Wills, 3rd ed., p. 219, and Ellis v. Houston, 27 W. R. 501, 10 Ch. D. 236.]

Pearson, Q.C., replied.

Stirling, J.—The first question which I have to decide in the present case is, Who are the persons to take under a gift in the testator's will to the children of his sister Charlotte, described as the wife of Thomas Horner, she not having been the wife of Thomas Horner at the date of the will or at any other time. [After reading the clauses in the will as above stated, his lordship proceeded as follows:—] The facts are shortly these: The testator was born in 1807 and his sister Charlotte in 1812. The testator made his will in 1868.

Thomas Horner was married previously to the year 1845, and at the date of the will his wife was still living. In 1845 Charlotte went to live with Thomas Horner, and from that time until her death cohabited with him. There was not any marriage or ceremony of marriage between them. A ceremony of marriage would have rendered Thomas Horner liable to criminal proceedings for bigamy. Of this connection four children were born, two of whom died in the testator's lifetime, and two survived him. In 1868 the youngest of them was nineteen years of age. All these facts were known to the testator, who frequently visited his sister and was on intimate terms with Thomas Horner. It is clear, from the evidence, that he recognized the children as his nephews and nieces, and that they had acquired the reputation of being Charlotte's children.

The leading case on this subject is Hill v. Crook. In that case the testator spoke in his will of John Crook as his "son-in-law," and gave certain property to trustees for the use of his "daughter Mary, the wife of John Crook," for her life, for her separate use, independently of the debts or control of "her present or any after-taken husband," and, after her death, in trust for "the child, if only one, or all the children, if more than one, of my said daughter, Mary Crook." The testator died, leaving John and Mary Crook him surviving. John had gone through the ceremony of marriage with Mary Crook; but, as he had formerly been married to her sister, the union was not a lawful marriage. Two children were born of that union before the date of the will, and were recognized by the testator as his grandchildren. Other children were afterwards born, but Mary Crook never had any legitimate children. The House of Lords held that there was a sufficient designation of the children of Mary born before the will as the intended objects of the testator's bounty, and that they took under the gift in the will. [The learned judge then read passages from the judgments of Lords Chelmsford and Colonsay in that case, and continued:—]

And Lord Cairns in that case thus states the law: "I have referred to a long line of cases, not with the view of finding a will exactly parallel with the present, for that indeed would be a hopeless task, but for the purpose of extracting any principle which appeared to be the ratio decidendi of those various cases. And what appears to me to be the principle which may fairly be extracted from the cases on the subject is this—the term 'children' in a will primâ facie means legitimate children, and if there is nothing more in the will the circumstance that the person whose children are referred to has illegitimate children will not entitle those illegitimate children to take. But . . . that primâ facie interpretation is departed from where there is upon the face of the will itself, and upon a just and proper construction and interpretation of the words used in it, an expression of the intention of the testator to use the term 'children' not merely according to its primâ facie meaning of legitimate children, but according to a meaning which will apply to, and which will include, illegitimate children." And, after speaking of the knowledge possessed by the testator in that case as to the state of his family, Lord Cairns proceeds as follows:—"It appears to me that the terms 'husband' and 'wife,' 'father' and 'mother,' and 'children' are all correlative terms. If a father knows that his daughter has children by a connection which he calls a 'marriage' with a man whom he calls her 'husband,' terming the daughter the 'wife' of that husband, I am at a loss to understand the meaning of language if you are not to impute to that same person when he speaks of the 'children' of his daughter this meaning, that as he has termed his daughter and the man with whom she was living 'wife' and 'husband,' so also he means to term the offspring born of that so-called 'marriage' the children according to that nomenclature. That is all that your lordships have to find. If you find that that is the nomenclature used by the testator, taking his will as the dictionary from which you are to find the meaning of the terms he has used, that is all which the law, as I understand the cases, requires. Treating the cases as establishing the proposition to which I have referred, I am of opinion that there is clearly upon the face of this will, reading it simply with the knowledge which we are told to impute to the testator, a statement by him in his own words that he meant to make a provision for the family already born of that union which he styles a 'marriage.'"

Now, applying these statements of the law to the present case, we find the testator describing Charlotte as the "wife," although he knew that she was not and could not be the wife, of Thomas Horner. He uses the word "wife" therefore, not in its strict legal meaning, but as describing a person who passed as the wife, and in the same way he speaks of the connection between her and Thomas Horner as though it were a marriage. And, adopting the mode of interpretation laid down by Lord Cairns, I hold that "wife" and "children" being correlative terms, and "wife" being used to describe a person who passed as wife, "child" or "children" must be intended in this will to describe those who passed as such or were reputed as such.

It has been said that in this case there was no form of marriage between Charlotte and Thomas Horner. That is so. But I should be narrowing the principle of interpretation laid down in Hill v. Crook if I were to hold that principle to apply only to a case agreeing in all particulars with that case. [His lordship then referred to Dorin v. Dorin, pointing out that in that case no disapprobation was expressed of anything laid down in Hill v. Crook, and, after discussing the cases cited in the course of the argument, proceeded as follows:—] There is, therefore, no authority in my way in applying to this case the principles laid down in Hill v. Crook. There are here sufficient circumstances to show that the illegitimate children of Charlotte were the persons described in the will, and they are entitled to take accordingly.

Pearson, Q.C., and Humber, on the second question—viz., as to the meaning of the word "representatives" in the gift.—The word "representatives" read with the context does not mean executors and administrators, for the testator uses the latter words in their proper sense in another part of the will, when wishing to describe legal personal representatives. "Representatives," therefore, means descendants.

They cited Walker v. Marquis of Camden, 16 Sim. 329; Lyon v. Coward, 15 Sim. 287; Hempel v. Watson, 3 Ves. 383; Styth v. Monro, 6 Sim. 49; Atherton v. Crowther, 19 Beav. 448.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—The word "representatives" must be read in their proper legal signification of legal personal representatives; the words "equally share and share alike" being applicable to "children," not to "representatives."

The cases of Attorney-General v. Fletcher, L. R. 13 Eq. 128, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 138; Hodges v. Grant, 15 W. R. 607, L. R. 4 Eq. 140; and King v. Cleaveland 7 W. R. 602, 4 De G. & J. 477, were also referred to.

STIRLING, J., after reading the gift in the will, said:—Primâ facie the word "representatives" means executors and administrators—i.e., legal personal representatives. But it is a flexible term, and its primâ facie meaning will give way to what appears from the will to be the meaning assigned to it by the testator. In this gift the clause "but so, nevertheless, that the representative or representatives of such of them so dying shall take only the share to which the deceased child would have been entitled had he or she survived the said William Horner" would be surplusage if the word "representatives" in the former part of the gift meant executors and administrators.

Now, as effect ought to be given, so far as possible, to all the words of the will, and as nothing appears elsewhere in the will to show such a construction to be open to objection, I hold "representatives," not to mean executors and administrators, but either "next of kin" or "descendants"; which, it is not in this case necessary for me to decide.

Lemon v. Simmons. (a.)

Slander—Imputation of indictable offence—Larceny by husband of wife's property—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 12.

In an action for slander the words complained of were to the effect that the plaintiff robbed his wife of £75 before her removal to a lunatic asylum, and was anxious to get rid of her in order that he might take the remainder of her money.

Held, that as such words did not impute to the plaintiff that he stole his wife's money while they were living apart, or when he was about to leave or desert her, they were not actionable, inasmuch as they did not, even under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, impute an indictable offence.

Motion by the defendant for a new trial or for judgment.

The action was for slander, and the trial took place before Day, J., and a common jury. The words complained of were spoken under the following circumstances. The plaintiff's wife, who was possessed of £150 of her own money, became lunatic, and was removed from the plaintiff's house to the workhouse of Stepney Union. At a subsequent meeting of the board of guardians the defendant, who was a relative of the plaintiff's wife, but was not a guardian or even a ratepayer, said "Mrs. Lemon's insanity has been brought about by her husband's violence. Mr. Lemon, previous to his wife's removal, in conjunction with his sister, broke open a box belonging to his wife in her room, and robbed her of a sum of about £75. He was most anxious to get rid of her in order that he might take the remainder of her money." The defendant pleaded that the occasion on which the words were spoken was privileged, and that the words did not impute an indictable offence. Day, J., held that the occasion was not privileged, and he left it to the jury to say whether the words imputed a criminal offence. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £25.

The terms of the notice of motion asked for judgment for the defendant on the ground (inter alia) that the words were not capable of meaning that the plaintiff had feloniously stolen money from his wife or had committed any other indictable offence, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection on the part of a learned judge in omitting to direct the jury as to what would amount to a felonious stealing by a husband from his wife.

Bonanquet, Q. C. (Stephens with him), for the defendant.—At common law it was not possible under any circumstances for a husband to be indicted for taking his wife's property; and now it is only possible under the circumstances mentioned in section 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—i.e., it is necessary that the husband and wife should be living apart, and that the property should have been taken by the husband while they were living apart, or at a time when the husband was deserting, or about to desert, his wife. In the present case the husband and wife were at the time living together, and there is no evidence that he was about to desert her. Neither do the words suggest that such was the case. The statement that he was anxious to get rid of his wife is a very different thing from saying that he was intending to desert her. Therefore, the words, not imputing an indictable offence, are not actionable: Jackson v. Adams, 2 Bing. N. C. 402; Williams v. Stott, 1 C. & M. 675. The learned judge ought to have entered judgment for the defendant; or, at least, he ought to have explained to the jury under what circumstances taking a wife's money would amount to an indictable offence.

F. J. Lowe, for the plaintiff.—The defendant must be taken to have meant that the plaintiff had done that which, according to the Married Women's Property Act, amounts to a larceny. In each of the cases cited the plaintiff could not, being what he was, have committed the offence imputed to him. The churchwarden could not steal the bell ropes of his own church; neither could a man, who was neither a clerk nor a servant, have committed embezzlement. Here the plaintiff might possibly have committed a larceny of his wife's money. And the defendant having said he did, his words are actionable.

Huddleston, B.—It was contended at the trial that the occasion on which the words were spoken was privileged; but the judge held it was not. It does not sufficiently appear on the notes what were the circumstances under which the statement was made, nor what was the nature of the inquiry before the guardians, to enable us to say whether the learned judge was right on that point, though for my own part I have some doubt whether this was not a privileged communication. However, leaving out the parts of the claim which were not urged at the trial, the real question is whether the words which accuse the plaintiff of robbing his wife impute an indictable offence.

The substance of the statement seems to be this, that the plaintiff had married a woman with £150, that he had robbed her of £75 while living with her, and being anxious to have the other £75 had had her removed to a lunatic asylum. Do these words impute an indictable offence? At common law a husband could not be guilty of an indictable offence towards his wife in respect of her property. But under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, he can be, in certain circumstances. What those circumstances are is to be seen from the proviso to section 12, "Provided always that no criminal proceeding shall be taken by any wife against her husband by virtue of this Act while they are living together as to or concerning any property claimed by her, nor while they are living apart as to or concerning any act done by the husband while they were living together, concerning property claimed by the wife, unless such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the husband when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, his wife." Now do the words complained of impute to the plaintiff that he stole his wife's money while they were living apart or when he was about to leave or desert her? On the contrary, they impute that he stole the first sum of money while they were living together; and they do not suggest any intention on the part of the husband to desert his wife, but merely impute some artifice in having his wife removed in order that he might get the rest of her money. If the words had been merely that the plaintiff robbed his wife, then the jury possibly might have thought that that meant when they were living apart, or when he was about to desert her.

But we must take the whole of the words together, and, thus taken, they do not amount to an imputation of an indictable offence.

The two cases which have been cited bear out this view. It is clear that the action cannot be sustained; and therefore there must be judgment for the defendant.

Manisty, J.—I concur. There is no innuendo in the statement of claim to the words alleging that the plaintiff robbed his wife of £75 previous to her removal. If there had been, it must have been this—meaning that he took the money when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, his wife. And the plaintiff would have had to show that that was the meaning of the words. Really the words come to this, "You took your wife's money." But that is not imputing an indictable offence; and therefore the words are not actionable.

Topley v. Crosbie. (a.)

Bill of sale—Covenant necessary for maintenance of security—Absence of power to seize in default—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 7.

A bill of sale contained a covenant that the grantor would keep insured and in repair the chattels assigned, provided that, if default were made by the grantor, the grantee might insure and repair and enter for that purpose on the premises where the chattels were stored, the expenses so incurred, with interest at five per cent., to be a charge on the chattels; and it was further agreed that it should be lawful for the grantee to seize upon the happening of any of the events mentioned in the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 7.

Held, that the bill of sale was good.

This was an appeal from the county court of Norwich.

The respondent claimed to be entitled under a bill of sale to certain goods taken in execution for a judgment debt.

The bill of sale in question contained a covenant to the following effect—viz., that the grantor would, "during the continuance of the security, keep the chattels specifically described in the schedule in good and substantial repair, and in perfect working order, and insured against loss or damage by fire in the sum of £58 6s. 8d. at the least, and would duly and punctually pay all premiums and moneys necessary for effecting and keeping up the insurance on the first day on which the same ought to be paid, and would, on demand, produce to the grantee the policy or policies of insurance and the receipt for every payment; and that, if default should at any time be made by the grantor in effecting or keeping up such insurance, or in keeping the chattels or any part thereof in good and substantial repair and in perfect working order, it should be lawful for the grantee to insure and keep insured the chattels or any part thereof in any sum not exceeding £58 6s. 8d., to repair and keep in repair the same, and to put the same in perfect working order, and to enter upon the premises on which the chattels might be for the time being for that purpose; and that all moneys expended by the grantee for such purpose, together with interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the time of the same having been expended, should, on demand, be repaid to the grantee by the grantor, and, until such repayment, should be a charge upon the chattels; and it was agreed and declared that, upon the happening of any one or more of the events mentioned in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, it should be lawful for the grantee at any time thereafter to enter and seize the chattels, and, after the expiration of five clear days from the days on which the chattels should be seized, to sell the same, and, out of the proceeds of such sale, to pay the expenses incurred in such sale and the principal sum of £58 6s. 8d., and interest thereon, then owing to the grantee on the security, and to pay the surplus (if any) to the grantor. Provided that the chattels thereby assured should not be liable to seizure or to be taken possession of by the grantee for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882."

The deputy judge held that the bill of sale was valid, and gave judgment for the claimant, the holder of the bill of sale.

The execution creditor appealed.

Beddall, for the appellant.

Gore, for the respondent.

Mathew, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. Either the provision in question is necessary for the maintenance of the security within the meanng of the Act, or it is not. If it is, the bill of sale is in exact conformity with the Act, and does not sin against it in any particular. If it is not, then it is a covenant which the parties have agreed to treat as one for the maintenance of the security, and they have been careful not to insert a right to seize the goods for a breach of it. That being so, upon the authority of the cases of Bianchi v. Offord, 17 Q. B. D. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 27, and Real and Personal Advance Co. v. Clears, ante, p. 256, the insertion of that proviso does not invalidate the bill of sale, the power to seize being limited to cases permitted by section 7 of the Act. In each of the cases referred to the court dwelt on the necessity of so limiting the power to seize, and decided that, if the provisions for the maintenance of the security only became so by agreement between the parties, the mention of a power to seize upon breach of it avoids the bill of sale, but without that condition that effect does not follow.

A. L. Smith, J.—I think that this bill of sale is good. By the form in the schedule to the Act it is made clear that the parties to the bill of sale may agree upon provisions for the maintenance of the security, and in doing so, if they are following the prescribed form, they are not sinning against the Act. For example, suppose that there is a proviso that the grantor should not remove the goods from the premises, it cannot be doubted that this is a provision for the maintenance of the security. Again, suppose there is a stipulation that the grantor should, upon demand made by the grantee, produce a receipt for the last quarter's rent of the premises upon which the goods are. That is also a stipulation for the maintenance of the security. Now both these provisions are excluded from the terms of section 7, for there can be no right to seize in the one case unless the removal is fraudulent and in the other unless the receipt for rent is kept back without sufficient reason. Yet both these provisions, as I have stated them, are for the maintenance of the security. The Act provides that such conditions may be inserted if the parties agree upon them. Then why, although they do not come within section 7, should they vitiate the bill of sale when the Act expressly provides for their insertion? It seems to me to be settled by the cases that if the parties agree that there should be a power of execution on breach of such a provision, notwithstanding the terms of section 7, that will vitiate the bill of sale. It may be that, as has been suggested, the right canon of construction is that when a power to seize in default is attached to a covenant not necessary for the maintenance of the security it offends against section 9, because it gives a power to seize for causes other than those mentioned in section 7. But whether that be so or not the matter is now settled by authority. It is equally settled by authority that when a proviso for the maintenance of the security is agreed upon which is not within the terms of section 7, and no power to seize the goods upon breach of its provisions is attached, it does not vitiate the bill of sale: Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1; Furber v. Cobb, 35 W. R. 398, 18 Q. B. D. 494. The cases of Bianchi v. Offord and Real and Personal Advance Co. v. Clears make this matter still clearer, for in each of them there was a covenant that the sum expended by the grantee upon repairs, &c., was to be added to the security, and was made recoverable in the same manner as the principal sum secured, and the court held that the bill of sale was bad, as a power was there given for a cause not included in section 7. I think that the power of seizure given in the present case does not extend to matters not included in section 7, and, therefore, does not offend against the Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (35 W. R. 23, 11 P. D. 170) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.) affirming a decision of Sir J. Hannen.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment delivered by Lord Herschell.

March 17.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir W. Phillimore, Q.C. (Aspinall with them), for the appellants.—This is really an appeal from the decision in Woodley v. Michell, 31 W. R. 651, 11 Q. B. D. 47. As the law now stands, "perils of the seas" covers collision caused by negligence of the non-carrying ship in policies of insurance, but not in bills of lading. Collision is primâ facie a peril of the seas; the onus is on the owner of the goods to prove negligence of the carrier, which would be an answer to the exception. [They cited Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co., 14 W. R. 893, L. R. 1 C. P. 600; s. c., on appeal, 16 W. R. 796, L. R. 3 C. P. 476; Phillips v. Clark, 5 W. R. 582, 2 C. B. N. C. 231; The Haswell, Br. & Lush. 247; Hall v. Washington Insurance Co., 2 Story's Rep. 176.] The dictum of Brett, M.R., in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co., 31 W. R. 445, 10 Q. B. D. 521, is the only authority in the respondents' favour.

Hollams (Sir C. Russell, Q.C., with him), for the respondents.—Collision is not primâ facie a peril of the seas; the shipowners, to relieve themselves of liability, must prove that there was no negligence on their part; thus, whether Woodley v. Michell is right or wrong, the decision in this case should be affirmed.

He referred to Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Co., 22 W. R. 752, L. R. 9 Q. B. 546; Angell on Carriers, 202; Story on Bailments, 512; Buller v. Fisher, 3 Esp. 67.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., replied.

July 14.—Lord Herschell.—In order to render clear the exact point which has to be determined in this case, it will be necessary to state with some minuteness the pleadings and the course which the case took at the trial.

The owners of cargo by the steamship Xantho, who were the plaintiffs in the action, by their statement of claim alleged that they had suffered damage by breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading of goods shipped at Cronstadt on board the defendants' vessel Xantho for carriage to Hull, that the bills of lading were indorsed to the plaintiffs, to whom the property in the goods passed by such indorsement, and that the goods were not delivered. The statement further alleged, alternatively, that the plaintiffs had suffered damage from the loss of their goods whilst on board the defendants' vessel by a collision with the steamship Valuta, caused by the negligent navigation of the defendants' servants.

The statement of defence denied the contract and the breach, and also that the bills of lading were indorsed to the plaintiffs, and that the property in the goods thereby passed to them. In answer to the alternative claim it is admitted that The Xantho came into collision with The Valuta, but denied that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of The Xantho, and it is alleged that it was solely caused by the negligent navigation of The Valuta. The defence further alleged that the loss was occasioned by perils which were excepted by the bill of lading.

The action came on for trial before the President of the Probate and Admiralty Division. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs put in as his only evidence the bills of lading and admissions that the property in the goods and the right to sue on the bills of lading had passed to the plaintiffs, and that the goods had not been delivered. The bills of lading, which were in the usual form, contained an exception in these terms:—"The act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted."

In opening his case the plaintiffs' counsel stated that The Xantho was lost by reason of a collision which took place between that vessel and The Valuta in a fog, and submitted that, whether the collision arose from the negligence of those navigating The Xantho or of those navigating The Valuta, or from the negligence of both combined, the loss of the goods did not fall wit hin the exception contained in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were in either case entitled to recover. He relied, in support of this contention, upon the case of Woodley v. Michell.

The learned counsel for the defendants admitted that, if Woodley v. Michell were good law, he could not resist this view, that, even if he proved that no negligence was to be imputed to The Xantho, and that the disaster was solely due to the negligence of The Valuta, as he could not prove that it arose from an inevitable accident, the result must be a decision for the plaintiffs. He considered, therefore, that the only course open to the defendants was to test the law laid down in Woodley v. Michell by appeal to your lordship's House.

I think the defendants' counsel was perfectly correct in the course which he took. If he had proved to demonstration that his vessel was free from blame, and that the other vessel's negligence alone caused the disaster, he would have established no defence so long as Woodley v. Michell stood. He accordingly wisely abstained from the idle task of attempting to prove facts which the Court of Appeal had held to be wholly immaterial.

It appears to me that the only question which arises for your lordships' determination in this case is whether the decision in Woodley v. Michell can be sustained. In that case an action was brought on a bill of lading. The goods were lost owing to a collision between the defendants' vessel and another vessel. The jury found that there was no negligence on the part of the master or crew of the carrying vessel. The Court of Appeal held that the defendants were not protected by the exception of "perils of the sea" contained in the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The Master of the Rolls said: "What I think it necessary in this case to say (and I repeat it without any doubt) is that although a collision, when brought about without any negligence of either vessel, is or may be a peril of the sea, a collision brought about by the negligence of either of the vessels, so that without that negligence it could not have happened, is not a peril of the sea within the terms of that exception in a bill of lading." And Cotton, L.J., thus expresses himself: "There is no decision that is binding upon us that a collision occasioned by the negligence of one of the ships is a peril of the sea. Looking, then, upon it with reference to decided cases, and according to the ordinary interpretation of words, I cannot see how, if there was no peril from sea or wind, and an accident is caused by the negligent act of one of the two ships which come into collision, that can be said to be a peril of the sea."

The question as to what comes within the term "perils of the sea" (and certainly the words "dangers and accidents of the sea" cannot have a narrower interpretation) has been more frequently the subject of decision in the case of marine policies than of bills of lading. I will first notice the decisions pronounced with regard to the former instrument, and then inquire how far a different interpretation is to be applied in the case of the latter.

I think it clear that the term "perils of the sea" does not cover every accident or casualty which may happen to the subject-matter of the insurance on the sea. It must be a peril "of" the sea. Again, it is well settled that it is not every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause that is covered by these words. They do not protect, for example, against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear. There must be some casualty—something which could not be foreseen—as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure. The purpose of the policy is to secure an indemnity against accidents which may happen, not against events which must happen. It was contended that those losses only were losses by perils of the sea which were occasioned by extraordinary violence of the winds or waves. I think this is too narrow a construction of the words, and it is certainly not supported by the authorities or by common understanding. It is beyond question that, if a vessel strikes upon a sunken rock in fair weather and sinks, this is a loss by perils of the sea. And a loss by foundering, owing to a vessel coming into collision with another vessel, even when the collision results from the negligence of that other vessel, falls within the same category. Indeed, I am aware of only one case which throws a doubt upon the proposition that every loss by incursion of the sea, due to a vessel coming accidentally (using that word in its popular sense) into contact with a foreign body, which penetrates it and causes a leak, is a loss by a peril of the sea. I refer to the case of Cullen v. Butler, where a ship having been sunk by another ship firing upon her in mistake for an enemy, the court inclined to the opinion that this was not a loss by perils of the sea. I think, however, this expression of opinion stands alone, and has not been sanctioned by subsequent cases.

But it is said that the words "perils of the sea" occurring in a bill of lading or other contract of carriage must receive a different interpretation from that which is given to them in a policy of marine insurance; that in the latter case the causa proxima alone is regarded; whilst in the former you may go behind the causa proxima and look at what was the real or efficient cause. It is on this view that the Court of Appeal acted in Woodley v. Michell.

Now, I quite agree that in the case of a marine policy the causa proxima alone is considered. If that which immediately caused the loss was a peril of the sea, it matters not how it was induced, even if it were by the negligence of those navigating the vessel. It is equally clear that in the case of a bill of lading you may sometimes look behind the immediate cause, and the shipowner is not protected by the exception of perils of the sea in every case in which he would be entitled to recover on his policy, on the ground that there has been a loss by such perils. But I do not think this difference arises from the words "perils of the sea" having a different meaning in the two instruments, but from the context or general scope and purpose of the contract of carriage, excluding in certain cases the operation of the exception. It would, in my opinion, be very objectionable, unless well settled authority compelled it, to give a different meaning to the same words occurring in two maritime instruments. The true view appears to me to be presented by Willes, J., in his judgment in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. The question there arose whether, when a vessel was lost by a collision caused by the negligence of those navigating the carrying ship, the case fell within the exception of "perils of the sea." It was held that it did not. Reference having been made to cases on policies of insurance, and the interpretation there put upon these words, Willes, J., said, "I may say that a policy of insurance is an absolute contract to indemnify for loss by perils of the sea and it is only necessary to see whether the loss comes within the terms of the contract and is caused by peril of the sea; the fact that the loss is partly caused by things not distinctly perils of the sea does not prevent its coming within the contract. In the case of a bill of lading it is different, because there the contract is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils. If the goods are not carried with reasonable care, and are consequently lost by perils of the sea it becomes necessary to reconcile the two parts of the instrument, and this is done by holding that if the loss through perils of the sea is caused by the previous default of the shipowner, he is liable for this breach of his covenant."

So far as I am aware, until the case of Woodley v. Michell was decided, there was no authority for saying that a loss, the proximate cause of which was a peril of the sea, and which did not result from the act or default of the carrier, was not within the exception. In the case of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co., the present Master of the Rolls suggested a view that a loss by a collision due to the negligence not of the carrying, but of the other vessel, was not a loss by perils of the sea. He said: "If the collision is caused without any fault on the part of the carrying ship, but is caused by reason of the negligence of those who are conducting the other ship, it cannot be called an accident of the sea. An accident is that which happens without the fault of anybody, and consequently a collision which is the fault of somebody is not an accident of the sea." This was a dictum certainly not necessary for the decision of that case. But in Woodley v. Michell it was repeated and adopted as the ground of judgment. With the greatest respect for that learned judge, the weight of whose opinion on any question of maritime law I fully recognize, I am unable to perceive why a loss occasioned by an inroad of the sea owing to a casualty over which the shipowner and his servants had no control should not be held to be within the exception. If the distinction pointed out by Willes, J., between the rules governing the construction of policies of marine insurance and bills of lading be the true one, it is certainly not applicable to such a case. I am unable to concur in the view that a disaster which happens from the fault of somebody can never be an accident or peril of the sea; and I think it would give rise to distinctions resting on no sound basis if it were to be held that the exception of perils of the seas in a bill of lading was always excluded when the inroad of the sea which occasioned the loss was induced by some intervention of human agency. Take the case which I put in the course of the argument, of a ship which strikes upon a rock and is lost, because the light which should have warned the mariner against it has become extinguished owing to the negligence of the person in charge. Why should this not be within the exception, whilst a similar loss arising from a vessel coming into contact with a rock not marked upon the chart admittedly would be? And what substantial distinction is there between this latter case and that of a vessel foundering through collision with a ship at anchor left at night without lights? For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that the case of Woodley v. Michell cannot be supported.

It was contended by the learned counsel for the appellants that if your lordships should take this view, the judgment ought to be entered for them. I cannot concur in this. With the authority of Woodley v. Michell in their favour, when once it was admitted that the accident was not inevitable, it was as fruitless for the respondents to give evidence of the negligence of the appellants as it was for the appellants to seek to cast the blame on the other vessel. Much argument was addressed to your lordships on the question whether, when the plaintiffs had proved that the goods had not been delivered, thus throwing the onus on the defendants of excusing their non-delivery, proof by them that the vessel had been sunk in a collision would be sufficient to shift the onus and render it incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish that the collision was due to the defendants' negligence, or whether the defendants, to bring themselves within the exception, must show that the loss was not due to a cause induced by their own negligence. I do not think that this point is now before your lordships for decision. Arguments of weight have been adduced in support of either view. I certainly must not be understood as deciding that the mere proof of loss by collision under circumstances as consistent with its resulting from the negligence of the carrying ship as from any other cause would exonerate the defendants.

I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that there be a new trial of the action.

Lord Bramwell.—My noble and learned friend has been kind enough to read his opinion first in consequence of its containing a fuller statement of the facts than what I am about to read to your lordships.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim is for the non-delivery of goods according to a bill of lading, with an alternative claim for loss of the goods therein mentioned, owing to the negligence of the defendants. It was admitted at the trial by the defendants that the goods had not been delivered according to the bill of lading. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the vessel sank owing to damage received in a collision. It was admitted by the defendants that that collision was not the result of inevitable accident—i.e., of winds, waves, or other natural causes. The plaintiffs' contended, on the authority of Woodley v. Michell, that that being so, they were entitled to judgment, whether the collision was attributable to the negligence of the defendants with or without negligence on the other ship, or wholly to the negligence of that other. The President so ruled, considering himself bound by Woodley v. Michell. That case decided that a damage, including foundering occasioned by collision, was not a loss by perils of the sea within those words of exception in a bill of lading, unless occasioned by action of sea or wind or inevitable accident; and, therefore, that a collision occasioned, whether by the negligence of the one ship or the other or both, was not a loss by such perils. The now defendants appealed, but the ruling was upheld, the court giving reasons for their opinion, and also relying on the case of Woodley v. Michell. With great respect I cannot agree. I think that case wrongly decided, and differ from the reasons given in support of the judgment in that and in this case. Was it by a peril of the sea that the defendants' ship foundered? The facts are, that the sea water flowed into her through a hole, and flowed in such quantities that she sank. It seems to me that the bare statement shows she went to the bottom through a peril of the sea. If the hole had been small, there being a piece of bad wood, a plank starting, or a similar cause, it would be called a leak, and no one would doubt that she foundered from a peril of the sea. Does it make any difference that the hole was large, and occasioned by collision? I cannot think it does. It is admitted that if the question had arisen on an insurance against loss by perils of the sea this would have been within the policy a loss by perils of the sea. Are the words to have different meanings in the two instruments? Why should they? Different consequences may follow. The insurer may be unable to defend himself, on the ground that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the crew, while the freighter may maintain an action on the ground that it was. But how is the loss a loss by perils of the sea in one case and not in the other? The argument is, that wind and waves did not cause the loss, but negligence in someone. But surely, if that were so, a loss by striking in calm weather on a sunken rock not marked on the chart would not be a loss by perils of the seas within the bill of lading, or striking on a rock from which the light had been removed, or an iceberg, or a vessel without lights. I cannot bring myself to see that such cases are not losses by perils of the sea Is not the chance of being run against by a clumsy rider one of the perils of hunting? It would be strange if an underwriter on cargo suing in the name of the cargo owners on the bill of lading should say, "I have paid for a loss by perils of the sea, and claim on you because the loss was not by perils of the sea." The Court of Appeal, with great respect, argued as though the collision caused the loss. So it did in a sense. It was a causâ sine quâ non, but it was not the causa causans. It was causa remota, but not causa proxima. The causa proxima of the loss was foundering. It would be strange if a plank started, and the vessel went to the bottom in consequence, that it should be held, "Oh, the loss is not by peril of the seas, but by bad carpentering." Let there be no doubt. I do not say that in such case the freighter might not complain that his goods were carried in an unseaworthy ship. All I say is, that the loss would be by perils of the seas.

It is only necessary for this House to say that if the foundering was occasioned by a collision, with no blame on the defendants, they ought to have succeeded. For this is what they offered to prove, and were told that it was useless to do so. Mr. Hollams argued that they ought to have insisted on their right to prove their case. I am clearly of a different opinion. I think, when the judge says, "I shall decide against you, though you prove what you say," the party must acquiesce for the time, and seek his remedy by appeal. I think that the judge might properly refuse to hear the evidence, for he might truly say that, in his opinion, this evidence is irrelevant to any issue on the record; no one giving it would be liable to the penalty of perjury. The practice, in my experience, has always been in conformity with what I am now saying.

The judgment, then, must be set aside. The Attorney-General contended that it should be entered for the defendants. That also is impossible. It could not have been done before the Judicature Act, and that Act does not authorize it. It would be most unjust to the plaintiffs. They, relying on the law as it had been laid down, proved what was a sufficient case, and did not give what would have been irrelevant evidence if the law had been rightly laid down. I say nothing about burthen of proof. All I say is, that if the collision was in no way the fault of the defendant's crew, they are entitled to judgment.

As to costs, I do not remember whether my noble and learned friend made any mention of costs, but I will merely read what I have written—namely, that as to costs it seems to me that neither party is to blame, and that, consequently, the costs of the former trial, of the appeal in the court below and in this House, should be costs in the cause for either party. I do not know whether that will meet your lordship's view in the matter, but that can be settled afterwards.

Lord Macnaghten.—In this case the bill of lading on which the question arises is in common form. In the usual terms it states the engagement on the part of the shipowner to deliver the goods intrusted to his care. At the same time it specifies, by way of exception, certain cases in which failure to deliver those goods may be excused. So much for the express terms of the bill of lading. But the shipowner's obligations are not limited and exhausted by what appears on the face of the instrument. Underlying the contract, implied and involved in it, there is a warranty by the shipowner that his vessel is seaworthy, and there is also an engagement on his part to use due care and skill in navigating the vessel and carrying the goods. Having regard to the duties thus cast upon the shipowner, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence that, even in cases within the very terms of the exception in the bill of lading, the shipowner is not protected if any default or negligence on his part has caused or contributed to the loss.

Turning now to the facts of the case, we find that it was admitted at the trial that the vessel with the goods on board foundered at sea in consequence of a collision. The exception in the bill of lading includes "dangers and accidents of the sea." Is shipwreck by collision a danger or accident of the sea? I should say undoubtedly it is. Then comes the question, How was the collision brought about? Of that we know nothing, except that it was not due to inevitable accident. So much was admitted. It follows from that admission that one or both of the vessels that came into collision must have been to blame.

In that state of things I should have thought that the issue between the parties was reduced to this question, Was the carrying vessel in fault? If it was not, the shipowner is protected; if it was, though the loss occurred through one of the excepted perils, the shipowner cannot rely on the exception.

Unfortunately that simple issue was obscured, and the trial of the action was rendered abortive by reason of the decision in Woodley v. Michell. In the face of that decision it would have been idle for the parties to have gone into the facts at the trial. It would have been a work of supererogation on the part of the plaintiffs to have proved that the carrying vessel was in fault. The defendants would have been no nearer winning if they had established by the clearest evidence that up to the moment of the collision they had performed every duty cast upon them. Under these circumstances the parties have been compelled to come to your lordship's House, appealing in form against the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case, but in reality against the decision in Woodley v. Michell.

Your lordships are therefore called upon to determine whether the rule laid down in Woodley v. Michell can be supported on principle or authority. Authority in its favour there is none. The industry of counsel could not produce any passage from any recognized treatise or from any reported judgment countenancing the doctrine, except one observation in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co., which was not necessary for the decision.

It seems to me to be equally difficult to support the rule in Woodley v. Michell on principle. If the accident is brought about by the negligence of the owner of the carrying vessel or his servants, it would be contrary to common sense and against all sound principle to allow one who was the author of the mischief to avail himself of his own wrong. But if the carrying shipowner is free from all blame, why should he suffer from the errors or misconduct of those over whom he has no control? As far as he and his vessel are concerned, what difference can it make in that case whether the collision is caused by a sunken rock or by an iceberg or by another vessel, or whether that other vessel is or is not in fault?

It seems to me, if I may say so with all deference, that the error of the Court of Appeal in the present case is to be found in this: They start with the assumption that the same words have different meanings when used in policies of assurance and when used in bills of lading. For that assumption there is not, I venture to think, any foundation. Different considerations, no doubt, apply to the two contracts, a contract of indemnity, and a contract of carriage—and the same event may have a different result in the one case from what it would have in the other; but in mercantile contracts so closely connected the same words must have the same meaning. Whatever the expression "perils of the sea" means in a policy of assurance, it means neither more nor less in a bill of lading.

The result, in my opinion, is that the appeal must be allowed, and the litigant parties must begin over again.

Orders appealed from reversed, and a new trial ordered; the costs of the trial already had to be costs in the cause; and the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House to be the defendants' costs in the cause.

CHALLENDER v. ROYLE. (a.)

Patent—Threats by patentee of legal proceedings—Injunction—"Due diligence"—Validity of patent—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 32.

The proviso contained in section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, will be satisfied if an action to test the validity of the patent or the fact of infringement is honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person or persons to whom the threats have been made.

In considering whether such an action has been commenced with reasonable diligence, regard must be had to the time when the threats were first issued, and not to the time when the plaintiff first heard of the infringement.

In an action under section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883, to restrain the issue of threats, the plaintiff may put in issue the validity of the defendant's patent.

Appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court.

The defendant Royle was the owner of a patent, granted in 1879, for a "tap union," and ever since 1879 he had manufactured and sold the patented article, and until recently, as he alleged, he had not been aware of any infringement of his patent.

In March, 1887, he discovered that a number of tap unions not being made by himself were being sold, and he considered that those articles were infringements of his patent. These articles were manufactured by Challender, the plaintiff, who had taken out a patent in 1886. Royle, thereupon, in March, 1887, issued the following circular:—

"ROYLE'S PATENTS!!

"It having come to our knowledge that certain of our patents are being infringed—notably Royle's Patent Tap Unions and Patent Archimedean Egg-Beaters, we hereby caution our numerous friends against purchasing these imitation goods. It cannot be too generally known that all parties who handle a patented article, from the maker to the user, including also importers, are liable to the patentee. Our patent solicitor has instructions to take proceedings against all infringers.—JOHN J. ROYLE."

This circular was aimed at the tap union made by Challender, and was circulated among customers of his.

In April Challender wrote to Royle challenging him to take legal proceedings to restrain the alleged infringement of his patent.

On the 24th of May a person employed by Royle purchased from a company called the Manchester Plumbing Co. a tap union manufactured by Challender, and warned the company that it was an infringement of Royle's patent, and that Royle would proceed against them if they continued to sell it.

On the 15th of June Royle served the company with a writ in an action to restrain them from infringing his patent.

The writ in the present action was issued on the 11th of June, but not served till the 16th. By it the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain Royle from threatening, by circulars or otherwise, any person with legal proceedings or liability in respect of the manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the plaintiff's tap union.

(a) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bristowe, V.C., granted an interlocutory injunction. Royle appealed.

By section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, "Where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention, by circular, advertisement, or otherwise, threatens any other person with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of any alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention, any person or persons aggrieved thereby may bring an action against him, and may obtain an injunction against the continuance of such threats, and may recover such damages (if any) as may have been sustained thereby, if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not, in fact, an infringement of any legal rights of the persons making such threats. Provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent."

Moulton, Q.C., and S. Hall, for the appellant.—The circular issued by the appellant was not a "threat" within the meaning of section 32, but was merely a warning to the public. Section 32 was aimed at a definite threat of legal proceedings addressed to an individual in respect of an alleged past infringement of a patent. It is not necessary that the "action for infringement" mentioned in the proviso at the end of the section should be brought against the "person aggrieved" mentioned in the former part of the section; it is sufficient if it is brought against some other alleged infringer if it raises the same question which would be raised against the "person aggrieved" if he were the defendant. The action against the Manchester Plumbing Co. is, therefore, sufficient to exclude section 32, and that action has been commenced with "due diligence."

Finlay, Q.C., and Bousfield, for the respondent.—The appellant did not commence his action with "due diligence," and the respondent's action cannot, therefore, be thereby defeated. The action brought by the appellant ought to be one in which the validity of his patent might be put in issue. This cannot be done in the action brought by him, as the respondent is not a party to it. In Kurtz v. Spence, 35 W. R. 26, 33 Ch. D. 579, it was held that in an action under section 32 the question of the validity of the patent could not be raised. The authority of this case has, however, been doubted in Walker v. Clarke, 4 Rep. Pat. Cas. 111.

Moulton replied.

COTTON, L.J. (after describing the nature of the patent and stating the facts, continued:—) Now, what was the law independently of the Act of 1883, on which the plaintiff relies, and on which the Vice-Chancellor based the injunction? It is thus stated by the late Master of the Rolls in Halsey v. Brotherhood, 29 W. R. 9, 15 Ch. D. 514, 519: "It is quite clear that Mr. Justice, now Lord Justice, Blackburn, in delivering judgment considered that to support the action" (which was an action for similar threats to these) "the allegations must not only assert the statement to be untrue, but that it was made without reasonable and probable cause. That is the judgment of the full court, and it appears to me to be the substance of the law. A man merely giving notice that his rights are being infringed, believing that they are infringed, is not to be subjected to an action for giving that notice . . . even although he does not follow up that notice by bringing an action at law for the infringement." I take that to be a correct statement of the law as it existed at the time of the passing of the Act, and if it were not for the Act I do not see that the plaintiff here could have any reasonable ground for commencing this action or for applying for an injunction. The defendant had been in possession of his patent since the year 1879, and had made and sold the articles manufactured in accordance with it, and those manufactured by the plaintiff are so similar to them that certainly there was reasonable ground for the contention that the articles made by the plaintiff were an infringement of the defendant's patent.

The question, however, turns on the 32nd section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. That section consists of two parts; it contains directions as to what circumstances will enable a person who is in the same position as the plaintiff here to obtain judgment in an action, and then it contains a proviso which excepts from the section cases which come within the proviso. If, then, a case comes within the proviso it must be dealt with as if this section did not exist—that is to say, it must be dealt with under the old law.

As the first part of the section has been a good deal discussed, it may be desirable to give our opinion upon it without regard to the proviso. First of all, this appears on the section, that what it contemplates is the final judgment to be given in the action if the circumstances bring the case within the Act. That appears from this that the section states that an injunction may be granted, and also damages, which evidently could not be obtained on an interlocutory application. Although undoubtedly the right of the plaintiff to an interlocutory injunction will depend on what judgment he could get at the hearing of the action, yet we must remember that the object of the section is to provide for judgment to be given at the trial of the action. First of all it says that when a person claiming to be entitled under a patent threatens any other person with legal proceedings or liability in respect of the patented invention, then any person aggrieved may bring an action against him.

In the present case, though it is very questionable whether the circular was a threat within the meaning of this section, the defendant undoubtedly did, before this action commenced, threaten with action and legal liability those who were using the instruments made by the plaintiff. He, therefore, has done that which is pointed at by the section. Who, then, can apply to restrain him? Any person aggrieved. And there is no doubt here that the plaintiff is a person aggrieved, because he was making that which was said to be an infringement; and, of course, these threats or notices would stop the sale of the instrument which he made. Then the section goes on to say what may be granted—an injunction, and damages if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not, in fact, an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats.

Now I think that, at the trial of such an action as this, the court, before it can grant relief, must be satisfied that the article in respect of which the threats were made is not an infringement. I do not go into the question as to where the burden of proof will lie; that will depend upon the circumstances of each case. Primâ facie the plaintiff would have the burden thrown upon him. He may easily rebut that in a particular case and throw the burden of proof on the defendant. But, in my opinion, in order to act upon this section, the court must be satisfied at the hearing of the action that the articles in respect of which the threats were made are not "an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats." The question, therefore, whether the patent of the person making the threat is a valid patent must, in my opinion, come into consideration if the plaintiff in the action seeks to have it considered, because I cannot see how, if the patent is invalid, there can be any act done in infringement of a legal right of the patentee. I mention that, because, as I understand, though the case is not before us on appeal, Chitty, J., has intimated an opinion that the question of the validity of the patent could not come in question in an action like this. In my opinion, and after the discussion we have had I am bound to state it, the validity of the patent could come in question. In order that the court may be satisfied whether there is or is not an infringement of any legal right, one of the questions must be, if the plaintiff chooses to raise it, whether the defendant's patent is or is not valid.

That is the view of the statute which I take as regards the rights of the parties at the hearing, independently of the proviso.

I think, however, that before going to the proviso I ought, having regard to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, to state my opinion as to how the matter ought to be dealt with on an interlocutory application. As far as I understand the Vice-Chancellor, he seems to have considered that he could not enter, at this stage of the cause, into the question whether the sale of the plaintiff's tap unions was an infringement of the defendant's patent, or whether that patent was a valid patent, and that all he need consider was the balance of convenience and inconvenience as between these parties in granting or refusing the interlocutory injunction. I must express my dissent from that view. It is very true that in all cases of interlocutory injunction the court does consider and ought to consider the balance of convenience and inconvenience in granting or refusing an injunction. But there is another very material question to be considered, has the plaintiff made out a primâ facie case? That is to say, if the evidence remains as it is, is it probable that at the hearing of the action he will get a decree in his favour? Therefore, although I quite agree that the court ought not on an interlocutory injunction to attempt finally to decide the question whether the act complained of is an infringement or (if the question of the validity of the patent is raised) whether the patent is a valid one or not, yet, in my opinion, it ought to be satisfied that on one or both of those two points the plaintiff in the action has made out a primâ facie case, and unless the court is so satisfied it would be wrong to grant an injunction merely on the ground that it cannot do the defendant any harm. Injunctions ought to be granted only on a case made out entitling the plaintiff to that particular remedy. I have thought it right to express my opinion on this point, having regard to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor and to the judgment of Kay, J.,* on which he appears to have relied. In the present case, if it were necessary to consider the point, I should say that no doubt there was primâ facie evidence on behalf of the defendant that this was an infringement. The question is also raised by the plaintiff that the patent is a bad one, and that, therefore, there can be no infringement. If I had not come to the conclusion that the case is entirely taken out of the section by means of the proviso, I should have had to consider whether the plaintiff had made out a primâ facie case that the patent is invalid. I have not considered the evidence on that point in such a way as to make it right to give any opinion on its effect, as I think the proviso in this case settles the matter.

Now what is the proviso. "Provided that this section shall not apply" (that is, that the old law alone shall apply to such actions) "if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent." Now what has been done here? [His lordship then stated his reasons for coming to the conclusion that the action was commenced with due diligence and was an honest action.]

Then we come to what is really the main difficulty of the proviso, the question against whom an action must be brought to bring it within this proviso. It was contended by the plaintiff that it ought to be brought against the person aggrieved—that is to say, against the person applying for an injunction under this section—and that Royle's action, having been brought only against one who is buying from the plaintiff, and selling to retail purchasers, does not satisfy the requirements of the proviso. In my opinion, it is not necessary that the action should be brought against the person aggrieved. As I pointed out, and I did not get any answer which satisfied me, it would not always be possible that an action should be brought as against the person aggrieved. The patentee of a rival machine would necessarily be, as the plaintiff here is, a person aggrieved within the meaning of the section, but supposing he does not himself manufacture or sell, but only licenses the manufacture and sale, I do not know any means of bringing an action against him. It might be argued that his taking out a patent was proof that he threatened and intended to use his invention; but in my opinion that would not be sufficient ground for an application for an injunction; and how could damages be obtained from him? I am disposed to think that what the section points at is a case where some act has been actually done which can be tested as to whether or not it is an infringement, for the words "if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase, to which the threats related was not in fact an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats," clearly point to an article having been made which has been alleged to be, but as a matter of fact is not, an infringement of the patent of the person issuing the threat. In my opinion the mere fact that, where the owner of a rival patent is the aggrieved person it is in many cases impossible that an action for infringement should be brought against him, precludes us from confining the action mentioned in this proviso to an action against the aggrieved party. In my opinion the proviso is satisfied if an action to test the validity of the patent or the fact of infringement is honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person or any of the persons to whom the threats have been made. I am not satisfied that the Legislature did not intend to lay down the following up of the threats by action as a sort of test whether the threats were bonâ fide, as Malins, V.C., did in Axmann v. Lund, 22 W. R. 789, L. R. 18 Eq. 330.

In that case an action was brought to restrain threats, and the Vice-Chancellor asked the defendant, who was issuing these threats, whether he would undertake to bring an action for infringement. He declined to do so, and the Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction, it being recited in the order that the defendant declined to bring an action following up the threats. I think that is very likely what the Legislature intended; but what we have to do is to see what is required by this proviso. In my opinion it is not required that the action should be brought against the aggrieved person; it is sufficient if the action is brought against any person to whom the threat has been made. That is the case here. I see no ground for supposing that the action is collusive, or that it will not be defended in a proper manner. If it is not, another application can be made, for we are not now at the trial of the action, but are only asked to grant an interlocutory injunction on the facts before us, and before the rights of the parties have been decided

On the facts before us I say that primâ facie there is such an action as, by virtue of the proviso, takes the case out of that section. Therefore, in my opinion, the order made was wrong, and must be discharged.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action brought under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. We have, in the first place, to construe the proviso in order to determine whether an action which has been instituted against the Manchester Plumbing Co. is an action which satisfies the description given in the proviso of an action commenced with due diligence for the infringement of the defendant's patent. It seems to me that, in order to construe the proviso, we must form an intelligent view of the whole section, and although the construction which I put on the earlier part of the section may, perhaps, upon another occasion, be called in question, I desire to say that, in my view, it throws a distinct light upon the construction of the proviso. The section gives, for the first time, a new right of action—a right of action to a person who is aggrieved by a threat proceeding from a patentee against somebody in respect of an alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the patentee's invention. I think those words indicate that the threat, which is the subject-matter of the action, must not be merely a warning about something which is going to be done, but must be a threat about an act done, a threat of legal proceedings or liability in respect of an alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention, not in respect of a proposed manufacture, use, sale, or purchase. It seems to me that that interpretation is confirmed by the subsequent language of the section, where the words employed are that an injunction and damages may be obtained if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase was not, in fact, an infringement, the condition imposed under the word "if" pointing, it seems to me, to an act done which is alleged by the patentee to be an infringement, but which also may not really be an infringement. Again, when you come to the proviso, you find that an action for infringement of the patent is to be the means by which the section may be avoided, implying, I think, that there has been something done which is asserted to be an infringement of the patent. I think, then, that threats would not fall within the section if they were mere threats or warnings as to something which might be done in the future. Everybody, it seems to me, has still a right to issue a general warning to pirates not to pirate, and to infringers not to infringe, and to warn the public that the patent to which the patentee is entitled, and under which he claims, is one which he intends to enforce. But my language upon this point must not be misunderstood. It does not follow that because a threat is so worded as grammatically to apply only to the future, therefore, it may not in any particular case be, in substance and in fact, applicable to what has been done. Supposing that a manufacturer is making and issuing machines which the patentee considers to be an infringement of his patent, and the patentee issued a threat really directed against the manufacture and sale of those machines, I do not think he could escape from the section by wording his notice in such terms that, according to the letter, it was only a general warning to all persons not to infringe his patent.

Now, I am not satisfied (though I give no final opinion on the point, as its investigation would require further evidence) that the circular which has been issued was directly addressed to the sale of this particular instrument of which the defendant now complains. I think it is very probable that it was, but I do not pronounce judgment on the basis that that circular is a threat on which this action can be founded. But there was a very distinct and definite threat, which puts the matter beyond all question, addressed to the Manchester Plumbing Co., who, though not the plaintiffs in the action, are persons who sell the very instruments which the plaintiff has patented, and the sale of which is complained of by the defendant. This threat to the Manchester Plumbing Co. was addressed to people who had done something which was complained of as an infringement. The true view of the proviso seems to me to be that an action will satisfy the words of the proviso if it is a bonâ fide action, brought with due diligence and without collusion against a person to whom the threat has been addressed in respect of the act to which the threat referred. I do not express any opinion as to whether any other sort of action would or would not satisfy the proviso. It is sufficient for me to say that, in my opinion, such an action would be enough to bring the case within it.

It was urged upon us that the action must be against the person aggrieved, and that it will not do if it is merely brought against a person who is threatened. I think that construction can hardly be put upon the section. The person aggrieved may have done nothing which could be alleged to be an infringement; he may be only a person who is intending to manufacture, or, what is still more probable, he may be a person who is dealing with his own patented invention through the medium of licences to others. It can hardly be said that a patentee who intends to grant licences to make and sell his inventions is not seriously aggrieved if persons who have contracted or negotiated with him for licences are deterred by the threats of another from utilizing his invention. Yet he cannot be sued for infringement, and if the proviso were held to apply only to actions brought against the person aggrieved, the proviso would have no application at all in an action brought by him for an injunction against threats.

On the ground, therefore, that this action against the Manchester Plumbing Co. is an action brought with due diligence against persons who were threatened in respect of an act done by them which is alleged by the defendant to be an infringement of his patent, and is an action brought in respect of the very class of goods which are made by the plaintiff, it seems to me that the defendant's action takes the case out of the section. But I think it also right, as the matter has been discussed, and as the Vice-Chancellor's judgment proceeds upon another ground, to express my concurrence in what the Lord Justice has said, first, as to the necessity, in matters of this sort, that those who apply for an interim injunction should fulfil the requirements of the law and make out a primâ facie case—not merely a primâ facie case of the balance of convenience and inconvenience, but a primâ facie case of a right which is infringed. The right conferred by this section is a right not to be threatened if the manufacture which is complained of was not, in fact, an infringement, and I think a person applying for an injunction against threats ought to make out a primâ facie case that the matter to which the threats related was not, in fact, an infringement.

I also wish to add that, though I am extremely reluctant to travel one hair's breadth out of the case before us, I think it is necessary to express an opinion (not a final judgment) that in an action of this nature the question of the validity of the defendant's patent may be raised. Chitty, J., seems to have come to a different conclusion; but I think it is well worthy of consideration, how it is possible to decide the question, whether a manufacture was an infringement of legal rights of a patentee, without considering whether he had any legal rights at all. I therefore, as at present advised, do not feel able to follow Chitty, J.'s view on that point. These two matters, I think, it is necessary to mention in consequence of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, and of the course which the argument before us has taken; but we decide this case on the ground that an action brought against the Manchester Plumbing Co. is a sufficient action to satisfy the proviso, and so to take the case out of the 32nd section.

TUNNICLIFFE v. OVERSEERS OF BIRKDALE. (a.)

Poor rate—Certified reformatory school—Rateability—Reformatory Schools Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 117).

A reformatory school, the managers of which have been granted a certificate under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 117, is rateable to the relief of the poor.

Sheppard v. Bradford, 12 W. R. 867, 16 C. B. N. S. 369, overruled.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by justices at quarter sessions on appeal against a poor rate.

The appellants were the managing committee of the Birkdale Farm reformatory school for youthful offenders of the Roman Catholic religion. The school was certified under the Reformatory Schools Act, 1866. Boys were sent to it and detained there by order of justices under section 14 of that Act, and such order formed part of the sentence of the court. No boys were received there except those sent by such orders, but the committee might refuse to receive any such boy into the school (section 8 of the Act), and it was customary for justices to inquire what reformatory school would take the boy before sending him. The county, by agreement with the committee, contributed towards the expense of keeping boys sent there by the county justices. The premises consisted of school buildings, where the boys were trained in various trades, and a farm of twenty-seven acres, used for the instruction of the boys in agriculture. A profit was derived from the cultivation of the farm and also from the trades carried on in the school. This training and instruction were carried on under rules approved by the Secretary of State.

The appellants having been assessed to the relief of the poor in respect of the school premises and farmlands, the quarter sessions confirmed the rate subject to a case.

The Queen's Bench Division affirmed the order of sessions (35 W. R. 731, 19 Q. B. D. 280).

The committee of management appealed.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Segar, for the appellants.—Detention in a reformatory school is part of the punitive system of the country. Youthful offenders in reformatory schools are convicted criminals, and, as every criminal is supposed to be in the custody of the Crown, they are detained in a place in the nature of a prison, which is used for the purposes of the administration of law in the country. The managers of the school, therefore, in detaining the boys as prisoners, are acting for the Crown, and the school is exempt from rating: Jones v. The Mersey Docks, 13 W. R. 1069, 11 H. L. Cas. 443. The officers of the school have all the powers of constables: section 13. The expense of conveying the boys to the school is borne by the prison authority by section 23; and the Treasury may contribute towards the expenses of the school: section 24. Sheppard v. Bradford, 12 W. R. 867, 16 C. B. N. S. 369, is an express authority that reformatory schools are not rateable. They are not like industrial schools, which were held rateable in Reg. v. West Derby, L. R. 10 Q. B. 28, 23 W. R. Dig. 153. School boards can establish industrial schools, but not reformatory schools.

They also cited Reg. v. Shepherd, 1 Q. B. 170.

Aspland, Q.C., and Melsheimer, for the respondents.—The reason why the Crown is not rateable in respect of the occupation of land is that it is not mentioned in the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2, and so is not bound by it. The true test of exemption is, would the Crown be liable to be rated in respect of the property if anyone was? This would depend upon whether the Crown had the right to occupation: Jones v. Mersey Docks; Commissioner of Leith v. Inspectors of the Poor, L. R. 3 H. L. Sc. 17, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 10. Reformatory schools are charitable institutions, detention there being for the purpose of reformation, and not punishment. The managers are not servants of the Crown, and their occupation is not the occupation of the Crown. Sheppard v. Bradford was wrongly decided, and is overruled by Jones v. Mersey Docks. Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. West Derby, treats that case as overruled. County buildings, such as assize courts, police stations, county courts, and prisons, are in consimili casu to buildings occupied by the Crown, and have been held not rateable: per Blackburn, J., in Jones v. Mersey Docks, 13 W. R., at p. 1070, 11 H. L. Cas., at p. 464; Comber v. Justices of Berkshire, 32 W. R. 525, 9 App. Cas. 61; Justices of Lancashire v. Stretford, E. R. & E. 225.

They also referred to Gambier v. Lydford, 2 W. R. 226, 3 E. & B. 346, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., in reply, cited Lord Amherst v. Lord Somers, 2 T. R. 372; Nicholson v. Holborn Union, 35 W.R. 230, 18 Q. B. D. 161.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the question for our decision is whether a reformatory school, which is as to certain matters regulated by the Reformatory Schools Act, 1866, is or is not rateable to the relief of the poor. It was urged that it was not rateable because it was, in effect, a prison, and part of the means for the public administration of law and order in the country. The question, to my mind, is not whether this is a prison, but whether this is a prison occupied by the servants of the Crown so as to bring it within the exemption. In Jones v. Mersey Docks it was shown that the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2 had been partially misconstrued and misapplied in the courts, and the House of Lords brought the courts back to the true construction of the statute. Under that statute every occupier of lands, houses, &c., where the occupation could, in the hands of the present occupier or of any other person, be made beneficial, is rateable to the relief of the poor. There is only one exemption, and that is in favour of the Crown, the exemption arising from the fact that the Crown is not named in the statute, and therefore not bound by it. Everyone else in the position I have stated is liable to be rated. The law was so stated in Jones v. The Mersey Docks, where Lord Westbury said, at p. 501:—"The only occupier exempt from the operation of the Act is the King, because he is not named in the statute, and the direct and immediate servants of the Crown, whose occupation is the occupation of the Crown itself, also come within the exemption." The statement of Lord Cranworth, at p. 508, is usually accepted as the most exact upon the subject:—"To avoid all misconception, I wish to add that there are certain cases to which the observations I have made do not apply. The Crown, not being named, is not bound by the Act. It follows, therefore, that lands or houses occupied by the Crown or by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown are not liable to be rated; and I conceive that it is from a confusion between property occupied for public purposes and property occupied by servants of the Crown that this mistake has arisen." The statement as to the occupation by servants of the Crown seems to me a mere expansion of the phrase "occupied by the Crown." It disposed of any question as to the occupation of the Crown being limited to the personal occupation of the sovereign. It seems to me to mean that lands occupied by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown are occupied by the Crown in the same way as lands occupied by the servants of a private individual are occupied by the master. I take it, therefore, to mean that any lands occupied by the Crown in its sovereign capacity are not rateable. Blackburn, J., in delivering the opinion of the majority of the judges, said the same thing at pp. 463, 464:—"The Crown, not being named in the statute of Elizabeth, is not bound by it; and, consequently, the overseers cannot impose a rate upon the sovereign in respect of lands occupied by her Majesty, nor on those occupied by her servants for her Majesty." The learned judge, having thus stated the principle, goes on to enumerate cases which had been decided to see whether they were within that rule: "So far the ground of exemption is perfectly intelligible, but it has been carried a good deal farther, and applied to many cases in which it can scarcely be said that the sovereign or the servants of the sovereign are in occupation. Long series of cases have established that where property is occupied for the purposes of the Government of the country, including under that head the police and the administration of justice, no one is rateable in respect of such occupation. And this applies, not only to property occupied for such purposes by the servants of the great departments of State, such as the Post Office, the Horse Guards, or the Admiralty, in all which cases the occupiers might strictly be called the servants of the Crown, but also to property occupied by local police, to county buildings occupied for the assizes and for the judge's lodgings, or occupied as a county court, or for a jail. In these latter cases it is difficult to maintain that the occupants are, strictly speaking, servants of the sovereign, so as to make the occupation that of her Majesty; but the purposes are all public purposes of that kind which, by the constitution of this country, fall within the province of government, and are committed to the sovereign, so that the occupiers, though not, perhaps, strictly servants of the sovereign, might be considered in consimili casu." That is an attempt to bring those latter cases within the rule of exemption.

Those cases must not be considered as establishing any new rule, but they must be brought within the rule laid down in Jones v. The Mersey Docks. Whenever, therefore, a case of any such buildings arises the courts must consider whether it is within the rule. If a co-ordinate court has held it to be within the rule, the court will follow that decision. If a long series of decisions, acted upon all over the country, have held that the case is within the rule, no court will overrule those decisions. Short of that, however, the court will consider whether the case comes within the rule, and if any case decided before Jones v. The Mersey Docks is not brought within the rule it must now be considered as overruled. The true test is this: if anyone were to be rated would it be the Crown? If so, as the Crown cannot be rated, no one else can. The servants of the Crown are not rateable because they are not occupiers, just as the servants of a private individual cannot be rated, because their master occupies and not the servants. That enunciation of the rule enables us to see whether any particular case falls within it.

It is said, however, that the rule has been enlarged. In Reg. v. West Derby an industrial school was held liable to be rated, and Blackburn, J., in giving judgment, quotes the language of Lord Cranworth in Jones v. The Mersey Docks which I have already referred to. In Comber v. Justices of Berkshire the question was whether the county assize courts were liable to income tax, and the question was said to be the same as their liability to the poor rate. I cannot see that any new rule was there laid down, or that the old rule was enlarged. Lord Blackburn, in giving his opinion, quotes the language of Lord Westbury in Jones v. The Mersey Docks, that the public purposes to make an exemption "must be such as are required and created by the Government of the country, and are therefore to be deemed part of the use and service of the Crown." Lord Blackburn did not, I think, mean to lay down a new rule as to a building required for the service of the country. He used that argument to see whether the building came within the rule as being "occupied by the Crown." Lord Watson says:—"The precise language of that definition satisfies me that the noble and learned lord (Lord Westbury) meant to affirm, and did affirm, that the exemption extended not only to the immediate and actual servants of the Crown, but to all other persons, not being servants of the Crown, whose occupation was ascribable to a bare trust for purposes required and created by the Government of the country." May I say with great deference that that language is not quite accurate? The immediate and actual servants of the Crown, if they use land for the service of the Crown, do not "occupy" it. There can be no question of their exemption as they do not occupy. What is meant is that where a building is a public building used for the purposes of the government of the country by servants of the Crown, so that the occupation is the occupation of the Crown, that building is exempt.

Having stated the exemption, we must now consider whether it applies to the present case. There is the case of Sheppard v. Bradford, decided before Jones v. The Mersey Docks, in which a certified reformatory school was held not to be rateable. That case was not one of a long line of decisions or where there had been a long-continued, recognized practice acted upon and not contested. It seems to me, therefore, to be a case that is overruled by Jones v. The Mersey Docks, if it does not come within the rule as to exemption. In Reg. v. West Derby Lord Blackburn seemed to be of opinion that it was overruled. Does the present case come within the rule? Speaking for myself, I think it may be rightly said that this place is in the nature of a prison. It is used solely for the purpose of dealing with young persons convicted of crimes, who are detained there by a sentence which is part of the sentence passed upon them on their conviction. If the old rule, acted upon before the decision in Jones v. The Mersey Docks, were still in existence—namely, that it was sufficient to show that the building was used for public purposes in order to bring it within the exemption—this case would come within it. However, it is not now sufficient to show that the building is used for public purposes. The question is, Is this a case of occupation by the Crown, where the Crown would be rated if anyone could be? In my opinion it is not such a case. There are many circumstances stated during the argument which are conclusive to show that these premises are not occupied by the Crown through its servants. The school is carried on by benevolent people. The persons in charge can be dismissed by them, and are their servants. The Crown has no control in the management of the school. The statute gives it no right of possession, and the building cannot be said to be in the occupation or possession of the Crown. The persons who carry on the school occupy it by their servants. The ground, therefore, upon which this school is rateable is that it comes within the general enactment of 43 Eliz. c. 2, and is not taken out of that general enactment by being in the occupation of the Crown. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. The effect of the decision in Jones v. The Mersey Docks was to recall the courts to the very words of the statute, 43 Eliz. c. 2. Wherever lands which are capable of beneficial occupation are occupied, the lands are rateable, there being only one exemption—namely, lands in the occupation of the Crown, which cannot be assessed. To see if the case comes within the exemption the question always is, Is the land in the occupation of the Crown? The occupation of the Crown may be either the personal occupation of her Majesty or occupation by servants of the Crown, which is, in reality, the occupation of the Crown. Therefore, to gain exemption, the lands must be occupied by the Crown.

That being so, we must see who are the persons here claiming exemption. They are a committee of management of a reformatory school. The school was founded by charitable persons as a benevolent institution, and the committee of management are elected by them to carry it on. The committee are authorized to receive contributions from the county funds towards the expenses, and the committee are clothed with the power of detaining children in the school where the sentence states that they are to be so detained. For my part I should be sorry to call a reformatory school a prison; the object of it is not punishment, but reformation. But whether it is a prison or not is immaterial. The managers are appointed by the subscribers and not by the Crown. They are not paid by the Crown, nor can they be dismissed by the Crown. They are not, therefore, servants of the Crown. It was then urged that they occupy a public position and are the persons delegated by the justices to carry out the sentence of the court, and are exempt upon that ground. No doubt that is true, but it must be borne in mind that the power to sentence young persons to be detained in a reformatory school was given by the Legislature for the purpose of taking advantage of the existence of these voluntary schools, and it is not in any way like an ordinary sentence known to the law. I can find nothing to show that the occupation of these persons is the occupation of the Crown. If any loss occurs it will not fall upon the Crown, but must be borne by the subscribers. It only remains to deal with the case of Sheppard v. Bradford, where it was held that a reformatory school was not rateable. The ground of the decision there was that the school was a building devoted to public purposes, and Byles, J., mentions another ground, that the institution was devoted to purposes of public charity. At that time those grounds were considered sufficient to exempt the building from rating. Since the decision in Jones v. The Mersey Docks I do not think that decision can stand. We are therefore bound to say, though I say it with regret, that this school does not come within the exemption.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the appellants are rateable in respect of this school. In the case of Jones v. The Mersey Docks the House of Lords placed a construction upon 43 Eliz. c. 2 which was inconsistent with the view previously held by the courts. The principle underlying the decision in that case is that the Crown, not being named in the statute of Elizabeth, is not bound by its provisions, and therefore lands occupied by the Crown, or by its servants for the purposes of the Crown, are not rateable. "The general principle," said Lord Cairns in Greig v. University of Edinburgh, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 348, at p. 350, "as I understand it, approved of by your lordships in these cases is this, that the Crown, not being named in the English or Scotch statutes on the subject of assessment, and not being bound by statute when not expressly named, any property which is in the occupation of the Crown, or of persons using it exclusively in and for the service of the Crown, is not rateable to the relief of the poor." It is necessary to apply that principle to the present case and to see whether this school is exempt from rating as being in the occupation of the Crown. The school was originally created by private efforts. The land belongs to private persons, and the management is under their control. No one over whom the Crown has any control occupies it. The persons who occupy it can be dismissed by the committee of management, and are their servants. The managers may, by section 7, upon giving six months' notice, resign the certificate and cease to continue receiving youthful offenders without the permission of the Crown. By section 8 they may decline to receive any particular boy proposed to be sent to them. Therefore, in no one sense can it be said that the school is in the occupation of the Crown. It does not seem to me to be in the nature of a prison, if that is at all material to the present inquiry. I am unable to distinguish this case from that of a certified industrial school, which was held in Reg. v. West Derby to be rateable. Nor can I distinguish it in principle from a private lunatic asylum where lunatics are sent and detained. With regard to the case of Sheppard v. Bradford, it is only necessary to say that it was decided before Jones v. The Mersey Docks, and cannot now be considered as an authority.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court in favour of the execution creditor in an interpleader issue.

By a bill of sale, dated the 24th of August, 1886, the defendant assigned to Thomas, the claimant in the interpleader issue, as security for the payment of money, the chattels "specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed or hereinafter written, together with all other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor now in and about the premises known as 119, Shirley-road, Paddington, in the county of Middlesex, and also all chattels and things which may at any time during the continuance of this security be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor (to which the said chattels or things, or any part thereof may have been removed), whether brought there in substitution for, or renewal of, or in addition to, the chattels and things hereby assigned."

The plaintiff having recovered judgment against the defendant, seized the goods in execution, and they were claimed by Thomas under the bill of sale. Since the date of the bill of sale certain goods not enumerated in the schedule had been brought upon the premises, but the claimant made no claim to them.

Upon the trial of an issue in the Marylebone County Court the judge held that the bill of sale was void, as not being in accordance with the form, and gave judgment for the execution creditor. The Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Denman, J.) affirmed this judgment.

The claimant appealed.

McClymont and H. Reed, for the claimant.—An assignment of after-acquired property does not render the bill of sale void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form: Roberts v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 605, 13 Q. B. D. 794. The rule laid down in Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259, as to what is a material departure from the form, does not conflict with Roberts v. Roberts. The only effect of including after-acquired property in the assignment is to render the assignment void in respect of such after-acquired property except as against the grantor: sections 4 and 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. Many bills of sale containing a similar clause have been before the courts since Roberts v. Roberts, and the point has not been taken, it being generally assumed that Roberts v. Roberts was conclusive.

They referred to Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1; In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222; Lumley v. Simmons, 35 W. R. 422, 34 Ch. D. 698; Furber v. Cobb, 35 W. R. 398, 18 Q. B. D. 494; Levy v. Polack, 52 L. T. N. S. 551, 33 W. R. Dig. 32; Crosser v. Maxwell, W. N., 1885, p. 95; Bouchette v. Attenborough, 3 Times L. R. 813.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Rose-Innes, for the execution creditor, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We must construe each bill of sale that comes before us according to the rule of construction laid down by this court after the most careful consideration. Now before the case of Ex parte Stanford we had endeavoured to state the rule of construction, but that rule was not considered by some judges sufficiently effective for universal application. Accordingly, on account of the numerous cases that arose upon bills of sale, this court, with the assistance of all its members, laid down a rule of construction in that case more easy of application, and more accurate in its application, than the rule previously laid down. It followed that if we did alter the form of the rule of construction, the new rule would take the place of any former rule, and might alter the effect of previous cases, so that if any of the previous cases which had been decided under the old rule would have been decided differently under the new rule, they must now be considered as overruled.

In Ex parte Stanford the old rule was considered not to be a good working rule, but one that would have an effect varying according to different men's minds, and so a new rule of construction was there laid down, which it was supposed would be intelligible to every man's mind—to conveyancers and to men of business alike. The judgment says:—"A bill of sale is surely in accordance with the prescribed form if it is substantially in accordance with it, if it does not depart from the prescribed form in any material respect. But a divergence only becomes substantial or material when it is calculated to give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect either greater or smaller than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned, or if it departs from the form in a manner calculated to mislead those whom it is the object of the statute to protect." There is the rule laid down in its most general form. "We must take the form interpreted by the light of the Act on the one hand, the instrument to be discussed upon the other; and we must then consider whether, but for the avoidance inflicted by section 9 of the statute, the instrument as drawn will, in virtue either of addition or omission, have any legal effect which either goes beyond or falls short of that which would result from the statutory form, or whether the instrument in respect of such variance would be calculated reasonably to deceive those for whose benefit the statutory form is provided. If so, the variance is material, and the bill of sale is not in substantial accordance with the statutory precedent. Whatever form the bill of sale takes, the form adopted by it in order to be valid must produce, not merely the like effect, but the same effect—that is to say, the legal effect, the whole legal effect, and nothing but the legal effect—which it would produce if cast in the exact mould of the schedule. Such a test as this contains no element of uncertainty, is one which every lawyer throughout the kingdom is competent to apply, and is based upon a method of interpretation familiar to our courts." That is the rule of construction laid down, and if that rule would have made any decision before Ex parte Stanford wrong, then we must say that such decision is no longer an authority. The court has now to take the rule so laid down, and apply it to every bill of sale that comes before it.

We must now deal with the case of Roberts v. Roberts. If the above rule, when applied to the bill of sale in that case, makes that decision incorrect, then Roberts v. Roberts must be considered as having been wrongly decided. Although it is not usual for this court to overrule one of its own decisions, yet this is a court consisting of six judges, and I take it that if at any time a decision of a lesser number of the court is called in question, and a difficulty arises about the accuracy of it, this court is entitled, sitting as a full court, to say whether they will continue to adopt a decision which has been come to by a lesser number of them. Therefore if Roberts v. Roberts is at variance with the decision of the full court, it must be considered as overruled. For myself I do not hesitate to say that if Roberts v. Roberts had to be considered under that rule, it must have been differently decided, and therefore Roberts v. Roberts must be considered as overruled by Ex parte Stanford.

The question, therefore, is whether in the body of this bill of sale there is or is not such a divergence from the statutory form as brings the case within the rule and avoids the bill of sale under section 9. Applying the test laid down in the rule, does the bill of sale produce "the same effect—that is to say, the legal effect, the whole legal effect, and nothing but the legal effect—which it would produce if cast in the exact mould of the schedule"? Has the bill of sale "a legal consequence or effect, either greater or smaller, than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form"? It is obvious to my mind that it has a greater legal effect than it would have if it were drawn in the form. It includes other goods besides those specifically described in the schedule. It applies to goods not described in the schedule at all, and not capable of being described, because they were non-existent at the time the bill of sale was executed. It has a greater legal effect, because that which is attempted to be given as the security is a larger security than could possibly be given by a bill of sale drawn in the statutory form. Accordingly the bill of sale is void under section 9.

It is argued, however, that section 9 is not to have the effect of avoiding such a bill of sale, defective as regards the body of the instrument, because the avoidance in section 9 is cut down in this particular case by sections 4 and 5. That is to say, that sections 4 and 5 are inconsistent with the full application of section 9, and that the more specific enactments in sections 4 and 5 are to limit the wide and plain construction of section 9. I think that the suggestion of Fry, L.J., during the argument has shown us that there is no real inconsistency at all. Sections 4 and 5 do not in terms apply to the body of the bill of sale. They apply to the schedule and to the schedule only. If that is so, the form of the bill of sale may be perfectly correct, yet the schedule may have a description of goods not sufficiently specific. Then with regard to those goods not sufficiently described, the bill of sale is avoided except as against the grantor. Upon this view section 9 remains intact, and will have its full force notwithstanding anything contained in sections 4 and 5. Applying the rule laid down in Ex parte Stanford, I find that the body of this bill of sale is not in accordance with the form, and is void under section 9. The appeal, therefore, fails.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. By the bill of sale in the present case the mortgagor assigned to the mortgagee the chattels and things specifically described in the schedule, "together with all other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor now in and about the premises, and also all chattels and things which may during the continuance of this security be in or about the same or any other premises of the mortgagor," &c. The first inquiry is whether that bill of sale is in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The Master of the Rolls has already pointed out that the proper rule of construction was laid in Ex parte Stanford. The judgment there lays this down: that if the bill of sale, read independently of the avoidance in section 9 of the Act, goes in its legal effect to any extent beyond the effect of the form in the schedule, it is void under section 9 as not being in accordance with the form. Taking the bill of sale now in question on the one hand, and taking, on the other hand, the bill of sale in the schedule, I cannot doubt that the bill of sale now in controversy does go in its legal effect far beyond the bill of sale in the schedule. The clause as to the other chattels and things, besides those specifically described in the schedule, is an addition to the form in the schedule, and would convey property which never could be touched by an instrument in the scheduled form. I come to the conclusion therefore that, according to the rule of construction laid down in Ex parte Stanford, this bill of sale is void.

Now I do not desire to say anything as to the power of the full Court of Appeal to overrule decisions of any lesser number of its members. If I had to decide that point I should prefer to take time to consider. I desire to express no opinion upon it, because it appears to me that in Roberts v. Roberts the point now raised was not determined. No doubt it was argued that the bill of sale was void under section 9 as not being in accordance with the form, but the point of divergence was that the words "by way of security" were omitted. That was the point of divergence with which the judgments dealt; the insufficient description in the schedule was dealt with as being a question under sections 4 and 5. Therefore in my judgment the precise point was not determined in Roberts v. Roberts, and we are bound to determine it by the rule laid down in Ex parte Stanford.

There remains another argument to be dealt with. It is said that section 9 is subject to an exception where the divergence from the form is in the description of the goods in the schedule annexed to the bill of sale, and that sections 4 and 5 limit section 9 to that extent. It appears to me, however, that the true reading of the sections is this—section 9 deals with the form of the bill of sale, and avoids an instrument which materially differs from the statutory form as regards both the grantor and everybody else; sections 4 and 5 deal with a departure from the proper description in the schedule, and do not deal with the form of the body of the bill of sale. Supposing there was a bill of sale precisely in the statutory form, followed by a schedule describing the chattels assigned, but with regard to some of the chattels containing no specific description, and also containing a specific description of a chattel of which the grantor was not, at the time of the grant, the true owner. The bill of sale would be within the scheduled form, and not capable of being avoided by section 9. There would be, however, a want of specific description within sections 4 and 5 which would avoid the bill of sale against everybody except the grantor in respect of the chattels not specifically described, and in respect of the chattel of which the grantor was not, at the time of the grant, the true owner. That appears to me to prevent any inconsistency between the limited avoidance in sections 4 and 5, and the absolute avoidance in section 9.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The words which are objected to in this bill of sale are contained in the body of the deed. The question for our decision is whether this bill of sale has a different legal effect from the statutory form. The case which lays down the rule of construction upon which we are to act is Ex parte Stanford. I do not desire to express any opinion as to what power the full Court of Appeal has with regard to any previous decision of a court composed of two or three of its members. But the full court was summoned in that case to reconsider any previous decisions bearing upon the question then before the court. Do the words objected to in this bill of sale "give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect greater than that which would attach to it if drawn in the statutory form"? The answer to that question appears to me to be obvious, because this bill of sale deals not only with goods specifically described in the schedule annexed thereto, but deals with other chattels and things the property of the mortgagor.

With respect to the case of Roberts v. Roberts, I do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to what was decided there, because I am perfectly clear that it is inconsistent with Ex parte Stanford. There were other cases referred to where the same objection might have been taken as was taken in the present case; but as the objection was not taken, those cases are no authority upon the point.

With regard to sections 4 and 5, it is said that they are not consistent with section 9, nor with the decision at which we have arrived. Speaking for myself, I must say that I felt some difficulty with regard to this point, but I think that the view suggested by Fry, L.J., removes that difficulty. It appears to me that section 9 deals with the form of the deed and the statutory form in the schedule of the Act; whereas sections 4 and 5 deal only with the schedule to the deed, and deal with any objection as to the chattels not being specifically described therein. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

HIRE PURCHASE FURNISHING CO. v. RICHENS. (a.)

Company—Voluntary winding up—Subsequent contract —"For the beneficial winding up of the company"—Onus of proof—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 131.

In an action by a company in voluntary liquidation upon a contract made after the commencement of the winding up, and which, but for the winding up, would have been in the ordinary course of its business, the onus of proving that the contract was not for the beneficial winding up of the company within section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, lies upon the defendant.

Appeal from the judgment of Grantham, J.

The action was for arrears of instalments alleged to be due under a hiring agreement. The defence was that the plaintiff company were being voluntarily wound up and that the agreement was entered into after the commencement of the winding up, and was void under section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, as not being for the beneficial winding up of the company.

At the trial no evidence was given, but the following admissions were made:—The plaintiffs were a company incorporated for the purpose of selling furniture on the hire purchase system—that is, the price of the furniture was to be paid by instalments, and upon payment of all the instalments the furniture was to become the property of the hirer. On the 5th of February, 1885, a resolution was passed to wind up the company voluntarily, and this resolution was duly confirmed and registered. On the 19th of March, 1885, the agreement in question was entered into, by which the company sold certain furniture to the defendant upon the hire purchase system, to be paid for by monthly instalments. Some of the instalments being in arrear, the company brought this action. Grantham, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the authority of Bateman & Co. v. Ball, 56 L. J. Q. B. 291, 35 W. R. Dig. 43.

The defendant appealed.

Companies Act, 1862, s. 131.—"Whenever a company is wound up voluntarily, the company shall from the date of the commencement of such winding up cease to carry on its business, except in so far as may be required for the beneficial winding up thereof, and all transfers of shares, except transfers made to or with the sanction of the liquidators, or alteration in the status of the members of the company, taking place after the commencement of such winding up, shall be void, but its corporate state and all its corporate powers shall, notwithstanding it is otherwise provided for by its regulations, continue until the affairs of the company are wound up."

W. E. Hume Williams (B. F. Williams, Q.C., with him), for the defendants.—This contract is void, as it was not incidental to the beneficial winding up of the company, and so no action can be brought upon it. Section 131 is imperative. Bateman & Co. v. Ball, 56 L. J. Q. B. 291, 35 W. R. Dig. 43, ought to be overruled.

He referred to Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co. v. Douglas Forge Co., 30 W. R. 442, 8 Q. B. D. 179; British Wagon Co. v. Lea, 28 W. R. 349, 5 Q. B. D. 149; Drew's case, 15 W. R. 1057; In re Wreck Recovery and Salvage Co., 29 W. R. 266, 15 Ch. D. 353; and section 95 of the Companies Act, 1862.

R. O. B. Lane, for the plaintiffs.—The onus lies upon the defendant, who seeks to avoid the contract to prove his case. The plaintiff relies upon a contract primâ facie valid; the defendant must show by evidence that it is invalid. Further, in any case this contract is not void under section 131, and the decision in Bateman & Co. v. Ball is right.

W. E. Hume Williams replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—BOWEN, L.J.—The plaintiff company are in voluntary liquidation, and after the winding up had commenced they entered into a contract with the defendant for the sale of furniture to him on the hire purchase system. The defendant kept the furniture for a considerable time, when instalments fell into arrear, and the plaintiffs now sue for those arrears. The defence is that the company, being in liquidation, had no power to enter into this agreement, by reason of section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, and so could not recover the arrears due under the agreement. No evidence was given as to the particular circumstances under which the hiring agreement was entered into. The plaintiffs relied upon the case of Bateman & Co. v. Ball, where Pollock, B., held that the section did not affect persons outside the company who had entered into a contract with the company. It is not, under the circumstances, necessary to decide whether the view of Pollock, B., is correct or not. We certainly express no opinion that that view is wrong. Assuming, however, that the section prohibits the contract, the question remains, upon whom the onus of proof lies as to the nature of the contract. It was contended for the defendant that the onus lay on the plaintiffs to show that the contract was for the beneficial winding up of the company. I am of opinion, however, that the onus rests on the defendant to show that the agreement is prohibited by the section. The broad principle recognized by courts of law is that when a plaintiff proves a primâ facie case, and where the facts proved are equally consistent with the transaction being legal or illegal, it lies upon the defendant, who seeks to upset the transaction, to prove that it is illegal. The law presumes against illegality. For this principle it is only necessary to refer to Best on Evidence, 7th ed., p. 327, and Best on Presumptions, p. 64 et seq. A case in point is Rodwell v. Redge, 1 C. & P. 220, which was an action against a performer for not performing in a licensed theatre. The point was taken for the defence that the licence of the theatre was not proved; but Abbott, C.J., said that he would presume the licence from the fact that the performances went on. There is a very good note to the report of that case, in which the reporter says that if the theatre was not licensed that was matter of defence to excuse the breach of the agreement, and it lay on the defendant to show it as his defence; and he goes on to give a common sense and practical illustration: "You might just as well, in an action for not accepting goods sold, which were foreign produce (such as brandies and the like), call on the plaintiff to prove that the brandies had paid the custom house duties; for that, if they had not paid the duties, the contract for the sale of them was illegal." The truth is that those who rely upon illegality must prove it. The objection in the present case, it seems to me, if it does not amount to illegality, amounts to nothing; it strikes at the root of the contract. The law seems to me to be clear, and this appeal must be dismissed. I am authorized by the Master of the Rolls to say that he entirely concurs in the above view.

Fry, L.J.—I entirely agree. An analogous illustration of the general rule of law upon which we rely for our decision may be found in The Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Co. v. North-Western Railway Co., 6 H. L. Cas. 113, where the Lord Chancellor says at p. 135:—"When the Legislature constitutes a corporation it gives to that body primâ facie an absolute right of contracting. But this primâ facie right does not exist in any case where the contract is one which, from the nature and object of incorporation, the corporate body is expressly or impliedly prohibited from making; such a contract is said to be ultrà vires." The contract in the case before us is colourless in itself—that is, it does not show on its face whether it was entered into for the beneficial winding up of the company or not. That being so, it lay upon the defendant to prove that it was not, and not having done so they must fail.

Appeal dismissed.

In re Silva's Trusts. (a.)

Lunatic not so found by inquisition—Jurisdiction of court—Fund in court—Provision for lunatic—Trustee Relief Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96).

Where the share in a fund to which a person of unsound mind had become absolutely entitled was paid into court in the Chancery Division by the trustees of the fund, the court, upon the application of such person by his next friend, under the circumstances of the case, and without requiring the appointment in Lunacy of a guardian directed the entire income to be paid to the wife of such person during his life, or until further order, for his maintenance, comfort, and support.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of the income of a share in a fund to which Emanuel John Silva, a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, had become entitled in possession upon the death of his parents, both of whom died in July, 1885.

The petition was presented by E. J. Silva by his next friend, Charles Henry Silva, a brother, and asked that the income of the fund might be paid to the wife of E. J. Silva for his maintenance and support.

The petition stated the facts mentioned in the affidavit made by the trustees of the fund upon payment into court of E. J. Silva's share. It appeared from such statement that E. J. Silva was married to his wife, Ada Mary Silva, on the 14th of November, 1870; that there had not been any issue of such marriage; and that for many years past E. J. Silva had been strange in his manner, and for several years prior to the deaths of his parents was entirely supported by them; that the moneys supplied by them for his support were paid by them to his wife, because any moneys of which E. J. Silva might become possessed would be spent in drink or got rid of in some useless way; that in consequence of the mental condition and behaviour of E. J. Silva he was, in the year 1883, taken to a lunatic asylum, where he remained for seven months; that towards the end of 1884 his mental condition and behaviour again necessitated his removal to an asylum, and that he was confined accordingly until the beginning of 1885; that from the month of September, 1885, the mental condition and behaviour of E. J. Silva again showed increasing unsoundness of mind and incapacity to manage himself or his affairs, and that early in 1886 proceedings were commenced in lunacy for an inquiry as to his mental state, and to have provision made accordingly for the management of his property; that such proceedings were supported by the affidavits of the trustees of the fund, and of C. H. Silva, and of a medical practitioner; that inasmuch as the rules of the Lunacy Office require such an application to be supported by the affidavits of two medical practitioners, the application was delayed for the purpose of obtaining the necessary further affidavit; that since then E. J. Silva, owing to the care taken of him by his wife, had conducted himself so quietly that the affidavit of a second medical practitioner founded on a personal interview could not be obtained; that since the death of E. J. Silva's father the trustees of the fund had from time to time paid various sums of money on account of the share of E. J. Silva in the trust funds, and such sums, when they came to the hands of E. J. Silva's wife, had been duly applied by her for his and her own maintenance and support; that on e occasion when such sums as aforesaid came to the hands of E. J. Silva they had been applied by him in such a manner as to show that he was in no way responsible for his actions; that E. J. Silva was, in the opinion of the trustees of the fund, by reason of his mental condition, quite incompetent to understand any formal payment or transfer of money or securities to him, or the circumstances under which his share in the trust fund had become payable and transferable, or the accounts, calculations, and manner in which such share had been arrived at, or to give a valid receipt and discharge for the same.

The petition further stated that E. J. Silva's wife had continued to exercise her care and control of him with the beneficial effect of preventing the recurrence of such a state of mind as would necessitate his removal to an asylum; that he was a person of unsound mind and unable to manage himself or his affairs, but that so long as his mental condition continued as at present it was not intended, nor was it necessary, that any proceedings in lunacy should be taken; that it would be for E. J. Silva's benefit that no part of his share in the trust fund or the income thereof should be paid into his own hand, but that proper provision should be made by the court; that A. M. Silva, the wife of E. J. Silva, was a fit person for the court to pay the income to and to act as the court thought fit; that the entire annual income of E. J. Silva's share in the trust fund amounted to £212 or thereabout, and that not less than the whole income should be applied for his maintenance and support.

Jeafreson, for the respondents, the trustees of the fund.

Chitty, J.—I do not think it necessary that any person should be appointed as guardian. It is sufficient that I should direct the entire annual income to be paid to Mrs. Silva during the life of her husband, or until further order; and upon her undertaking to apply the income for his maintenance, comfort, and support I make that order.

Charleston v. London Tramways Co. (a.)

Master and servant—Liability of tramway company for acts of their servants—Scope of employment—Implied authority—Passenger charged by conductor with uttering counterfeit coin—False imprisonment—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), ss. 51, 72.

Section 52 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which enacts that "it shall be lawful for any officer or servant of the promoters or lessees of any tramway" to detain any person defrauding the company of his fare, must be construed as limited to any officer or servant appointed for that purpose.

A tramway company gave to their conductors printed instructions, in which it was ordered that, except in cases of assault, conductors were not to give passengers into custody without the authority of an inspector or timekeeper. The conductor of a car in which the plaintiff was a passenger detained the plaintiff and gave her into custody on a charge of passing bad money.

Held, in an action for false imprisonment against the company, that the defendants were not liable.

Motion by the defendants for a new trial or for judgment.

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was for false imprisonment. The plaintiff was a passenger in one of the defendant's tram-cars. On arriving at her destination she gave the conductor a half-crown, and received from him two shillings and fourpence, the fare being twopence. When she was about to leave the car the conductor stopped her, and told her she could not leave as she had given him a bad half-crown. He detained her in the car until they arrived at a police-station, when he gave her into custody on a charge of uttering counterfeit coin. The police pronounced the half-crown to be a good one, and the plaintiff was released. The action was tried by Stephen, J., with a special jury, who gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £100.

Kemp, Q.C., and MacClymont, for the defendants.—We move on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury of the defendants' liability for the acts of their conductor, and that the judge ought to have directed the jury that the conductor was not acting within the scope of his employment, and that the defendants were not liable, as the conductor acted in contravention of the defendants' express orders and to protect his own interests. The printed "instructions to conductors in case of disputes with passengers" show that what the conductor did was not within the scope of his employment. Rule 11 is as follows:—"Passenger offering bad money in payment of fare.—Coin must be kept quite apart from other money, and in the presence of passenger tested. If bad, and passenger refuses good coin, having other money in his possession, he may be charged under the authority of an Inspector or Timekeeper." Rule 16 is:—"Except in cases of assault, conductors are not to give passengers into custody without the authority of an Inspector or Timekeeper." Neither had the conductor any implied authority to act as he did: Allen v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 19 W. R. 127, L. R. 6 Q. B. 65; Edwards v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 18 W. R. 834, L. R. 5 C. P. 445; Bank of New South Wales v. Owston, 4 App. Cas. 270, 27 W. R. Dig. 156; Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 16 W. R. 309, L. R. 2 Q. B. 534. The fraud, if there had been any, would have been on the conductor. He would have had to pay the company twopence, and he would have lost the two and fourpence.

Murphy, Q.C. (Cooper Wylde with him), for the plaintiff.—The company cannot relieve themselves of responsibility by written instructions of which the public know nothing, any more than they could by general verbal instructions: Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co., 11 W. R. 149, 1 H. & C. 526. The conductor had an apparent authority to act as he did, and he acted in the interests of the company: Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., L. R. 8 C. P. 148, 21 W. R. Dig. 148; Seymour v. Greenwood, 7 H. & N. 355, 10 W. R. Dig. 55. It was a case where prompt action was necessary, and no one but the conductor was near who could act: Goff v. Great Northern Railway Co., 3 E. & E. 672, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 36. The decision in Poulton's case went on the ground that the company itself had no power to do the act. Here clearly the company could do the act themselves. Further, the conductor was acting within the scope of his authority under section 52 of the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 51 of that Act imposes a penalty on any person travelling on a tramway who avoids payment of his fare, or commits other similar offences. Then section 52 enacts: "It shall be lawful for any officer or servant of the promoters or lessees of any tramway, and all persons called by him to his assistance, to seize and detain any person discovered either in or after committing or attempting to commit any such offence as in the next preceding section is mentioned, and whose name or residence is unknown to such officer or servant, until such person can be conveniently taken before a justice or until he be otherwise discharged by due course of law."

Kemp, Q.C., in reply.—The sections of the Tramways Act do not apply. They deal only with cases of refusing or avoiding payment. The plaintiff here was charged with quite a different offence—viz., that of passing bad coin.

MATHEW, J.—This is a motion for a new trial or for judgment on the ground that there was no evidence of any authority on the part of the conductor to do what he did. Now, if we look at the rules of the company, as shown in the printed instructions given to their conductors, it is quite plain that it is not within the course of a conductor's employment to give a person into custody on such a charge as that of passing bad money, except under the authority of an inspector or timekeeper. If the rules were all, the jury ought to have been directed that there was no evidence of authority. But it is said that these instructions have a character of secrecy, and do not relieve the company of their responsibility, and, further, that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was being detained for non-payment of her fare, and that the conductor had authority so to detain her under sections 51 and 52 of the Tramways Act, 1870. [His lordship read the sections.] But it is clear that the latter section must be read subject to some limitation. I think it ought to be construed as meaning any officer or servant appointed for that purpose. The section, therefore, does not help the plaintiff, and we must give judgment for the defendants.

CHARLES, J.—The question is whether this was within the scope of the conductor's employment. If it was, then Mr. Murphy rightly says that secret instructions will not avail the defendants. But the initial question is whether it was within the scope of employment. I agree that section 52 must be construed as limited to any officer or servant authorized by the company to do that particular act. Thus the only evidence as to scope of employment is the rules. And it is clear that they do not authorize a conductor to arrest persons who refuse to pay, or who pass bad money. This case differs from Poulton's case. Here I will assume that the company would have had power to arrest. But that does not touch the fact that it was beyond the scope of the conductor's employment.

WOODHOUSE v. BALFOUR. (a.)

Probate—Holograph codicil—Signature of witnesses on opposite preceding page—Witnesses unable to remember transaction—Grant.

A holograph codicil was written on the third side of a sheet of foolscap, of which the first contained the will, drawn up by a solicitor and duly executed. The attestation clause to the codicil was in due form, but reached to the bottom of the page, the signatures of the witnesses to it being opposite to it on the second page, and preceded by the word "Witness." The witnesses, who were clerks in the testator's employment, and in the habit of witnessing papers for the testator, admitted their signatures, but had no recollection of the transaction. The residuary legatee was one of the executors.

The court granted probate to the executors of the codicil as being duly executed.

Application for grant of probate of will and codicil of E. S. Woodhouse to the executors named in the will.

The will was perfectly regular and not in dispute; it had been drawn up by the testator's solicitor, and was written on and occupied the whole of the first side of a sheet of foolscap. The codicil was written on the third side, entirely in the testator's handwriting. The attestation clause was in due form, and reached to the end of the page, leaving no space for any writing below it; the testator had signed his name opposite to this at the foot of the codicil. The signatures of the two attesting witnesses were on the second page, opposite to the attestation clause, and were preceded by the word "witness." This was the only writing on that page. One of the executors was the widow of the testator, and she was also residuary legatee. The next of kin had appeared in the action, but offered no opposition. The attesting witnesses, who were clerks in the testator's employment and frequently witnessed papers for him, were called and admitted their signatures, but had no recollection of having written them or of having seen the will or codicil.

Deane, for the executors, cited Blake v. Blake, 30 W. R. 505, 7 P. D. 102, and Wright v. Sanderson, 31 W. R. 560, 9 P. D. 149.

HANNEN, P.—The document of which probate is asked is a holograph codicil. The testator's signature is at the end with a regular attestation clause, so that it is plain that the testator knew the requirements of the law as to due execution and attestation. There is no room for the signatures of the witnesses on that page, and, as might be expected, their signatures are on the opposite page, preceded by the word "witness." It is a familiar principle that all things are presumed to have been rightly done unless there is reasonable ground for doubt. Why should I doubt here? This is not the case which frequently occurs, where alleged witnesses recollect the transaction, but say that, as far as their memory goes, they did not see the testator sign. These two persons were in the habit of witnessing the deceased's signature, and do not recollect this particular transaction. That is quite consistent with the thing having been properly done. It was not even necessary that they should be told what they were witnessing, and, notwithstanding their defective memory, I think they did witness this codicil, and I shall therefore admit it to probate.

Grant as prayed.

Hamilton, Fraser, & Co. v. Pandorf & Co. (a.)

Shipping—Bill of lading—Charter-party—"Dangers and accidents of the seas"—Sea water let in by rats.

Where a cargo was damaged by sea water which entered through a hole made by rats,

Held, that this was a danger or accident of the seas within the exception in the charter-party and bills of lading.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (35 W. R. 70, 17 Q. B. D. 670) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Lopes, L.J., sitting without a jury (reported 34 W. R. 488, 16 Q. B. D. 629).

The respondents shipped rice on a vessel of the appellants' for carriage from Akyab to Bremen. The exceptions in the charter-party and bills of lading material to the present case were "all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas of whatever nature and kind soever."

In the course of the voyage rats gnawed a hole in a pipe which brought water from the sea to a bath, and the sea water leaked into the ship and damaged the rice.

It was assumed, for the purpose of this appeal, that there was no negligence on the part of the shipowners or the crew.

Lopes, L.J., held that the damage was covered by the words of the exceptions. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, and the appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

May 12, 13.—Bigham, Q.C., and J. G. Barnes, for the appellants.—The damage was caused by an accident of the sea; it occurred by the incursion of the sea, and no one was negligent. Perils of the seas means the same thing in policies as in bills of lading, except that in the case of a policy the underwriter undertakes to indemnify against sea peril, and cannot set up negligence of shipowner as a defence, whereas in bills of lading the carrier undertakes to carry with reasonable care—i.e., without negligence.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the respondents.—There must be something extraordinary to constitute a peril of the sea. Damage by the incursion of sea water without negligence, is not necessarily a peril of the sea.

Bigham, Q.C., replied.

July 14.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In this case the admissions made at the trial reduce the question to this, whether in a seaworthy ship the gnawing by rats of some part of the ship so as to cause sea water to come in and cause damage is a danger and accident of the sea. That this happened without any negligence of the shipowner is material in determining the rights of the parties in this particular case, but, in my judgment, has no relevancy to the question whether the facts, as I have stated them, constituted a danger or accident of the seas.

With all respect to Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., they have not accepted the hypothesis of fact which the admissions at the trial render essential. It is admitted that the ship was seaworthy, and that there was no negligence, and these admissions are absolutely inconsistent with the reasoning of the Lords Justices, which suggests important difficulties in deciding those questions of fact to which I have referred, but seems beside the question if these facts are proved or admitted, as I think it is clear they were.

The other question with which the Master of the Rolls dealt is one which must be determined upon the ordinary rules of construction, whatever the document is the meaning of which is under debate; and it must be admitted that words may receive a limited meaning by reason of the other words with which they are associated, or by reason of the subject-matter with which they deal, or by reason of the mode in which they are commonly used.

It is clear that the parties do not mean, by such an instrument as we are construing, to except all accidents of any kind or description whatsoever which may happen during the particular voyage which both parties are looking forward to.

Some effect must be given to the words "perils of the sea." A rat eating a cheese in the hold of a vessel is not a peril of the sea; the sea, or the vessel being on the sea, has nothing to do with the destruction of the cheese.

This was the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Laveroni v. Drury. In the Law Journal Report of that case Pollock, C.B., and Alderson, B., distinctly pointed out, after the judgment of the court had been given, that the decision at which the court had arrived did not touch the question of whether the sea being let in by a hole made by a rat was an accident or danger of the sea. One of the dangers which both parties to the contract would have in their mind would, I think, be the possibility of the water from the sea upon which the vessel was to sail in accomplishing her voyage getting into the vessel, it would not necessarily be by a storm, the parties have not so limited the language of their contract; it might be striking on a rock, or by excessive heat, so as to open some of the upper timbers; these and many more contingencies that might be suggested would let the sea in, but what the parties, I think, contemplated was that any accident (not wear and tear, or natural decay) which should do damage by letting the sea into the vessel, should be one of the things contemplated by the contract.

A subtle analysis of all the events which lead up to, and in that sense cause a thing, may doubtless remove the first link in the chain so far that neither the law nor the ordinary business of mankind can permit it to be treated as a cause affecting the legal right of the parties to a suit. In this case the existence of the rats on board, their thirst, the hardness of their teeth, the law of gravitation, which caused the water to descend upon the rice, the ship being afloat, the pipe being lead, and its capacity of being gnawed, each of these may be represented as the cause of the water entering, but I do not assent to the view that this contract can have a different meaning attached to it according as you regard each step in the chain of events as the origin out of which the damage ultimately arises.

In the class of contract where the shipowner's negligence or misconduct prevents perils of the sea being relied upon, it is not that perils of the sea are different, or that the words ought to have a different meaning attached to them, but because in those cases an additional term exists in the contract, which makes the negligence of the shipowner, or of those for whom he is responsible, a material element; but it is also necessary to give effect to the words dangers and accidents of the seas.

Now cases have been brought to your lordships' attention in which the decision has turned, not, I think, upon the question of whether it was a sea peril or accident, but whether it was an accident at all. I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words, "peril" or "accident"; you could not speak of the danger of a ship's decay; you would know that it must decay, and the destruction of the ship's bottom by vermin is assumed to be one of the natural and certain effects of an unprotected wooden vessel sailing through certain seas.

One ought, if it is possible, to give effect to all the words that the parties have used to express what this bargain is, and I think in this case it was a danger, accident, or peril, in the contemplation of both parties, that the sea might get in and spoil the rice. I cannot think it was less such a peril or accident because the hole through which the sea came was made by vermin from within the vessel, and not by a sword-fish from without—the sea water did get in.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson.—The respondents sue for damages in respect of injury sustained, during transit, by a cargo of rice, which was carried in the appellants' steamship Inchrhona from Akyab to Bremen. The appellants plead, in defence, that the injury was occasioned by a danger or accident of the sea within the meaning of the exception in the charter-party and bills of lading, which are in the usual terms. In point of fact, the rice was damaged by sea water, which found its way into the hold of The Inchrhona through a hole, gnawed by a rat, in a leaden pipe connected with the bath-room of the vessel.

If the respondents were preferring a claim under a contract of marine insurance, expressed in ordinary terms, I should be clearly of opinion that they were entitled to recover, on the ground that their loss was occasioned by a peril of the sea within the meaning of the contract. When a cargo of rice is directly injured by rats, or by the crew of the vessel, the sea has no share in producing the damage, which, in that case, is wholly due to a risk not peculiar to the sea, but incidental to the keeping of that class of goods, whether on shore or on board of a voyaging ship. But in the case where rats make a hole, or where one of the crew leaves a port hole open, through which the sea enters and injures the cargo, the sea is the immediate cause of mischief, and it would afford no answer to the claim of the insured to say that, had ordinary precaution been taken to keep down vermin, or had careful hands been employed, the sea would not have been admitted, and there would have been no consequent damage.

Your lordships have now disapproved of the novel doctrine that, in a contract of sea carriage, a meaning must be attached to the expression "dangers and accidents of the seas" different from that which it bears in a contract insuring cargo against sea risks; that, in the case of a charter-party or bill of lading, the court ought to look to what has been termed the remote, as distinguished from the proximate, cause of damage, whereas, in the case of a policy, the proximate cause can alone be regarded. The expression has precisely the same significance in both cases; but there is this difference between them, that when a shipowner, who is bound, by the implied terms of his contract, to carry with ordinary care, claims the benefit of the exception, the court will, if necessary, go behind the proximate cause of damage, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that cause was brought into operation by the negligent act or default of the shipowner or of those for whom he is responsible. As Lord Blackburn said in Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216:—"Although the things perished by a peril of the sea, still, inasmuch as it was the negligence of the shipowner and his servants that led to it, they cannot avail themselves of the exception."

I am of opinion that the appellants must prevail, because it has not been shown that the peril which was the immediate and efficient cause of damage owed its existence to their negligence. In the course of the trial before Lopes, L.J., it does appear to have been, at one time, suggested that the appellants' servants failed to exercise due diligence in extirpating the rats, and also that the bath-room pipe ought not to have been of lead, but of some other material which a rat could not or would not gnaw. Neither of these points was submitted to the jury, who negatived the only charge of negligence which was ultimately insisted in by the respondents. I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Bramwell.—I am of opinion that this judgment must be reversed. This is the third case in which this House has had to consider whether a peril of the sea or other peril within the general words was shown. The arguments and discussions in all three have been very useful in helping to a conclusion. As I have said elsewhere, I think the definition of Lopes, L.J., very good. "It is a sea damage occurring at sea, and nobody's fault." What is the "peril"? It is that the ship or goods will be lost or damaged; but it must be "of the sea." Else would not be a peril of the sea; so loss or damage from it would not be insured against by the general words. So of lightning. In the present case the sea has damaged the goods. That it might do so was a peril that the ship encountered. It is true that rats made the hole through which the water got in, and if the question were whether rats making a hole was a peril of the sea, I should say certainly not. If we could suppose that no water got in, but that the assured sued the underwriter for the damage done to the pipe, I should say clearly that he could not recover. But I should equally say that the underwriters on goods would be liable for the damage shown in this case. Then I am of opinion that "perils of the seas" is a phrase having the same meaning in bills of lading and charter-parties as in policies of insurance. I repeat my illustration, if underwriters paid this loss as through a peril of the sea, how would they, in the name of the assured, claim from the shipowner, because it was not a peril of the sea. I do not go through the cases; I say there is none opposed to this opinion. The doubt or hesitation expressed in the case, Cullen v. Butler, where the ship was sunk by being fired into is certainly a doubt the other way, but only a doubt.

An attempt was made to shew that a peril of the sea meant a peril of what I feel inclined to call the sea's behaviour or ill-condition. But that is met by the argument that if so, striking on a sunken rock on a calm day, or against an iceberg, and consequent foundering, is not a peril of the sea or its consequence.

No question of negligence exists in this case. The damage was caused by the sea in the course of navigation with no default in anyone. I am, therefore, of opinion that the damage was caused by peril of the sea within the meaning of the bill of lading, that Lopes, L.J., was right, and that the judgment must be reversed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The damage to a portion of the cargo of rice carried by the defendants' ship was not occasioned either remotely or immediately by any negligence of the defendants as alleged in the statement of claim; but they may, nevertheless, be liable; and the real question is whether the defendants have established that it arose from a peril of the sea coming within the exception contained in the charter-party and in the bill of lading. I agree with Lord Watson that the exception "peril of the sea" has the same meaning whether it occurs in a marine policy or in a charter-party or bill of lading, and is to be so interpreted; but that when the action is on the contract of carriage you may look behind the proximate or immediate cause for the purpose of ascertaining whether the remote cause may not have been the negligence of the carrier; and, indeed, the carrier is usually under the necessity of establishing that no negligence of his had led to the calamity. Thus, for instance, if a ship is cast on the rocks by force of the winds or sea, that is a loss by a peril of the sea within the exception; but in an action against the carrier it would be open to consider whether the ship being placed in that position did not originate in negligent navigation.

At the close of the argument I was slightly inclined to the opinion that the loss in question might be more accurately described as arising from a peril of the ship than caused by a peril of the sea; but, on consideration of the very careful and elaborate judgments in the Court of Appeal and the authorities referred to, and looking at the reason of the thing, I have come to a conclusion in accord with that announced by my noble and learned friends, adopting the reasons and the decision of Lopes, L.J.

The accident was fortuitous, unforeseen, and actually unknown until the ship reached her destination and commenced unloading. I do not, however, mean to suggest that to constitute a peril of the sea the accident or calamity should have been of an unforeseen character. The remote cause was, in a certain sense, the action of the rats on the lead pipe; but the immediate cause of the damage was the irruption of sea water from time to time through the injured pipe caused by the rolling of the ship as she proceeded on her voyage.

There having been no negligence on the part of the defendants, I am of opinion that they have brought the case within the exception, and are protected.

Lord Herschell.—I have so recently expressed, in the case of Wilson & Co. v. The Owners of Cargo per The Xantho, ante, p. 353, 11 App. Cas. 503, my views upon the interpretation to be put upon the words "dangers and accidents of the seas," occurring in a bill of lading, that I need trouble your lordships with but few observations in this case.

I take the facts to be that the damage occurred by the sea entering through a leak caused by rats, without any neglect or default on the part of the shipowner or those for whom he was responsible, and that this was not an ordinary incident of the voyage which he was bound to anticipate. In saying so I am differing from the ground upon which two of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., based their judgment. But when those learned judges say that "it was consistent with the findings that the mischief done to the pipe, and the incursion of sea water which followed, would never have happened but for either a defect in the condition of the ship or some want of prudence in the shipowner." I think they overlook the course which the case took at the trial. It was suggested during the trial by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs that due care had not been taken to exclude or exterminate the rats, and that if the pipe had been made of some other material the accident would not have happened. But I think these points were distinctly and unequivocally abandoned by him. If intended to be insisted upon, they raised questions upon which the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken, and, with the assent of the plaintiffs' counsel, the only questions put were upon a totally different point. The Master of the Rolls rested his judgment altogether upon another ground. He considered that the rats were the real cause of the damage, and that it was therefore not due to a danger or accident of the seas.

I quite concur with the view expressed in Laveroni v. Drury, that injury done to a vessel or its cargo by rats is not damage by perils of the sea. But in that very case Pollock, C.B., said:—"If, indeed, the rats had made a hole in the ship, through which water came and damaged the cargo, that might very likely be a case of sea damage." The Master of the Rolls says that the distinction is a very fine one between damage done by rats, which, it may be, so eat into the timbers of a ship as to render it unfit to proceed to sea, and the loss of the vessel owing to the incursion of water when its sides have been completely penetrated by the same cause. I own I think the distinction a substantial one, and it seems to me obvious that Pollock, C.B., shared this view.

It has been held in the United States, in the case of Garrigues v. Coxe, that a leak occasioned by the eating of rats, without negligence on the part of the shipowner, was a risk covered in a marine policy by the words "perils of the seas." Taking the facts of this case to be as I have stated them, I entertain no doubt that the loss was one which would in this country be recoverable under a marine policy as due to a peril of the sea. It arose directly from the action of the sea. It was not due to wear and tear, nor to the operation of any cause ordinarily incidental to the voyage, and, therefore, to be anticipated. And, inasmuch as it was not the result of any act or default on the part of the shipowner or his crew, I think, for the reasons I have given in my opinion in the case already alluded to, that it is within the exception in the bill of lading. I accordingly concur in the motion which has been made.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree. The goods which were carried under the bill of lading were damaged during the voyage by the incursion of sea water. The water came in through a hole gnawed by rats in a pipe connecting the bath-room with the sea. At the trial various charges and suggestions were made of negligence on the part of the shipowner. But they were all either withdrawn or negatived by the jury. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the accident which caused the damage was one of the excepted perils or accidents, and there was no reason why the shipowner should not avail himself of the exception. It was an accidental and unforeseen incursion of the sea that could not have been guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care.

I agree, therefore, with the judgment of Lopes, L.J. I do not think the case could be summed up better than it was by him in the words which have already been quoted: "Sea damage occurring at sea and nobody's fault." I concur in the motion which has been made.

In re MERSEY RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Judgment creditor—Appointment of receiver of "undertaking"—Priorities—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), s. 4.

A judgment creditor of a railway company who obtains a receivership order under section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, does not thereby obtain any priority over other creditors.

A receiver appointed under this section will not be discharged until every judgment creditor of the company—whose judgment has been recovered either in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act (20th of August, 1867), or in an action not on contract, brought after that date—has been satisfied; and therefore the section neither contemplates nor permits the making of successive receivership orders.

Order of Kekewich, J., discharged.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J. (reported 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 166).

The question raised by this appeal was whether, on the true construction of section 4 of the Railway Companies Clauses Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), after a receivership order had been made against a railway company on the application of a judgment creditor, a subsequent judgment creditor could obtain a second receivership order without prejudice to the former order, and thereby obtain priority over other creditors.

Section 4 of the Act is as follows:—"The engines, tenders, carriages, . . . materials, and effects constituting the rolling stock and plant used or provided by a company for the purposes of traffic on their railway, or of their stations and workshops, shall not, after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic, be liable to be taken in execution, at law or in equity, at any time after the passing of this Act, when the judgment on which execution issues is recovered in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of this Act, or in an action not on a contract commenced after the passing of this Act; but the person who has recovered such judgment may obtain the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager of the undertaking of the company on application by petition . . .; and all money received by such receiver or manager shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the court in payment of the debts of the company and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein; and on payment of the amount due to every such judgment creditor as aforesaid the court may if it thinks fit discharge such receiver or such receiver and manager."

The following are the material facts:—

On December 14, 1887, Messrs. Waddell, the contractors of the company, recovered judgment against the Mersey Railway Co., and on December 20 obtained the usual receivership order under section 4 of the Act over the "undertaking" of the company. On December 24 the Corporation of Birkenhead, the present respondents, recovered judgment also against the company, and afterwards presented a petition for the appointment of a receiver.

On January 11, 1888, Kekewich, J., made a second receivership order on this petition, without prejudice to the former order, and directed that the receiver under the second order should do nothing under that order without the leave of the court.

The railway company appealed from this order of January 11.

Buckley, Q.C., and Phipson Beale, for the appellants.—Section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, does not give the court power to make successive orders appointing successive receivers. Before the Act the court had no power to appoint a receiver over the undertaking of a railway company: Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 201; the effect of section 4 is, that when once a receivership order has been made it operates as an administration order in favour of all creditors of the company: In re Manchester and Milford Railway Co., 14 Ch. D. 645, 28 W. R. Dig. 190.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the respondents.—The power of obtaining a receiver given by the statute is a remedy by way of substitution for the ordinary right of a judgment creditor to take the chattels of the debtor in execution, and therefore has the same incidents with regard to priorities as the remedy for which it has been substituted. The words of the section expressly contemplate priorities, and so also does the general order made under the Act, order 31, General Orders, January, 1868, L. R. 3 Ch. App., introduction p. 42. [BOWEN, L.J.—What construction do you put on the words "every such judgment creditor"?] They mean a judgment creditor who has obtained a receivership order under the section. The observations of Jessel, M.R., in the case of In re Manchester and Milford Railway Co. show that we are entitled to a receivership order, without prejudice, of course, to the former order.

Farwell, for the judgment creditors who had obtained the first receivership order, said they did not claim to have obtained any priority thereby.

Buckley Q.C., in reply—There is a radical difference between the nature of the possession of a sheriff who has seized goods under a fi. fa., and the possession of a receiver appointed under this section; the possession of the sheriff is for the benefit only of the judgment creditor who has issued the fi. fa., but the possession of the receiver is for the benefit, not merely of the petitioner but of all other creditors. The Act was passed on August 20, 1867, and section 4 only applies to judgment creditors who either sued on a contract entered into after that date or who, if not suing on a contract at all, had begun their action after that date; the words "payment of every such judgment creditor" therefore mean every judgment creditor who is bound by section 4, and who, under that section, could have obtained a receivership order.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the railway company against an order of Kekewich, J., appointing a receiver on the application of a judgment creditor, and after a previous receivership order had been made.

It does not appear that this judgment creditor will get any benefit by this second receivership order, as the railway company is insolvent; at all events no benefit has been obtained by this judgment creditor.

Section 4 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 127 provides that rolling stock of a railway company cannot be taken in execution by a judgment creditor, and instead of the common law remedy of levying execution it substitutes, as it were, another remedy—viz. it enables a judgment creditor to obtain an order for the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager, of the "undertaking" of the company, that is, of the proceeds of the business carried on by the company.

In my opinion this section gives no priority to the particular judgment creditor who gets the receivership order by the fact of his obtaining the order, but gives a common benefit to all judgment creditors.

But it is said that priority must have been intended to be given by this section, on the ground that as it prevents the rolling stock being taken in execution, and as some other remedy is substituted therefor, the priority which would have been obtained by execution ought to be obtained also by the receivership order; but the substituted benefit is not with respect to the same thing as that which, were it not for the section, could have been taken in execution; what is given to the judgment creditor is something entirely and essentially different from that which he could have taken in execution.

It is well known that a fi. fa. does not bind the debtor's goods until it is executed. In my opinion this section does, though not in terms, in effect prevent a judgment creditor gaining priority, because it prevents these chattels being taken in execution.

Does the section give priority to those judgment creditors who with due diligence obtain a receivership order? [The Lord Justice read the section, and continued]. It is said the direction that the moneys received by the receiver shall be applied in payment of the debts of the company according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein, recognizes the fact that a judgment creditor gets priority by obtaining a receivership order; that is a mistake. It recognizes the fact that priorities may exist, e.g., any existing prior mortgages, such as debentures, and provides that the receivership order should not disturb those. Then it is said that the words "on payment of the amount due to every such jugdment creditor as aforesaid the court may discharge . . . the receiver," showed that a priority should be given to such judgment creditor as had obtained a receivership order. In my opinion that is not the true construction of those words. They refer, not to a judgment creditor who has obtained a receivership order, but to every judgment creditor of the class mentioned in the first part of the section—viz., who has recovered judgment either in an action brought on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act, or in an action, not on contract, brought after the passing of the Act.

The section contemplates that when and if the whole of the judgment creditors who could get the benefit of this Act are paid, then and not till then will the receiver be discharged. This does not contemplate the appointment of more than one receiver, and it would be strange if it did, as the subsequent receivers would be persons who could do nothing, and the order under appeal in fact directs that. The first receivership order cannot be discharged until all creditors who have obtained the benefit of the Act are satisfied.

In my opinion a judgment creditor does not under this section gain any additional security by getting the appointment of a second receiver, and therefore in my opinion it was wrong to make this order, no priority and no additional security being thereby obtained. The order of Kekewich, J., will be dismissed without costs however, as it would not be right to make the judgment creditor pay the costs of his debtor, the railway company.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question really is, What is the true construction of section 4 of the Act of 1867? The facts are simple. A judgment creditor got a receivership order under this section, the order being in the form adopted in the case of In re Staffordshire and Uttoxeter Railway Co., and given in Seton, 4th ed., at p. 422. The receiver appointed under that order still exists—is still receiver. Then another judgment creditor presents a petition for the appointment of another receiver, not seeking, however, to disturb the former order. Kekewich, J., acceded to that application and appointed a second receiver without prejudice to the first, but decided nothing as to priorities. Now as to this second judgment creditor, it is obvious that, unless something was to be got by this second receivership order, it was only a useless expense. Mr. Hastings said that his client would, by having obtained that order, get priority over other creditors; and, if that were so, there would be some object in obtaining it. We must see what the section says. It is practically divided into three parts; the first part puts a stoppage on seizure under a fi. fa. of the rolling stock of a railway company. The effect of that is that it is of no use to a judgment creditor to issue a fi. fa. unless there exists property other than rolling stock belonging to the company, because no judgment creditor can get any lien or charge on rolling stock under any fi. fa., and therefore it deprives a judgment creditor of the power of getting priority by seizing the rolling stock. The second part of the section provides that a judgment creditor can get a receiver of the "undertaking" of the railway company. This is a new remedy, but hardly a substituted one, because it can be got whether there is or is not any rolling stock, and it is therefore an additional, rather than a substituted, remedy. The third part of the section shows what the receiver is to do with the money he receives, but it gives no indication of priorities at all. [The Lord Justice read this part of the section, and continued:—] This lets in all creditors of the company, whether judgment or simple contract creditors. I find no indication of intention to create priorities; such priorities as exist are to be respected, but that is all.

I think the words "every such judgment creditor as aforesaid" can only apply to the words used at the end of the first part of the section—that is, judgment creditors who have obtained judgment in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of the Act, or in an action, not on contract, brought after this Act.

It was urged that, inasmuch as it was impossible to pay off judgment creditors except pari passu with other creditors, that did create priorities; but that view is erroneous.

The section says that if the company can, by any method, get rid of such judgment creditors, then the court may discharge any receiver appointed.

But this section creates no priority in favour of anyone, and a judgment creditor has not, and does not, under this section, obtain any priority whatever. This second receivership order must therefore be discharged, but, as the question raised is a new one, the order will be discharged, without costs, and no costs will be allowed of the appeal.

In re JOHNSON & WEATHERALL. (a.)

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation — Country solicitor and London agent—Bill of agency charges—Taxation of part of bill—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

The Solicitors Act, 1843, gives the court no jurisdiction to order the taxation of part of an agent's bill of costs.

The court has, however, under its general jurisdiction, power to order the taxation of a bill relating to court business whether the bill be an agent's bill or a bill delivered by a solicitor to his client; and to refer any part of a bill to taxation.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall, solicitors, in London, had for some years acted as the London agents of Messrs. Storer & Co., solicitors, at Manchester.

On the 3rd of January, 1886, Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall delivered to Messrs. Storer & Co. their yearly bill of agency charges for the year 1885. The bill contained charges in respect of a number of distinct actions and matters in which Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall had during that year acted as agents for Messrs. Storer & Co., the charges relating to each action or matter being stated separately under the head of that action or matter, forming what might be called a separate chapter in the bill.

One of the actions in respect of which charges were made was Mellor v. Swire.

On the 3rd of January, 1887, Messrs. Storer & Co. took out the present summons, asking for the taxation of that part of the bill which related to Mellor v. Swire. The summons was issued within a year from the delivery of the bill.

The London agents contended that the applicants could not have that part of the bill which related to Mellor v. Swire taxed without having the whole bill taxed, and this they were willing to have done.

By their affidavits filed in support of the summons, Messrs. Storer & Co. alleged that unnecessary charges had been incurred in Mellor v. Swire by reason of the negligence of Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall, and that on taxation those charges would be disallowed. No complaint was made of the charges in other matters comprised in the bill, nor was any undertaking given for their payment. Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall, by their affidavits in reply, entirely denied the truth of the allegations of negligence.

North, J., held that the bill delivered was one entire bill, and that the applicants were entitled to a taxation only on the terms of the whole bill being taxed.

Messrs. Storer & Co. appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal it appeared that a further bill of charges in Mellor v. Swire had been delivered by Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall to the appellants since the summons was taken out, and that a cash account had been delivered which showed a balance of £1,188 1s. 4d. to be due from the appellants to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall.

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Levett, for the appellants.—The court has jurisdiction, apart from the Solicitors Act, 1843, to refer to taxation an agent's bill of costs on the application of the solicitor employing him: Jones v. Roberts, 8 Sim. 397; Smith v. Dimes, 4 Ex. 32; In re Nelson, Son, & Hastings, 33 W. R. 645, 30 Ch. D. 1. In an agency bill the charges relating to each matter comprised in it really form a separate bill, and it is not competent, therefore, for an agent, by stitching together a number of bills dealing with various matters, to present them as one bill for the purposes of taxation. If that were to be allowed, a London agent might escape from paying the costs of the taxation of a bill containing charges in one matter which were grossly excessive because the charges in the other matters could not be called in question. And at the same time, as between the country solicitor and his lay client, the charges in each of the actions or matters must be taxed separately. We admit that the order we ask for cannot be obtained as of course, but we submit that we have shown sufficient ground to justify the court in making the order in the present case.

They also referred to Scougall v. Campbell, 3 Russ. 545; In re Tryon, 7 Beav. 496; Ward v. Eyre, 28 W. R. 712, 15 Ch. D. 130; In re Massey & Carey, 32 W. R. 1068, 26 Ch. D. 459.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants the court suggested that an order should be made in the following terms:—"If within four days the appellants undertake to pay over to the respondents, within ten days from this date (subject to an undertaking to refund what shall be disallowed on taxation), the sum of £1,188 1s. 4d., and the appellants consenting by their counsel to refer to taxation such further bills relating to Mellor v. Swire as have been delivered subsequently to the bill mentioned in the notice of appeal—order that so much of the delivered bill as relates to Mellor v. Swire be referred to taxation, the appellants to pay the costs in this court and in the court below; all other costs to be reserved. If no such undertaking be given, the appeal to be dismissed, with costs.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Hamilton Humphreys, for the respondents, agreed to an order in the above form, and were not called upon by the court.

COTTON, L.J.—We think that the appellants were wrong in the idea that they could come under the Act for an order to tax a part of a solicitor's bill. This would be contrary to the course of practice under the Act. No undertaking was offered by them to pay what was due. They insisted as a matter of right upon having part of the bill referred to taxation without offering any terms. I do not think that the Solicitors Act, 1843, gives any jurisdiction to tax part of an agent's bill, but I am of opinion that the court, under its general jurisdiction, can order taxation of bills relating to court business, whether the bill be an agent's bill or a bill delivered by a solicitor to his client, and also can refer part of a bill for taxation. In In re Tryon Lord Langdale, who had great experience in matters of taxation, directed taxation of part of an agency bill, reserving the costs. The court, in a proper case, will exercise this jurisdiction, taking care to impose such terms as will prevent any injustice being done. In the present case I think it reasonable that a taxation of so much of the bill as relates to Mellor v. Swire should be directed, but on the terms of the applicants paying the cash balance which is admitted to be due, subject to an undertaking to refund in case it shall ultimately appear that the respondents are not entitled to retain the whole of it. The rule as to the result of one-sixth being taxed off ought not to be followed. The costs will be left to be dealt with by the court. The agents must be allowed to include in the taxation their subsequent bill relating to Mellor v. Swire.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not disposed to construe section 37 as depriving the court of its power to refer part of a bill to taxation, or any other power which it had before. I do not see anything to prevent the court, on a special case being made, from referring to taxation any particular class of items in a solicitor's bill. I agree that it should be done on the terms proposed. If they are not complied with the appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion, that the Act does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to refer part of a bill for taxation if circumstances make it right to do so.

Costs—Taxation—Refresher fees—Appeal from Chancery Division—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 30, 37, 48.

On taxation an addition may, in the discretion of the taxing master, be made to the fees marked on the briefs of counsel, on appeals from the Chancery Division to the Court of Appeal, though no vivâ voce evidence has been taken. Such addition may, if the taxing master think proper, be in the shape of a daily allowance.

Svendsen v. Wallace, 34 W. R. 151, 16 Q. B. D. 27, explained and held applicable to appeals from the Chancery Division.

This was an appeal from a decision of North, J. (31 Solicitors' Journal, 812).

The question was whether refresher fees or fees in the nature of refresher fees can be allowed on the hearing of an appeal from the Chancery Division to the Court of Appeal.

In the present case the appeal had lasted four days, and the action had been dismissed with costs.

Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 48, provides for the allowance of refreshers "when any cause or matter is to be tried or heard upon vivâ voce evidence in open court," but makes no reference to the hearing of an appeal. Sub-rule 30 provides that "As to any work and labour properly performed and not herein provided for, and in respect of which fees have heretofore been allowed, the same or similar fees are to be allowed for such work and labour as have heretofore been allowed." And by sub-rule 37 it is provided that "the rules, orders, and practice of any court whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court of Justice or Court of Appeal relating to costs and the allowance of the fees of solicitors and attorneys and the taxation of costs existing prior to the commencement of the principal Act shall, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the principal Act and these rules, remain in force and be applicable to the costs of the same or analogous proceedings, and to the allowance of the fees of solicitors of the Supreme Court, and the taxation of costs in the High Court of Justice and Court of Appeal."

On the taxation the defendants claimed refresher fees for their counsel for three days, relying on Svendsen v. Wallace, 34 W. R. 151, 16 Q. B. D. 27, a case decided since 1883, where it was held by a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division that refreshers could be allowed on the hearing of an appeal from that division, though the taxing master had been of a contrary opinion.

The taxing master (Mr. Wainwright) held that the case of Svendsen v. Wallace did not apply to appeals from the Chancery Division, and disallowed the refreshers on the ground that he had no power to allow them, or discretion in the matter. He said: "In the Court of Chancery, before the oral examination of witnesses in that court, daily refreshers were not allowed nor paid. In Harrison v. Wearing, 27 W. R. 526, 11 Ch. D. 206, the decision and reasoning of Jessel, M.R., are quite opposed to the allowance of daily refreshers on appeals."

North, J., held that Svendsen v. Wallace applied, and that the taxing master had jurisdiction to allow refreshers. The order was drawn up in the following terms: "This court, being of opinion that the taxing master may, if he thinks fit, allow refreshers, doth order that it be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly."

The plaintiffs appealed.

Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.

W. D. Rawlins, for the respondents.

By the desire of the Court of Appeal a report was furnished to them by one of the taxing masters (Mr. Ryland), after conferring with another taxing master in the Chancery Division and with Master Johnson, of the Queen's Bench Division, as to the former practice on taxation. Such report was as follows:— "The practice in the Court of Appeal in Chancery before 1875 in non-witness causes was uniform not to allow daily refresher fees, the only refresher fee being the usual sitting fee of £3 5s. 6d. to the leader and £1 3s. 6d. to the junior. Although it was not the practice to allow daily refresher fees, the Chancery taxing masters allowed what, in their discretion, were proper fees for the services rendered, and where the fee given on the brief when delivered was, in the masters' judgment, insufficient, they uniformly allowed an additional or further fee; but such additional or further fee was not in the smallest degree recognized by the masters as a daily refresher, but was considered by them purely and simply as part and parcel of the proper fee on the hearing of the appeal. The propriety of the practice of the Chancery masters of adding to the original fee in contradistinction to recognizing the allowance of daily refreshers is illustrated in, and countenanced by, Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, 33 W. R. 913. I have not forgotten Smith v. Buller, 23 W. R. 332, L. R. 19 Eq. 473 (decided by Malins, V.C.), which was, no doubt, for a short time, authority for the allowance of daily refreshers in non-witness actions. Harrison v. Wearing, 27 W. R. 526, 11 Ch. D. 206, which soon followed, dissented from it, and the latter case, being in accordance with the practice in the offices of the Chancery masters, has been followed by them. Before 1875 there were in the Court of Appeal in Chancery, or, in fact, in the Chancery court of first instance, very few witness actions. Occasionally there might be one (as an issue or patent case), but they were few and far between, and afforded little opportunity of establishing the practice on the subject, but, so far as I have been able to learn, daily refreshers were, in such cases—i.e., where witnesses were examined—allowed both in the court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal. Between 1875 and 1883 non-witness causes were dealt with in exactly the same way as they were dealt with previously to 1875, but witness actions between those years were considered in the light of Nisi Prius actions, and daily refreshers were recognized and allowed. The practice in the Exchequer Chamber seems to have been much the same as the practice in the Chancery Division—viz., where it was, in the judgment of the master, proper to do so, he allowed such further or additional fee, either daily or otherwise, as in his discretion was with the fee marked on the brief a proper fee for the services rendered. I observe that in Svendsen v. Wallace Smith, J., in his judgment states that before the rules came into force it is conceded that refreshers were allowable upon the argument of special cases and otherwise in the Exchequer Chamber and afterwards in the Court of Appeal. Excepting as I have stated above, I am not aware of the authority for this. So far as I can learn, refreshers or further fees were always in the discretion of the master (Turnbull v. Jansen, 26 W. R. 815, 3 C. P. D. 264), and were never recognized as 'refreshers,' but were regarded as further or additional fees."

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must fail. I think that the order of North, J., has been misunderstood, and also the decision in Svendsen v. Wallace. It seems to have been considered that North, J., directed the taxing master to allow daily refreshers as a fixed sum. But, as I read it, the order says nothing of the kind. Daily refreshers were introduced into the Chancery Division when it became the practice to try actions with vivâ voce evidence or with the cross-examination of witnesses who had made affidavits. Refreshers were allowed on the principle that it could not be estimated beforehand how long the examination of the witnesses on either side would occupy, and it was thought desirable that the same fees should be allowed as were allowed in similar cases at common law. This principle does not apply to hearings in the Court of Appeal, because, as a general rule, witnesses are not examined there, although, in some cases, no doubt, the Court of Appeal does allow witnesses to be examined before it, and in such cases the ordinary rule as to witness actions does apply. In the present case the appeal was heard without witnesses, and the question is whether the taxing master has power to make any addition to the fees which were marked on the briefs before the hearing of the appeal began. The term "daily refresher" is well known. In the House of Lords and in the Privy Council daily refreshers are allowed as a fixed sum. But, as I understand, it was not the practice in the Court of Appeal in Chancery or in the Exchequer Chamber to allow daily refreshers as fixed sums. If the taxing master was satisfied that the fee originally marked on the brief was not adequate, he could make an addition to it. It is very desirable that solicitors should form an opinion before the hearing what, having regard to the nature of the case and the probable length of the argument, would be the proper fee to mark. In my opinion the order of North, J., properly interpreted, merely followed the old practice in the Exchequer Chamber of permitting the taxing master to exercise his discretion as to allowing what may be called a "refresher fee," but what is really an addition to the fee originally marked on the brief. This is really the effect of Svendsen v. Wallace. It is not, strictly speaking, an allowance of refresher fees; but the taxing master is not bound to disregard any suggestion of an addition to the fees marked. The court now knows, from the report of the taxing master, that in the Court of Appeal in Chancery the taxing master had a discretion to allow an addition to the fees marked. In my opinion all that North, J., decided was that the taxing master, though not allowing any fixed and definite daily sum as a refresher, has a discretion to allow an addition to the fee marked. The case must go back to the taxing master with an expression of the opinion of the court that he has this discretion.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Putting aside the practice in the House of Lords and in the Privy Council, the broad principle is that the solicitor must make up his mind, at the time when he delivers the brief, what is the proper fee, and must mark it then. But in actions in which witnesses are to be examined it is extremely difficult for the solicitor to judge how long the trial is likely to last; and, therefore, in fixing the fee in such cases, the solicitor is assumed to have contemplated, when he fixed it, that, if the trial was prolonged beyond the first day, daily refreshers would be allowed. This reason applies to witness cases n the Court of Appeal; but in other cases, where the argument is on questions of law or on mixed questions of law and fact, the solicitor must make up his mind, when he delivers the brief, what fee will recompense the attention which counsel will have to give to the case. The only ground, in such a case, for allowing an increase of the fee originally marked is that there has been a miscalculation by the solicitor when he fixed it, and that he has under-estimated it. If there has clearly been a miscalculation—a bonâ fide mistake by the solicitor—it would be very unjust not to allow it to be corrected afterwards. But the taxing master ought to be very jealous in seeing that there has been a mistake; for it is the business of the solicitor, when he fixes the fee, and of the counsel's clerk, when he accepts it, to see that it has been properly calculated. In my opinion North, J., made the right order, though it was unfortunate that he used the word "refreshers." The case will go back to the taxing master for him to consider whether there has not been some miscalculation by reason of something having happened which was not anticipated when the fees were marked. This would not be simply that the case was a heavy one. Cases in the Court of Appeal generally are heavy, and involve questions of law which it is very difficult to decide, and a solicitor ought to take this into consideration. The taxing master must look at the whole matter and see whether the proper fees have been marked; and, if he thinks that there has been any miscalculation at the time when they were marked, he ought to correct it. The court is really deciding in accordance with Svendsen v. Wallace, the only objection to which is the use of the word "refreshers." I wish to add that there is nothing in our decision to prevent the taxing master from adding to the fees in the shape of a daily allowance if he should think that a fairer way of setting right a miscalculation. In this sense he may allow "refreshers."

URQUHART v. BUTTERFIELD. (a.)

Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund—Nature of interest of subscriber—"Nominee"—Nomination of trustee—Nomination of curator by Scotch court as nominee of lunatic subscriber—Jurisdiction of Scotch court—Question of fact—Admissions made by counsel as to matters of fact—Proof of facts disputed with by admission—56 Geo. 3, c. lxxiii., s. 9.

A subscriber to the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund (established under the Act 56 Geo. 3, c. lxxiii.) is not given, by the Act or the regulations made thereunder, any interest in the insurance fund as his estate or property, but only a power of disposition over it in certain particular ways. So held by North, J., and by the Court of Appeal.

Held, per North, J., that, under the regulations, a "nominee" must be a person who is to take a beneficial interest in the fund, and that there cannot be a nomination of a person who is to take as trustee for others.

The Court of Appeal, under the circumstances of the case before them, abstained from giving any decision on that point, but expressed an opinion that a nomination need not state that the "nominee" is to take beneficially, and that the object of the regulations referred to was merely to give the directors of the fund information in exercising their discretion as to admittance, as to the purposes for which a nomination was made, and as to the parties who were to receive the money.

At the trial of the action counsel for the defendant made an admission that an order made by the Court of Session in Scotland nominating the curator of a lunatic subscriber on behalf of the lunatic as "nominee," had the same effect as if it had been a nomination made by the subscriber himself (being sane).

North, J., did not consider himself bound by that admission, and held that the Scotch court had no jurisdiction to appoint a "nominee" on behalf of the lunatic subscriber; but

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that, as the question of the jurisdiction of the Scotch court to make such an order was a question of fact, proof of which, like proof of other facts, might be dispensed with by the admission of counsel, North, J., was wrong in going into that question.

Action.

In 1827 Lewis Robert Hoyes, who was then an officer in the Department of Customs in England, effected two insurances on his life in the "Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund," which was a fund established by the 56 Geo. 3, c. lxxiii., for the benefit of the widows, children, or other relatives of officers and clerks employed in the Department of the Customs in England.

The Act appointed a body of directors to hold and manage the fund, and by section 16 gave them power to make rules for the regulation of the fund.

Section 9 of the Act provided "That the said directors shall and may, if they deem it expedient, admit any person or persons to be the nominee or nominees of any subscriber to the said fund who may not be a relative or relatives of the said subscriber; and the said nominee or nominees so admitted as aforesaid shall and are truly declared to have, and thereafter to continue to have, to all intents and purposes, the same and the like interest in the said fund and the advantages thereof as if the said nominee or nominees had been a relative or relatives of the said subscriber, under and subject in every respect to the rules and regulations approved and ratified as aforesaid."

Rule 23 of the rules made by the directors in force in 1827, as far as material, was as follows:—"The capital sum of money insured by a subscriber, together with the addition of profit which may have been made thereto, shall, in its disposal at his death, be subject to the following regulations" (inter alia): "in the event of a subscriber dying without leaving a widow the whole of the capital money shall be available in such manner and proportions as he may direct by any deed or instrument or by his will for the benefit of his widow, children, and relatives, and for such nominees who shall have been duly admitted by the directors . . . and where a subscriber dies intestate, and shall not have appointed such available capital money by any deed or instrument for the benefit of his widow, children, relatives, or nominees, the whole of such available capital money due at his decease by virtue of his insurance shall . . . if such subscriber leave no widow nor any child or children . . . be applied according to the Statute of Distributions. . . ."

In 1835 L. R. Hoyes, the subscriber in the present case, while in Scotland, became insane, and on the 28th of November, 1835, Hoyes was found to be a lunatic by the Court of Session in Scotland, and John Forsyth was appointed curator bonis of L. R. Hoyes. A will, executed by L. R. Hoyes, and dated the 18th of May, 1833, was found by the curator among the papers of L. R. Hoyes. L. R. Hoyes thereby, after bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies, gave all his residuary estate and effects to his uncle, L. Hoyes, and his heirs, and appointed the said uncle and two other persons executors. The will contained no reference either to the insurances in the Customs Fund or to any power of appointing them. The directors of the fund when applied to refused at first to admit either the curator or the executors named in the will or the legatees therein named as nominee or nominees of L. R. Hoyes, but stated that they would admit such "nominee" as should be sanctioned by the order of a competent court. Forsyth presented a petition to the Court of Session asking (inter alia) that he might be nominated "nominee."

On the 13th of July, 1841, the Court of Session made an order, on the hearing of that petition, whereby it nominated the petitioner Forsyth "nominee of L. R. Hoyes for behoof of the legatees under the will of that gentleman appended to this petition to his interest as a subscriber to the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund in terms of the statute and regulations," and directed that the petitioner Forsyth should "communicate the said appointment to the directors for their acceptance and admission, as parties interested in the fund, in the terms of the statute and regulations." Forsyth accordingly sent to the directors a copy of the petition and of the order made thereon, and subsequently, in 1842, obtained and submitted to the directors an opinion of one of the standing counsel to the directors of the fund, to the effect that the directors would be justified in admitting Forsyth as the nominee of L. R. Hoyes with reference to the insurance in the fund. The secretary of the board of directors then wrote to Forsyth that the directors had admitted Forsyth as nominee of L. R. Hoyes in the terms of the order of the Court of Session. The premiums on the policies were after this paid by Forsyth till 1849, when by the terms of the policies they ceased to be payable. On the 1st of June, 1853, an order was made by the Court of Session appointing the plaintiff Urquhart to be curator in the place of Forsyth; and on the 4th of January, 1855, Urquhart was admitted by the directors as nominee in the place of Forsyth. L. R. Hoyes continued a lunatic till his death; he died on the 26th of March, 1885. At the time of his death the sums payable in respect of the policies amounted to £5,864. The will of L. R. Hoyes had been proved in Scotland. L. R. Hoyes was never married, and, being himself illegitimate, died without having any next of kin. It appeared, also, that, before the trial of the present action, the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will of L. R. Hoyes had been paid. L. Hoyes, the residuary legatee named in the will of L. R. Hoyes, died in the lifetime of the testator. By the present action the plaintiff Urquhart claimed, as nominee of L. R. Hoyes, admitted by the directors, payment of the £5,864, with interest, out of the fund, and to have it declared that he was entitled to give a good discharge for the same. He also claimed, in the alternative, to have repayment of the premiums from time to time paid by L. R. Hoyes and by the former curator, Forsyth. Butterfield, the secretary to the fund—and, as such, the person authorized, under section 12 of the Act, to be sued on behalf of the directors—was the defendant in the action.

Giffard, Q.C., and R. Campbell, for the plaintiff.—By the terms of the Act the subscriber has a right to appoint a "nominee," and, when admitted, the "nominee" stands in exactly the same position as the subscriber. The nominee was appointed by the order of the Court of Session as "nominee" for the person named as legatee in the will. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., for the defendant.—No doubt the nomination by the Court of Session is as effectual as it would have been if made by the subscriber himself (being sane). But I do not admit that the subscriber himself could have appointed a "nominee" to be a trustee for other persons.] The plaintiff, having been admitted "nominee" by the directors, can give a good discharge for the money, and they are bound to pay him. Whether he will be accountable or not to other persons is quite another matter, but with that the directors have nothing to do. He is the person who can give a legal discharge: In re Maclean's Trusts, L. R. 19 Eq. 274; In re Pocock's Policy, 19 W. R. 801, L. R. 6 Ch. 445. Forsyth acted on the faith of representations made by the directors, and they are bound to make those representations good: Hammersley v. De Biel, 12 Cl. & F. 45. A new contract was, in fact, entered into between the curator and the directors, on the footing of which he paid the subsequent premiums. If the plaintiff is not entitled to the insurance moneys, he is entitled to have the premiums paid after 1842 repaid, on the ground that they were paid under a mistake of fact.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the defendant.—The subscriber has no property in the sum insured, but only a limited power of appointment over it in favour of his wife, children, relatives, or nominees duly admitted according to the rules: Attorney-General v. Rowsell;* Attorney-General v. Abdy, 1 H. & C. 266, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 751; In re Phillips' Insurance, 31 W. R. 511, 23 Ch. D. 235. The effect of a nomination is only to make the "nominee" an object of the power of appointment. In the present case the subscriber never made any appointment by his will in favour of the nominee. The persons named in the will are not objects of the power; and, as the lunatic was illegitimate, there could be no one to take under the Statute of Distributions. With regard to the premiums, if they were paid under any mistake it was a mistake of law, and they cannot, therefore, be recovered. If the lunatic had recovered he might have married and had children, or he might have made a new will. There was, therefore, consideration for the payment of the premiums.

Giffard, Q.C., in reply.—This case must be treated as if the lunatic had been sane, and had nominated the plaintiff. All that the rules require is that the nominee should be admitted during the lifetime of the subscriber: In re Maclean's Trusts. A person may be nominated merely as a trustee for other persons (per Malins, V.C., in In re Pocock's Policy). The fund was created by the lunatic's subscriptions, and if there are no relatives or nominees capable of taking, there is a

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ROWSELL.

This was a motion to make absolute a rule which had been obtained on behalf of the Attorney-General, calling on E. Rowsell, as the executor of his deceased brother, to show cause why he should not account for legacy duty in respect of the proceeds of an insurance effected by the testator on his life in the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund, which proceeds he had bequeathed by his will.

Erle, Rogers, and Deane, for the executor, showed cause.

Twiss and Crompton, for the Attorney-General.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this fund is not liable to legacy duty, and I am quite willing to treat the case upon the principle proposed by Mr. Twiss in his argument. Assuming this to be merely an ordinary case of insurance, it lies between the case of an insurance of a sum of money to be paid to a particular person—a widow or a child—and that of an insurance of a sum of money to be paid to the executors of the assured and entirely under his control. Here it appears that the subscriber had one brother, and, having no wife and no children, the amount of the insurance is given by his will to that brother. I think this case is not within the definition of a "legacy" given in section 7 of 36 Geo. 3, c. 52—that is, a gift by will which shall have effect out of the personal estate of the testator or out of any personal estate which he shall have power to dispose of as he shall think fit. Now, I do not think this was personal estate of the present testator. The money arises from a subscription to a fund for particular purposes, over which the subscriber has, in some instances, no control at all, and, in any case, in which, where he has a control, it is only a limited control. If he appoints a nominee, the nominee can only be admitted "if the directors shall deem it expedient," and I cannot help thinking that the Act was passed and the rules were framed to accomplish the humane, charitable, and beneficial object of securing a fund for the benefit of the widows and children and other persons for whom officers of the Customs might be bound to provide, and especially to exclude the possibility of its becoming anything like a general insurance office for the officers. Viewing it in that light (and it appears to me that that is the true light in which it should be viewed), I think that this money cannot be considered as part of his personal estate, and he could not dispose of it as he pleased. I think it could not have been made available for the payment of his debts, if he had become bankrupt or insolvent during his life it could not have been attached. It seems to me that the fund has been placed out of his disposal, except among a particular class of persons, or in such a limited manner as not to bring it within section 7 of the Act. I think, therefore, that the rule ought to be discharged.

PARKE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The sole question is whether this gift by will falls within section 7 of the Act. It is quite clear that this money is not the personal estate of the testator, for he has paid his subscription from time to time upon the terms prescribed by the Act, and subject to the regulations which have been made in pursuance of the Act. The moment he paid the money to the trustees of the fund it ceased, I think, to be his money, and it was irrevocably placed in the hands of the trustees. Therefore it was no longer his personal estate. Was it, then, personal estate which he had power to dispose as he should think fit? It is perfectly clear that it was not, because by the terms of the rules, which have the force of an Act of Parliament, the destination of the fund is fixed. It is to go to his widow and children or relations or nominees. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is clearly and within section 7, and that no legacy duty is payable.

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that this money is neither personal estate of the deceased nor is it personal estate of which he could dispose as he should think fit. This power of disposal was limited to a particular class out of which he might select.

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The Act certainly meant to make legacy duty payable only in respect of legacies given either out of the personal estate of the testator, or out of personal estate of which he had unlimited power of disposal. The latter part of section 7 was introduced to prevent the evasion of the Act by a person placing a fund in the hands of trustees for himself during his life—after his death in trust for such persons as he might direct by his will. The present case has no resemblance whatever to that, for here the subscriber parts, not with a fund, but with a certain annual sum, in consideration of which he is to have the power of appointing to his widow and relations, or in certain specified events, to a nominee, a certain sum to be estimated in proportion to his subscription. It is quite clear to me that this is neither his personal estate nor a fund over which he has anything more than a limited and special control.

resulting trust for the lunatic. The premiums were paid under a mistake of fact, and the consideration for them has failed. They ought to be repaid if the court holds that the moneys insured cannot be recovered: Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149, 170; Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. sen. 126.

May 9.—North, J.—It has been stated by various judges before whom questions relating to this fund have come, and it is matter of history, that the reason for the institution of this fund was because the Customs Department, like many other public departments, was liable after the death of its employés to applications by their widows and other relations for assistance to enable them to live under circumstances, no doubt, very often involving great distress, difficulty, pain, and sorrow. To avoid such applications, which were equally difficult to assist or refuse, it was considered desirable to establish this fund, by contributing to which (the contributions being compulsory to a great extent) the persons employed in the Customs Department should effect insurance upon their lives, it being provided that the power of disposing of the sum insured, which an ordinary insurer in an ordinary company would have had, should not exist; but that the insurer should not be able to deprive the persons for whose benefit the fund was instituted of the benefit intended to be conferred upon them by it. [His lordship referred to the provisions of the Act and to rule 25 of the Rules of 1819, and continued:—] In my opinion, the word "like" in that rule refers to and takes up the word "such" two lines earlier; and the rule should be read in this way: "And also, under the admission of the directors, in such manner or proportions as he may think proper, and direct in his will for the benefit of his nominee or nominees." By that rule the application of the fund was, to a certain extent, fixed, and, to the extent to which it was not fixed, the fund was (to put it shortly) to go as the subscriber should direct by his will, and, subject thereto, according to the Statute of Distributions. There was nothing in the rule enabling him in any way to deal with the fund except by his will. [His lordship referred to the Act, and to certain rules in force prior to the Rules of 1827, and continued:—] The provision in rule 23 of the Rules of 1827, that the admission of a nominee should take place during the lifetime of the subscriber, was, as it seems to me, clearly within the powers of the Act, for the nominees are to be approved by the directors, and the directors had a right to say that their approval must be given in the lifetime of the subscriber. Upon rule 23 there are two remarks I wish to make. The first is that it gives the subscriber a greater power of selection than he had under the Rules of 1812. Under those Rules the power could be exercised by will only. Under the Rules of 1827 it can be exercised "by any deed or instrument, or by his will." Again, the direction is to be "for the benefit of his wife, children, and relatives, and for such nominees as shall have been duly admitted by the directors." I think that is the same as if it had said, "For the benefit of his widow, children, and relatives, and for the benefit of such nominees who shall have been duly admitted by the directors," or as if the word "of" had been used instead of the word "for." I think that is shown clearly by the following part of the same rule as well as by some of the other rules. [His lordship here referred in detail to rules made in 1836, and continued:—]

The 9th section of the Act, as I have already stated, enabled the directors to "admit any person or persons to be the nominee or nominees of any subscribers to the fund." It was argued that the effect of that section was simply this, that whereas the objects of the insurance were merely the widow, children, and other relations of the insured, this section enabled him, if the directors should approve, to add to that class any nominee, and that that power, if it were exercised, merely made the nominee one of the objects of the subscriber's power of selection, but did not give him any interest in the fund; and that for that purpose there must be some disposition in his favour giving him an interest in the fund after he had become qualified to receive such an interest. It seems to me that that argument is pushed too far. If there was nothing whatever but a nomination by the insured of a person to stand in the position of a relative, it does not seem to me there would be anything to point out what his interest was, and it may be that, if the insured died intestate and without making any other disposition, the nominee would be in the same position as a relative taking an interest in the fund. But, on the other hand, if the insured were to make a nomination, and at the same time to say that that nomination was to be for the benefit of the person named, it seems to me that then the nomination would be fulfilling the double purpose of bringing the person named within the objects of the power, and at the same time conferring a benefit upon him.

The next question is, what is the nature of the interest of the insured under such a power of appointment as this, and I think this question is settled very clearly by the authorities. The first authority is the important case of The Attorney-General v. Rowsell decided in the year 1844 by the Court of Exchequer. The question there was whether legacy duty was payable in respect of the proceeds of an insurance in the fund which the subscriber had disposed of by his will, and that depended upon the question whether the fund insured was the property of the insurer or not. [His lordship read the judgments of the Court of Exchequer, in that case, and continued:—] The matter came before the Court of Exchequer again in the case of The Attorney-General v. Abdy. The facts of that case were shortly these. The insured had no wife or children and he appointed no nominee. By a will made according to one of the forms given in the Notes to the Rules of 1836 he gave the fund to his sister, and the question was whether succession duty was payable. It was held that his interest in the fund was a special property created by his subscription, that he could dispose of it only in a particular way. Pollock, C.B., put it very neatly thus: "Then it is said that the subscriber has only a limited power over the sum assured. But if he has only power to leave it to a certain class of persons, and does leave it to one of them, that person is a successor within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act because there is a disposition of property whereby he becomes beneficially entitled to property upon the death of another person. The officer, by payment of the premiums, created the power under which he acted, and therefore he is the predecessor." And the other barons gave judgments to the same effect. They held, therefore, that there was a "succession," that there was the relation of predecessor and successor between the insured and his sister; but they professed to act upon the authority of The Attorney-General v. Rowsell, and there is not a word in the judgments, from the beginning to the end, indicating that the insurer had anything but a power of appointing the fund, or that it was his property in any other sense. It is true that Bramwell, B., does say that the insurer's right was "property," but looking at the whole of his judgment it is quiet clear what he meant was that he had a right to dispose of "property."

Then there is the case of Maclean's Trusts. There an insurance had been effected in the same fund, and the insured, in August, 1872, executed and deposited with the directors an instrument by which, purporting to exercise the power conferred on him by the rules, he appointed that £1,400 out of the proceeds of his insurance should at his death be paid to five persons named and described as "The present life fund trustees of the Guardian Fire Insurance Co.," and he requested the directors to admit them "as my nominees for the purpose of this appointment," and he declared the appointment irrevocable except with the consent in writing of those persons. He represented to the directors of the fund that "the consideration for the appointment thus made was to be the loan to him by the Guardian Assurance Co. of a sum of money which he intended to apply in releasing or disincumbering some family property for the ultimate benefit of his family," and the directors, under those circumstances, duly admitted the persons named to be his nominees in respect of the sum of £1,400. The company then advanced him £900, and he covenanted that his heirs, executors, or administrators would, within three months after his death, pay to the company the sum of £1,220, with interest from his death until payment, and there was a declaration that the £1,400 coming to the trustees of the company under the appointment should be applied first in the payment of costs and then in satisfaction of the £1,220 and interest, and that the surplus should (subject to succession duty) be paid to the executors or administrators of the insured. After his death the persons interested in the estate of the insured disputed the claim of the insurance company, and the £1,400 was paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act. It was held by Jessel, M.R., that there was a proper appointment and nomination of the trustees, and that they were entitled to be paid the amount due to them out of the £1,400. The only point material to the present case is this: that there might have been a small surplus left after satisfying the £1,220, the interest, and the costs out of the £1,400, and the question arose how that surplus should go. The Master of the Rolls said: "It is suggested that because the real transaction between the testator and the Guardian Life Office was a mortgage and not an assignment out and out, that this was contrary to the principle of the Act, but I do not think it was. The principle of the Act was to allow the subscriber to dispose absolutely, and as he thought fit, of two-thirds of the capital if he had a wife and children. If he did not dispose of it, then it went according to the directions contained in his will—that is, it remained his absolute property. If he disposed of it by way of mortgage, in this court that would be a disposition pro tanto, and, therefore, whatever he did not thus dispose of—that is, his interest as mortgagor—would still remain his absolute property and be subject to the dispositions of his will. To that extent, therefore, the assignment would be a direction to pay to his nominees as trustees for his executors or administrators instead of to the executors or administrators direct; and why should he not in his lifetime direct the whole disposable share coming to him to be paid to nominees who were in a certain event to become trustees for his legal personal representatives? It seems that he had the power so to direct, and that there is no substantial objection to the mode in which that power has been exercised." The only case cited to the Master of the Rolls upon that point was In re Pocock's Policy, to which I shall have to refer presently. Attorney-General v. Rowsell and Attorney-General v. Abdy were not cited to him, though they were afterwards cited upon the second point which arose in the case—viz., whether the £1,400 was subject to succession duty or not. The Master of the Rolls held that it was not subject to succession duty because it had been assigned in the lifetime of the insured, and was therefore expressly exempted from succession duty by the terms of the 17th section of the Succession Duty Act, but he added at the end of his judgment "The fund will be applied in the first place in payment of what is due to the petitioners" (that is the Guardian Co.) "for principal, interest, and costs, including their costs of this petition. I suppose the fund will be ample for that purpose, but if it should not turn out to be sufficient, then the respondents who made the claim will have to pay personally. If there is any surplus it must be transferred to the suit for the adminstration of Mr. Maclean's estate, and of course that surplus will be liable to succession duty, but I am told that in fact the estate is insolvent." No doubt some of the observations of the Master of the Rolls do, so far as they go, treat the fund as the property of the insured, and as payable to his executors and administrators, and that is inconsistent with the two earlier cases to which I have referred, and which at that time had not been cited to the Master of the Rolls, but his observations amounted to no more than a general remark as to a very small possible surplus of a fund, when it was reasonably expected there might not be any. But whatever effect may be attributable to those observations of Jessel, M.R. (and certainly they are entitled to very great weight) their effect upon the law as declared in the earlier cases is now unimportant, because a similar case came before the Court of Appeal on a subsequent occasion when Jessel, M.R., was himself present. That case is In re Phillips' Insurance, and the point in it was shortly this. A subscriber to the fund died a widower leaving children. No nominee had been accepted by the directors in his lifetime. By his will he bequeathed the fund coming from his insurance to a stranger in blood—that is to say, a person who was not a relative and not a nominee. Bacon, V.C., held that the legatee was entitled. The Court of Appeal held that "the subscriber had no property in the fund, but only a limited power of appointment over it, and that this power could only be exercised in favour of his widow, children, blood relations, and nominees admitted by the directors in his lifetime, and that he had no power, therefore, to bequeath the fund to a stranger in blood who had not in his lifetime been accepted by the directors as a nominee, and that the fund therefore, belonged to the children."

It is clear, therefore, according to those cases that the insured has no property whatever in the fund. He has a limited special power of appointment in the mode, and in favour of the objects, pointed out by the rules, but he has nothing else. [His lordship then referred to the facts of the present case as above stated, and continued:—] The case which was stated in 1842 by Mr. Forsyth's solicitors for the opinion of the standing counsel of the Customs Fund was not a joint case. It was a case stated by them for the opinion of the standing counsel of the fund, as being the best authority to whom they could go for advice on the subject, and I have no doubt that the solicitor for the fund knew what was about to be done. What happened subsequently to the admission of Mr. Forsyth as a nominee seems to me altogether immaterial, except so far as the continued payment of the premiums is of importance.

Now what was the position of Mr. Forsyth under the appointment? It seems to me that the plaintiff in this case is in the same position as Mr. Forsyth was in every respect. In my opinion Mr. Forsyth was not duly appointed "nominee" by the order of the Court of Session. It is necessary to consider what the position of the parties was before that order was made. A will made by the lunatic was in existence, by which he gave his property in general terms to certain persons mentioned in it. In my opinion that will did not in any way affect or operate upon his interest in the insurance fund, and that for two reasons which are conclusive. In the first place the will does not contain any reference whatever either to the power which he had of appointing this fund or to the fund itself; neither the power nor the property is referred to. That being so, the will, as it stood then, could not in any way operate upon the fund. In the next place, none of the persons who were nominated by the will to take were objects of the power, they were neither "widow, children, or relatives" of the testator, and they were not "nominees," because at that time no nomination of any sort had taken place. It seems to me that either of those reasons is sufficient to prevent the will from operating on the fund. What, then, was the power given by the rules? Under the Rules of 1827 it was a power to appoint "by any deed or instrument, or by his will," and under the Rules of 1836 it was a power to appoint "by any instrument in writing signed in the presence of one or more witness or witnesses and deposited with the directors, or by his will." It does not seem to me to matter much under which of those rules the case comes, because if the will itself did not operate upon the fund there was no other instrument such as is referred to in the rules which could affect it. There clearly was no instrument signed by Mr. Hoyes, and there could not have been any because, at that time, he was of unsound mind—he remained so during the rest of his life. The only instrument (if there be any) besides the will which could affect the fund, is the order of the Court of Session, which was made on the application of the committee. It seems to me that that order is not an instrument which in any way deals with the fund, and, moreover, the Court of Session having, as is admitted by both parties, the same jurisdiction in Scotland as the Lord Chancellor has in England to deal with the estates of lunatics, had, in my opinion, no power to make such nomination, just as the Lord Chancellor would have no power to make such a nomination in England.

I called the attention of counsel to the fact this morning that a certain admission was made by the counsel for the defendant which did not seem to me to be very clear or precise and to be capable of misconstruction, and for the purpose of clearing this up I allowed the counsel for the plaintiff this morning an opportunity of reading any further evidence which they had if they thought it desirable to do so. They have declined to do that, and it appears to me I must deal with the matter on the assumption that the court in Scotland had precisely the same (but no larger) power of dealing with the interest of the insured in this fund as if the insured had been domiciled in England, confined in a lunatic asylum in England, and the Lord Chancellor had been here dealing with the fund in England. It is very important to recollect that this fund was not the property of the lunatic. If it had been his property the matter would have stood, in my opinion, in a totally different position. But he had no property in it, he had only a special power of directing among which of a very limited class of objects the fund was to be divided. It appears to me that if this had been an English case it would be preposterous to suppose that the Lord Chancellor would have had any power to make a "nomination" on behalf of the lunatic; and it appears to me that the Court of Session in Scotland, exercising precisely the same powers and having precisely the same authority with regard to lunatics in Scotland, could not by anything which they did make a document a will which immediately before their adjudication was not a will operating in any way upon the lunatic's interest in the fund.

The case of Ex parte Whitbread, 2 Mer. 99, which was referred to in Mr. Forsyth's petition, and which I have no doubt, before the Court of Session, does appear to me to assist the plaintiff at all. That case, in my opinion, has no application whatever to one in which the property of the lunatic is not being dealt with at all. The question whether the persons named in his will could or could not take after his death was a matter which could not possibly affect the lunatic beneficially or otherwise; it was the case of a lunatic having a mere dry power of selection, and, in my opinion, such a power cannot be exercised by the Lord Chancellor on his behalf, or by any other court which has only the same jurisdiction which the Lord Chancellor has. There is no precedent that I am aware of for any such authority being vested in the Lord Chancellor.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that the nomination of Mr. Forsyth by the Court of Session had not the effect of making him a "nominee."

There is another difficulty in the way of the plaintiff which prevents my deciding in his favour. It appears to me that the nominee must be a person who is to take beneficially, and that he cannot take merely as a trustee for other persons. I have pointed out that the words "for the benefit of," in rule 23 of 1827, apply to nominees as well as to the widow, children, and relatives of the subscriber. It is admitted here that neither Mr. Forsyth nor the plaintiff took anything whatever beneficially, and that the plaintiff is at the utmost the hand to receive the money, which he would have to apply in the lunacy for the benefit of the persons interested under the will of the lunatic. It appears to me that a person who is not a beneficiary cannot be nominated according to the rules. Indeed, the Court of Session took precisely the same view of the rules that I am taking now, because their order nominated the petitioner "nominee of Hoyes for behoof of the legatees" under his will to his interest as a subscriber to the fund "in terms of the statute and regulations," and directed the petitioner to communicate the appointment to the directors "for their acceptance and admission as parties interested in the fund in terms of the statute and regulations." Therefore the order of the Court of Session contemplated that the persons to be admitted should be, not Mr. Forsyth, but the legatees. They are to be accepted and they are to be admitted, as parties interested. It seems to me beyond all question that that is the meaning of the order of the Court of Session.

Then it is said that there are two cases which to some extent conflict with the view which I have expressed. The first is In re Maclean's Trusts, to which I have already referred. It is said that in that case the direction to pay to the nominees of the insured was held not to be invalid although it made those persons to some extent trustees for the executors. I have already pointed out that the interest of the executors was so very slight that it cannot be said that there was any material decision upon that point. And I could not accept that decision as an authority upon that point, even if it were not displaced by the later case of In re Phillips' Insurance, because it is clearly inconsistent with the views of all the barons of the Court of Exchequer in Attorney-General v. Rowsell, and I think it is also inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Pocock's Policy. In that case a subscriber to the fund settled the whole of his insurance fund on the marriage of his daughter, and he did so by an instrument which, beyond all question, referred to the fund and was a good exercise of the power of appointment so far as that went. The question was whether the mode in which it was exercised was valid. He executed an instrument in the form prescribed by the rules, by which he directed that the fund should be paid to the two trustees of the settlement, and this document was forwarded to the directors by the daughter's husband; and in reply the secretary wrote to Mr. Pocock advising him "to write to the directors to admit his son-in-law, Mr. W. C. Cobbold, his nominee for the purpose of the marriage settlement." Mr. Pocock, however, took no further steps in the matter, and no admittance of a nominee was made by the directors of the fund. The daughter died some years afterwards intestate, leaving one child. Her father died three years afterwards leaving one son, that son and the deceased daughter being his only children. The husband of the deceased daughter presented a petition for the payment of the fund (which had been paid into court) to the trustees for the purposes of the marriage settlement. The son opposed the petition, and claimed that the fund belonged in equal moieties to himself and the child of his deceased sister. Malins, V.C., held that the trustees must be taken to have been properly nominated, and that as nominees they were entitled to the fund. He held that, the nomination having been communicated to the directors, it was their duty, if they had any objection to the nominees, to state their objection at once, and that, as they did not make any objection, the trustees must be taken to have been duly admitted as nominees. The Vice-Chancellor said: "I totally dissent from the argument that no person can be a nominee except one who is to take beneficially."

I must confess that it seems to me that this view is not only at variance with the decision of the learned barons in The Attorney-General v. Rowsell, but that it was overruled by the Court of Appeal in the very same case. The Vice-Chancellor having directed payment of the fund to the trustees of the settlement, the son of the insured appealed, and the Court of Appeal, though they affirmed the order, did so upon totally different grounds. James, L.J., said: "I am of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor must stand, although not exactly on the same grounds as those on which the Vice-Chancellor has put it. The view which I take of the matter appears to me quite consistent with every word of the Act of Parliament and of the rules of the society." Then he pointed out that (to put it shortly) what the father had done amounted to a settlement in favour of the daughter. The daughter was beyond all question an object of the power. The settlement was made upon her marriage, and although it gave a life interest in remainder to her husband it was a settlement for the benefit of the daughter, and strictly within the powers conferred upon the insured by the rules. That that was the view taken by James, L.J., is clear from his judgment, for he pointed out that, although the husband might not be able to take under the appointment itself, yet the appointment for the benefit of the daughter was good, and the husband would take the fund for his life, as undisposed of by her and as her administrator. Mellish, L.J., took the same view. The grounds of those judgments seem to me entirely inconsistent with the grounds upon which the Vice-Chancellor had decided the case. They affirmed his order because the daughter was the person beneficially entitled. It was not necessary that she should be nominated, and the appointment in her favour was perfectly well effected by nominating the two trustees for her benefit.

Upon the authority of that decision of the Court of Appeal and of Attorney-General v. Rowsell, and having regard to the terms of the order of the Court of Session, I have no difficulty in giving effect to my own view of the true construction of the rules—viz., that the person who is to take beneficially, the person for whose benefit a nomination is made, is the person who must be approved and accepted by the directors, and not a person who is nominated as trustee for third persons who are not objects of the power. If, indeed, the person who is to take beneficially is effectually nominated if he is not a relation of the insured, or is effectually appointed if he is a relation, the appointment in his favour is not prejudiced by the fund being appointed to a trustee for his benefit. It seems to me, therefore, that the persons who ought to have been nominated and approved by the directors were the legatees under the will as the Court of Session intended, and not Mr. Forsyth or Mr. Urquhart. On these two grounds I hold that the nomination made by the Court of Session is of no effect.

But then it is said that, whatever the position of matters might have been but for what took place on the admission of Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Urquhart, the defendant is prevented by what then took place from saying that there was not a good nomination of Forsyth and Urquhart. In my opinion that is not so. From beginning to end the action was taken by Mr. Forsyth at the instance of the persons named as beneficiaries in the will of Mr. Hoyes for the purpose of securing the benefit of the insurance for them. The directors of the fund were willing, if they could, to give effect to that will, but so far from making any representation or any statement by which they are estopped or which casts any obligation upon them, in my view they simply acquiesced in the view which was put before them after a great deal of pressure from Mr. Forsyth. Therefore, the subsequent acts of the directors do not, in my opinion, cure the defect which arises from the fact that there was no proper nomination made before the admission.

But it is said that, even if the insurance money cannot be recovered, yet, at any rate, the premiums ought to be returned, because they have been paid under a mistake. In my opinion I cannot make any order directing the premiums to be returned. The matter was fairly and fully before the advisers of Mr. Forsyth, who took what they thought the best advice upon the subject. They went to the court for authority, and they got it. After it had been pointed out to them that there were difficulties in their way, they, of their own accord, with the sanction of the directors of the fund, took the opinion of the standing counsel to the fund, and they were fully advised as to what their position was. Under these circumstances it appears to me that if they did misunderstand what their position was it was their own fault; at any rate, it was not a fault attributable to the directors of the fund. If there was any mistake at all it was a mistake of law as to what the real position of the parties was, and not a mistake of fact which can give any claim to have the premiums returned. It was suggested that when Forsyth was admitted there was some novation, a new contract by which the directors were bound. In my opinion a new contract was the very last thing the parties were thinking about. They were considering what they could do to give effect to the existing contract and to the will which had already been made. If there had been a new contract it would have made it all the more difficult to support the will which had been previously executed, and to apply it to a fund arising under a contract not made by the testator, but made by his committee long after the execution of the will. Therefore, in my opinion, a novation was the very last thing in the contemplation of the parties, and there is no reference to it from beginning to end, either in the correspondence or in the petition to the Court of Session.

Nor can it, in my opinion, be said that there was any failure of consideration for the premiums paid after the admission of Mr. Forsyth, because, in point of fact, those premiums were doing their work, and they might have had the effect of securing the fund for the benefit of the person who had the power of directing how it should go. Suppose Mr. Hoyes had become of sound mind again and had married, and had died leaving a widow, the widow must, under the rules, have taken a part of the fund. Her interest could not be displaced. The premiums were earning the right to have that interest paid to the widow in case there should happen to be a widow in existence at his death. In the same way there might have been children, and they would have taken an interest in the fund. And if there had been no widow or children, Mr. Hoyes, if he had recovered his senses, might have revoked the will which he had made and have appointed the fund to some other nominee. For these purposes it was considered advisable by the curator, acting on behalf of the lunatic's family, that the premiums should be paid up and the policy kept up, and I cannot say that because none of the events contemplated as possible have, in fact, happened, those payments were made without consideration. It is quite true that, in the result, according to the view which I have taken, the insurer gets nothing by the payment of the premiums; but it is only like any other case in which a man is content to pay money during his lifetime with a view to having, upon a given contingency, a power of dealing with the fund thereby created. If the contingency happens he has the benefit of the payments; if it does not happen the payments are thrown away.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the plaintiff is not entitled to have the premiums repaid.

Some nice questions of domicil were mooted, but after the conclusions at which I have arrived it is not necessary that I should say anything about them. The action, in my opinion, fails altogether; but, having regard to all the circumstances, I dismiss it, without costs.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed; the appeal came on for hearing on November 21, 1887.

Gifford, Q.C., and R. Campbell, for the appellant.—The cases of Attorney-General v. Rowsell, Attorney-General v. Abdy, and In re Phillips' Insurance, which were relied on by the defendant's counsel in argument and by the judge in his judgment in the court below, are not applicable, because in all those cases there was in fact no nominee and no claim by anyone as nominee. In such a case as this, where the insured was not married and could not have any next of kin who would have been entitled in default of any appointment, he was entitled to nominate himself. Here there was a nomination. The instrument by which the nomination was made is not the will of L. R. Hoyes, but the order of the Court of Session. The directors are now estopped from saying that there was not a proper nomination, after having accepted and admitted the curators, Forsyth and Urquhart respectively, as nominees of L. R. Hoyes, and after that acceptance of the nomination has been acted on by the payment of premiums: Caton v. Caton, 14 W. R. 267, L. R. 1 Ch. 137. After the admission made by the defendant's counsel in the court below, we were not bound to produce evidence that the Court of Session in Scotland had jurisdiction to nominate the curator as nominee of L. R. Hoyes. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply to COTTON, L.J.:—"I admitted in the court below—and I stand by that admission now—that the nomination made by the Court of Session is to have the same effect, but no more, as if it were a nomination made by L. R. Hoyes himself (being sane) in his lifetime."]

In re Pocock's Policy, 19 W. R. 901, L. R. 6 Ch. 445, and In re Maclean's Trusts, L. R. 19 Eq. 274, were also referred to.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the respondent.—The effect of the nomination is only to include the nominee, when admitted as such by the directors, among the class of persons among whom the subscriber may appoint, but neither the nomination nor the admittance, taken either separately or together, constitute a disposition of the fund in favour of the nominee. Again, it would not have been competent for L. R. Hoyes to nominate a person to take, not beneficially, but as trustee for others (In re Phillips' Insurance), and therefore it was not competent for the Court of Session to do so. There was consideration for the payment of the premiums by the curator as the policies were thereby kept up, and that was for the benefit of the lunatic. If the premiums were paid by the curator under a mistake, which we do not admit, it was a mistake of law, not of fact.

Gifford replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of North, J. [The Lord Justice then stated generally the subject-matter of the action and the representative character in which the plaintiff sued and in which the defendant was sued, and continued:—] The question is whether the plaintiff under the nominee clauses is not entitled to a claim on the fund in question. [The Lord Justice then referred to the Act under which the fund was formed—43 Geo. 3, c. 73—and read sections 9 and 16 of the Act, and also rule 23 of the Rules of the Directors in force in 1827, and continued:—] Now what was the interest of L. R. Hoyes in this fund? It was contended by the appellant that L. R. Hoyes had, subject to the power of appointment and direction given by the rules and the Act, an interest in this fund as his estate, and that therefore it went to him if it were not disposed of in accordance with the rules. I cannot accede to that. It is very true that the fund was composed of deductions made from time to time, under the Act and rules, from his salary, but the Act and rules do not give the appellant here a right to say that it was the property of L. R. Hoyes. The rules provide that if there is no appointment to or amongst the widow, children, or relatives of the insured, and if no nominee has been admitted, then the fund is to be disposed of having regard to the claims of the widow, and if she has no claim is to go to the children, and if there are no widow or children is to go to the next of kin of the insured, according to the Statute of Distributions. In my opinion—and it is supported by the cases which were referred to—we ought not to consider this fund—principally arising from contributions by the insured himself and other persons in a similar position—as the property of the insured, but that he merely had a right to dispose of it in certain particular ways.

L. R. Hoyes unfortunately became of unsound mind, and, being in Scotland at the time, the Court of Session declared him to be a person of unsound mind and appointed a curator. The question then arose as to the position of L. R. Hoyes in regard to this fund. He had subscribed for some years, and either he would have to go on subscribing or would forfeit the benefit to be obtained from the subscriptions he had already made. He had not, at the time he became of unsound mind, submitted to the directors any nominee whom he desired should be admitted, for it was not sufficient for the insured merely to submit a nominee to the directors, but it was necessary that the directors should also admit the person nominated.

A will of L. R. Hoyes', which has since been proved, was found among his papers at the time he became of unsound mind. A correspondence took place between the curator and the persons named in the will and the directors, and attempts were made to get either the curator or the legatees admitted as nominees of L. R. Hoyes. The directors said—and I think reasonably—"We cannot do this; the will was not a will in any way referring to the fund, and we shall not admit either the legatees or the curator unless we get some direction from a competent court to do so." A petition was accordingly presented to the Court of Session having jurisdiction. [The Lord Justice then referred in detail to this petition, and continued:—] On the 13th of July, 1841, an order was made on this petition. [The Lord Justice here read the order, and continued:—] After some considerable correspondence, the directors not only received this nomination, but they admitted the nominee to be appointed as nominee of L. R. Hoyes. Counsel on behalf of the defendant, the present respondent, very fairly admitted, both here and in the court below, that that nomination is to have the same effect—that is all they admit—as if it had been made by L. R. Hoyes himself.

Now what has been done by North, J.? Notwithstanding that perfectly plain admission, he—in my opinion erroneously—went into the consideration of the question whether the Court of Session had power to make any nomination. The powers of the Court of Session are to be decided in this court as matters of fact on evidence. But when the defendant's counsel has admitted that the order made by the Court of Session has the same effect as a nomination made by L. R. Hoyes himself, that admission ought to be accepted as sufficient evidence of the fact that the Court of Session had the power, and, therefore, I think it is wrong to go into that question. But that does not settle the question, because I think that Mr. Cozens-Hardy is quite right in saying the order only has the same effect as if it were a nomination by L. R. Hoyes himself.

What is the effect of that? The admission by the directors follows the exact words of the order made on the petition. The first objection raised is that even if it had been a nomination made by L. R. Hoyes himself it would be a bad nomination, because, under the rules, the nominee is to be a person who is to take for his own benefit. In a qualified sense I do not think it can be said—though it is not necessary to decide this point—that the nomination must necessarily say that the money is to go into the pocket of the nominee. But I think it was necessary when any nomination was submitted to the directors that they should know for what purposes the nomination was made, and that they should be told who was really to receive and have the money. Here, although it may be said that the curator is a nominee, there is a distinct statement that he is to be a nominee for behoof of the legatees named in the will of L. R. Hoyes. If it be necessary that the nominee, under the rules and Act, should be a person to put the money in his own pocket, then I think the remarks of James, L.J., in Ex parte Pocock dispose of that when he says "If that be so, then this must be taken as a nomination in favour of the legatees named in the will."

Although I do not say that this was a regular nomination—an ordinary nomination—we have persons who were to take the money into their pockets submitted to the directors, and the directors approved of that by admitting the curator as on behalf of the legatees named in the will.

It is said that there has been no sufficient appointment. Now what was done here? The insured being incompetent at the time to make any nomination, and his will not being of itself a sufficient appointment of the fund, the directors take the order referred to, accompanied as it was with the will, as a sufficient nomination for the purpose of enabling the fund to be distributed among the legatees so as to supplement and make good their legacies, and the directors take the order and the will as sufficient instruments to point out to them how the fund was to be applied for the nominees—one may say either the legatees or the curator on their behalf. For many years the directors went on acting on that belief. They have now been advised they cannot properly act on that nomination. I think that is erroneous.

In my opinion therefore the decision of North, J., is erroneous; and although the nomination and direction as to enjoyment was not such as could have been forced upon the directors, yet as they have accepted it and raised no objection on the ground of irregularity, the mere irregularity (if there was any) of treating this as a nomination made by the insured himself does not justify them in resisting entirely the claim of the plaintiff in this action by saying there is no nominee nor sufficient direction as to how the fund is to be applied for the benefit of the nominee.

But then there is this. In my opinion it is only a nomination in favour of the legatees to the extent of the benefits which they are to take under the will, and it cannot be contended by the curator that he is entitled to take it without reference as to how far that sum of money is required for the purposes of the will. The legatees cannot by that nomination get an increase of their legacies. It may be that the legatees have been already paid out of the estate. In that case they will get nothing from the nomination and direction, because it is a direction to pay to the curator for the purpose of making good—the Scotch term would be, I think, implementing—the directions contained in the will. Here the residuary legatee, who, if he were alive would of course sweep off everything, died in the lifetime of the testator.

Then comes this question. If L. R. Hoyes, the testator, was domiciled in Scotland that would not make a lapse, because the heir of the residuary legatee would be put as legatee in place of the residuary legatee. But I understand there is a question about the domicile of L. R. Hoyes which has not yet been decided, and therefore if the directors require it there may be an inquiry on that point in order to enable us to see how far this plaintiff can, in the events which have happened, claim this fund or any part of it.

HANNEN, P.—I am of the same opinion. Before giving my reasons I will call attention to the fact that these transactions, the validity of which is now questioned, took place in 1841. The directors knew all the circumstances of the case, they saw the opinions given by eminent counsel, they themselves required and obtained the protection of a decision of a competent court, and the course recommended by counsel was deliberately adopted by the directors and has ever since been acted upon by the payment of large sums annually out of the estate of the insured.

Now in these circumstances I think the court ought not to be too astute in discovering reasons why this transaction should be defeated. On the contrary, if any reasonable construction can be put upon it by which it can be maintained, it is the duty of the court to adopt that construction. I think there is such a reasonable construction. [The President here referred to and read section 9 of the Act and rule 23 of the Rules of 1827, and continued:—] It is to be observed that rule 23 only shows that the insured is to direct by "deed or instrument," any form of instrument is therefore sufficient. No formalities are prescribed, and if there is anything which fulfils the description of an instrument by which the insured has conveyed his direction to the directors as to the nominee whom he desires to be admitted, and they accept him, the terms of the rule have been fulfilled. Now, the insured having become insane, it was undoubtedly impossible for him personally to put in force the powers given him by the Act and Rules, and in these circumstances an application was made to the Court of Session in Scotland to give that direction which should be a protection to the directors in any disposition of the fund. An admission was made in the course of the case that the order of the Court of Session should be deemed as effectual as if it were made by the subscriber himself, being sane, in his lifetime. North, J., considered that he was not bound by that admission. I think that that is incorrect. Questions of Scotch law are dealt with in English courts as matters of fact over which counsel have control—that is, in the sense of being entitled to dispense with proof of them, by admission. It appears to me, therefore, that the effect of that admission is that we must deal with the case precisely as though the substance of that order had been communicated to the directors by the insured himself. Now what would be the effect of that? It would have been a distinct intimation to the directors that he desired the person named to be admitted as his nominee, and not only that, but that he desired it to be for the benefit of the persons mentioned in the will.

Reserving for the moment the question whether or not any person could be appointed nominee, not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of anyone else, is it not clear that that would have been effectual? Upon this point we do not differ from the opinion expressed by North, J. [The President here referred to the remarks of North, J., on that point, and continued:—] Then there only remains the question of whether or not a nominee must be a person taking solely in his own interest. In my opinion that is not the meaning of the language used in the rules. I agree that the directors must have the full opportunity of exercising their discretion whether they will admit the nominee or not, but if they know all the circumstances, if they see that the purpose for which the nominee is intended to be introduced is one of which they approve, then we are entitled and bound to couple the interests of the persons who are the ultimate objects of the bounty of the insured together with the individual who is named in their behalf; and that seems to me to be the view which the Court of Session took, and it makes clear the meaning of the language used in the order—viz., that Forsyth be appointed a "nominee of L. R. Hoyes for behoof of the legatees under that gentleman's will appended to this petition, and that the petitioner communicate the said appointment to the directors for their acceptance as parties interested in the fund in the terms of the statute and regulations," by which it is meant that the admission of Forsyth as nominee for these legatees would make—and the directors are requested on that footing to admit—these persons as parties interested in the fund in the terms of the statute and regulations. The directors have not altered the form; they have admitted Forsyth in the terms of the order. It seems to me, therefore, that the directors intended, as the Court of Session intended, that the nominee for behoof of the legatees and the legatees were to be treated as the nominee of the insured to take the interest which the insured himself had power of disposing of. Several cases have been referred to, but there is only one case—In re Maclean's Trusts—in which the question has really arisen. There the late Master of the Rolls held that a nominee could take as trustee for others. The only adverse comment on that decision was that in that case there was very little to deal with; but Sir George Jessel was not a judge to decide a case contrary to what he thought was the law because the amount in dispute was small. That is the only case in point, because in the other cases no nominee had been admitted by the directors.

For these reasons it appears to me the decision of North, J., cannot be maintained.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

COTTON, L.J.—Our judgment, therefore, is that the plaintiff is entitled to receive this fund, but only for the purpose of performing and giving effect to the purposes expressed in the testator's will.

Gifford, Q.C.—The pecuniary legacies have been paid, I understand. The only question remaining is as to the right of the residuary legatee to receive this fund.

COTTON, L.J.—If the will is to be governed by Scotch law, there is a residuary legatee; if by English law, there is no residuary legatee. That raises the question of domicile. [Some discussion followed as to what took place in the court below with reference to the question of domicile.] The appeal must stand over to be argued before us on the question of domicile.*

* On Dec. 9, after having had the question of domicile argued, the court gave judgment on that question, and held that on the facts, as shown by the evidence, the testator, L. R. Hoyes, had not acquired a Scotch domicile, and therefore that, though the nomination and admission were in themselves effectual, they became inoperative because the fund was not wanted for the purpose to which it was to be applied in accordance with the nomination—viz., "the behoof of the legatees." The appeal, therefore, was dismissed, but without costs.

Trust—Declaration of trust in voluntary settlement—Trust to arise after death of settlor—Rents to be accumulated to pay off mortgages—Mortgagees constituted cestui que trusts.

A settlor, by a voluntary settlement of real estate (which was subject to mortgages), created a trust term, to arise after his decease, for the accumulation of a fixed sum out of the rents each year during a period of twenty-one years, to pay off, either at the end of that period or from time to time during its continuance, as the trustees of the term should think fit, such mortgages as should then be charged on the estate; and the settlor then limited the estate by way of remainder expectant on the trust term in strict settlement, the person for the time being entitled to the immediate reversion to be paid the surplus rents.

Some years after the death of the settlor, a tenant in tail in possession under the settlement barred the entail, and applied to the court for a declaration that he, as owner of the estate, was entitled to receive the accumulations and to put an end to the trusts of the term. Mortgages to a considerable amount were still outstanding.

Held, that, as, under the deed of settlement, the trust term did not arise until after the death of the settlor, the deed was not a mere arrangement for vesting the property in trustees as agents for the settlor, but constituted a trust in favour of the mortgagees; and that, as the mortgagees, though not parties to, and not named in, the deed, were capable of being ascertained, they were entitled, as cestui que trusts, to insist on and enforce the execution of the trust for accumulation against the applicant or any owner of the estate until they were paid off.

Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & My. 451, distinguished.

Per Cotton, L.J.—Even if the mortgagees were not cestui que trusts, no person other than the settlor claiming under the deed of settlement would have any equity to set aside the provisions in the deed relating to accumulation.

Order of North, J., varied.

Appeal from North, J.

John P. Fitzgerald in 1866 executed a voluntary settlement whereby certain estates of which he was then owner in fee, subject to certain mortgages, were limited, subject to the mortgages then affecting the same, to the use of the settlor for life, with remainder to the use of trustees for a term of 500 years from the death of the settlor, with remainder to the use of the eldest son of the settlor for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of such eldest son successively in tail male, with remainder to the use of the second son of the settlor for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of such second son successively in tail male.

The trusts declared of the term of 500 years were that the trustees should, after the death of the settlor, and thenceforth during a period of twenty-one years, raise each year out of the rents and profits the annual sum of £1,000, and accumulate the same and the income thereof during the twenty-one years, and on the expiration of that period, or from time to time during its continuance, as they might think fit, should apply the annual sum of £1,000, and the accumulations thereof, "towards the satisfaction and discharge of all such mortgages . . . as should then be charged upon the hereditaments or any part of the same." The trustees were also to permit the person or persons for the time being entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the term to receive the surplus of the rents and profits.

The settlor died on May, 4, 1879. The eldest son of the settlor died a bachelor on June 8, 1879, and on his death Gerald P. Fitzgerald, the eldest son of the settlor's second son (who predeceased the settlor), became tenant in tail in possession under the settlement, and he, after attaining twenty-one, executed on June 2, 1886, a disentailing deed, by which he limited the estates to the use of himself in fee simple, subject to the mortgages affecting the same, but freed (as expressed in the disentailing deed) from the trusts of the term of 500 years.

The trustees had accumulated a considerable sum of money, and mortgages amounting to £60,000 were still outstanding.

Gerald P. Fitzgerald in 1887 took out a summons that the trustees of the term of 500 years might be directed to abstain from accumulating the yearly sum of £1,000, and should transfer the sum already accumulated to the applicant.

The summons was served on the trustees of the term and the mortgagees.

North, J., on the hearing of the summons, declared that the mortgagees were in the position of cestui que trusts, and that the trustees held the accumulations for the benefit of the mortgagees; that the sum already accumulated was applicable to the payment off of the mortgages, and that the trustees would not be justified in paying it to the applicant, but that it should be offered to the mortgagees successively, and in case of refusal by any of the mortgagees to accept it in reduction of their mortgages, it should be applied by the trustees in payment off of any mortgage or accumulated under the trusts of the term as the trustees might think best. The judge also expressed an opinion that the trustees were bound to raise the annual sum of £1,000 during the remainder of the twenty-one years, and to offer it to the mortgagees successively, and that, if they should refuse to take it in reduction of their mortgages, the trustees might pay any sum of £1,000 so raised to the applicant.

The applicant, Gerald P. Fitzgerald, appealed.

Cookson, Q.C., and Blakesley, for the appellant, and also for the executors of the settlor.—The mortgagees are not cestui que trusts of the term. The trusts declared were for the convenience and benefit of the inheritance, and in the events that have happened the appellant is entitled to the benefit of the trusts declared. No bargain was made by the mortgagees with the settlor as to the creation of any trust in their favour. The deed, therefore, at most, is like an agency deed which can be revoked: Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & My. 451. If the directions as to accumulation amount to a trust there must be a cestui que trust, and we say the appellant, not the mortgagees, is the cestui que trust: Pearson v. Lane, 17 Ves. 101; Synnot v. Simpson, 5 H. L. Cas. 121, 4 W. R. H. L. Dig. 243. Mere communication of the benefits conferred by the deed to creditors cannot make them cestui que trusts if they were not so before: Mackinnon v. Stewart, 1 Sim. N. S. 76; Aston v. Woodgate, 2 My. & K. 492; Hughes v. Stubbs, 1 Ha. 476; Johns v. James, 26 W. R. 821, 8 Ch. D. 744. North, J., had admitted the claim of the appellant as a cestui que trust by ordering the future rents to be paid him if the mortgagees would not receive them.

G. T. Borrett, for the respondents, was not called on.

Kenyon Parker, for the trustees of the term.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of North, J., who declined to authorize the trustees of a settlement executed in 1866 to cease to accumulate as directed by the settlement. [The Lord Justice here stated the facts of the case shortly, and continued:—] At the time when the trusts of the term for 500 years, which was to accumulate for the period of twenty-one years after the death of the settlor, arose there were successive tenants for life, and it is not disputed that during those successive tenancies for life there was a trust which could not be interfered with. But it is said that the sum which was in the hands of the trustees, invested by them pursuant to the directions contained in the settlement, during the successive lives of the tenants for life, is to be handed over to the present owner of the estate, and that the trustees are no longer, as directed by the settlement, to receive £1,000 a year and apply that in payment off of the mortgages, or, if the mortgagees will not take it, from time to time to accumulate it.

One point in the judgment of North, J., I cannot agree with, because he has stated that the trustees are in futuro to raise the £1,000, to offer it to the mortgagees successively, and if none of the mortgagees will take it, then they are to be at liberty to pay it over to the present applicant. I do not understand that. It is said that although he has upheld the trusts of the term for applying the money for the benefit of the mortgagees, he thinks in future it would be right and reasonable for the trustees to hand over what the mortgagees will not take to the owner of the estate, on the ground that if he does not get it he could raise a similar sum by mortgage. No doubt he might do so; but he would raise it subject to all the existing mortgages; and if the trust is for the benefit of the mortgagees I do not see why they are to be deprived of the benefit of the trust simply because the owner of the estate will be able to raise a similar sum by mortgage of the estates—that is, by adding mortgagees who are not within the trust.

Is it, then, right, that the trust should be considered as liable to be put a stop to by the owner of the estate? I think not. Even if we were to hold that the mortgagees are not to be considered in this case cestui que trusts, I should feel very great difficulty in authorising trustees to disregard their trusts, which are clearly declared by the settlement, at the instance, not of the settlor, but at the instance of a person who claims from the bounty of the settlor just as much as those trusts which are declared as regards the 500 years term originate in the bounty of the settlor. Even if the mortgagees were not cestui que trusts, I should myself feel it wrong as a judge of this court to direct, at the instance of a person claiming under the settlement, that the trustees appointed by that settlement should disregard what is imposed on them as a duty by the settlor in furtherance of the provisions of the settlement. But I do not decide the case on that ground, although that is my opinion.

But are the mortgagees here to be considered as cestui que trusts? North, J., thought they were; and though at first I thought it would be unnecessary for us to decide that point on the ground I have just stated, yet it has been argued very fully and very ably, and I think we ought to decide the question. It is said that the owner of an estate is entitled to say, "Hand over this to me, which can be for nobody else's benefit except mine, who am now the owner of the estate." If I were the owner of the mortgages—that is, if he had paid off the mortgages and got those vested in himself he might very well say that. He might say, "I have the mortgages and the estate, and as I am entitled to both I do not desire to have a portion of the rents, which I should motive but for this trust, applied in payment of mortgages which are now vested in me." That is not the state of things. There are mortgages to the extent of £80,000 still remaining outstanding. He takes the estate by limitation, in obedience to the settlor, subject to this term. Is there a trust in favour of anybody else? It could not be denied that during the lifetime of the tenants for life there was a good trust. The appellant would say that it was a trust for his benefit ultimately; but, in my opinion, it would not only be that, though that was probably one of the objects of the settlor, but a trust also for the benefit of the mortgagees, so that they should not be put into the position of being obliged to become mortgagees in possession, which everyone knows is a most inconvenient and perilous position. In my opinion there is a declaration in this settlement that one of the objects of the settlor's bounty is that a provision should from time to time be made out of the rents to pay off, as far as it would pay, the mortgages on the estate without putting the mortgagees to the necessity of enforcing their rights by foreclosure or sale, or by becoming mortgagees in possession of the estate. We must observe that this trust is not a provision to take effect during the lifetime of the settlor as to how his property is to be dealt with during his lifetime, but a direction as to what is to be done with the estate after his death; and we find in it a benefit for the mortgagees just as much as a benefit for the tenants for life, and just as much as a benefit for the ultimate remainderman, which the appellant now is.

Lord Cranworth, in the case of Synnot v. Simpson, does intimate a doubt whether the doctrine of Gaverard v. Lord Lauderdale, that there are no cestuis que trust, because those who have the property vested in them may be looked on as agents for the settlor, will apply whereo trusts are to take effect only after the death of the settlor. In such a case it appears, from the mere fact that it is a direction to take effect when he is not able t recall the direction, that it is not intended that the trustees who have the estate should be mere agents; it is not intended that they should have no duty or trust for anyone else; because the trusts are to take effect when he is dead and is no longer able to call on the trustees to reconvey the property to him. I think this case is a good illustration of the doctrine, because here the trusts of the term are entirely to arise after his death. What does that show? It shows that he is intending a benefit in the first instance by way of accumulation of £1,000 a year for the benefit of all it could benefit—for the ultimate remainderman, so long as the estate is only in reversion, and also, both after and before the estate came into possession of the remainderman, for the benefit of the mortgagees.

In my opinion, therefore, we ought to say that these mortgagees are persons constituted by this settlement objects of the settlor's bounty; and if that is so they are to be considered as cestuis que trust under this deed. It is very true they are not named, but they are persons who can be ascertained, and, as that is so, no difficulty arises from the fact that they are a number of persons not named in the deed. Their position is indicated, so that when it becomes necessary to determine who are cestuis que trust they can be ascertained. If they are cestuis que trust then they would be entitled, if their trust was attacked, to insist on it and enforce it just as much as any other cestuis que trust.

In my opinion the decision of North, J., was right, subject to this qualification, that we ought to alter the latter part of the order and direct the trustees, if none of the mortgagees will receive the £1,000 a year, to invest it and accumulate it according to the trusts of the term of 500 years.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [The Lord Justice, after referring to the facts of the case, continued:—] The present appellant has become entitled to the property, subject to the trusts of this term. He says the trusts of that term are trusts which are entirely for his benefit, and he wants them discharged. He says, "I do not want this accumulation to go on any longer; I want the £1,000; I will take care of the mortgages." Now, if it were true that he is the only cestui que trust, there would be some difficulty in saying that his position was not a tenable one. But to say that he is the only person interested in the trusts of the term begs the whole question. It appears to me that this is not like the case of Gaverard v. Lord Lauderdale, because these trusts are to commence only when the settlor is dead. The true view to take is that the cestuis que trust (I do not say the sole ones) are the mortgagees, and that they are really cestuis que trust, and entitled to the benefit of the trust. If the appellant could obtain the concurrence of the mortgagees, or could obtain a release by the mortgagees of their interest in this term, then, having got the consent of the representatives of the settlor and his own, he would be, as we are asked to say he is now, the only person interested in the matter. But the mortgages are outstanding, and, if the mortgagees desire to have the benefit of this term, they are entitled to it.

I confess I do not follow the view of North, J., when he made it a part of his order that the £1,000 might be paid to Mr. Fitzgerald if the mortgagees did not care to have it. I agree with Cotton, L.J., in the observations he made on that subject, and it appears to me the proper order to make is that the trusts must be carried out, and that part of the order of North, J., must be varied.

LOPES, L.J.—It is admitted in this case that if the mortgagees are cestuis que trust, the appellant fails. Now if the settlor intended to benefit the mortgagees, if he intended them to be the objects of his bounty, it is also admitted that they would be cestuis que trust. This case, therefore, depends entirely on what the true construction of this provision is. I think that what the settlor intended was not only to benefit the estate—although that probably may have been one of his main objects—I think he also intended to benefit the mortgagees, and I think if the effect of that provision is considered, it is pretty clear that must be so. What does he do by that provision? He provides that at the end of twenty-one years there shall exist a fund out of which these mortgage debts, or at any rate a considerable portion of these mortgage debts, should be paid. In point of fact he provides an additional security out of which these mortgage debts are to be paid. It seems, therefore, impossible to say that he did not intend to benefit, and did not benefit, the mortgagees. It is perfectly clear that he intended to, and did.

North, J., by his order, seems to have thought that if the mortgagees did not care to have this £1,000, which was to be raised out of the rents, it might then be applied to the purposes of the appellant. I venture to think he was wrong in that view. It seems clear that that sum could not be applied or handed over to the appellant, but that it must be accumulated according to the terms of the provisions of the deed. I think the appellant is not entitled to have this provision set aside, and that it ought to stand.

Examination of witness—Refusal to answer—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 27—Practice—Appeal.

A witness who, on being examined under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is held by the registrar to be justified in refusing to answer questions put to him, cannot be made a respondent to an appeal by the trustee against such ruling of the registrar.

The answers of a witness examined under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, must in the end be accepted by the trustee, but he is not bound to accept the first answer, and may cross-examine the witness thereon.

In re Purvis, Ex parte Rooke, 56 L. T. N. S. 579, 35 W. R. Dig. 18, explained.

Appeal by the trustee from a refusal by Mr. Registrar Linklater to order F. T. Eggers, a witness, to submit himself for examination as to dealings with the property of the bankrupt under section 27 of the Bankruptcy, 1883.

The witness had answered questions relating to certain property belonging solely to the bankrupt, but had refused to answer other questions relating to property, which (as he alleged) was the property of the firm of Scharrer, Tiede, & Co., trading in Africa, of which firm the bankrupt was a partner. The witness had been made a respondent to the appeal, and the court raised the point that the appeal was, therefore, wrong in form.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Yelverton, for the trustee.—The witness first refused to answer, and his refusal was supported by the registrar. The witness is properly made a respondent, if there need be one; and, if not, the court can treat this motion as an ex parte application. The registrar cannot be made respondent: Ex parte Izard, In re Moir, 30 W. R. 861, 20 Ch. D. 703. The registrar discharged the witness from further attendance, because he felt himself bound by Ex parte Rooke, In re Purvis, 56 L. T. N. S. 579, 35 W. R. Dig. 18, to hold that the trustee must accept a witness's answer as correct at once, and cannot cross-examine him under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The object of that section is to enable the trustee to force information out of an unwilling witness, and therefore In re Purvis cannot be supported. The witness cannot escape from answering by merely alleging that the property in question is not the property of the bankrupt.

They also cited Ex parte Reynolds, 30 W. R. 651, 20 Ch. D. 294.

The witness in person was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It is impossible that this appeal, in its present form, should succeed, because it asks for an order against the witness that he should answer certain questions. The next step in procedure would be to ask for an attachment against him. But the registrar, on his refusal to answer certain questions, declined to order him to answer; there was no final refusal by the witness, and he ought, therefore, not to have been made a respondent here. It is said, however, that we ought to make an order that the registrar should have allowed the questions to be put. Such an order cannot be made against the respondent to this appeal, and the appeal must be dismissed.

It is said that a difficulty was created by In re Purvis, and it is suggested that Cave, J., in that case held that the registrar, in the examination of a witness under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was bound to accept the first answer of the witness, and could not allow any further questions to be put with a view of contradicting that answer; that consequently a witness could not be crossed examined as to his credit, and there could be no testing of the witness to see whether he would stand by his answer. Since the commencement of this argument I have spoken to Cave, J., and he says he is astounded at the supposition that such was the effect of his judgment. He meant that in the end of examination the answers of the witness must be accepted. This explanation gets rid of the difficulties presented by the case of In re Purvis. As to the proper construction to be put upon section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, we have received no assistance from counsel on the other side. It is not necessary for us to put any construction upon that section, and it is, therefore, better that we should not do so. The appeal will be dismissed, without prejudice to any application to the registrar for the further examination of the witness.

FRY, L.J.—This is an application made under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, under which the court has power to examine a witness concerning the debtor, his dealings or property. The power to examine is vested in the court, and the witness is, therefore, not in the position of an ordinary witness called by litigants, but is the witness of the court. The practice is, no doubt, for the court to allow the trustee to put the questions. No doubt the power of examination under this section is not a mere formal one; it is a power to examine usefully and fruitfully. And the examination may, perhaps, go as far as the tribunal before whom it is conducted may think necessary. In this case the registrar refused to put the questions, and the witness, therefore, only obeyed the instructions of the court in not answering, and this application is that the witness may be ordered to state facts in answer to questions which the court has not allowed to be asked. It is said that we can make an order on the registrar, but I decline to depart from the terms of the application. This is, therefore, an improper application, and, without fettering the registrar's discretion on any reconsideration of the matter, we dismiss the appeal, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I could not agree with In re Purvis as reported, but I do agree with it as explained by Cave, J. I should be sorry to see a too limited construction put upon section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. If the registrar was in any way fettered in the exercise of his discretion by In re Purvis, our decision relieves him from that difficulty.

Appeal dismissed.

Tennent v. Welch. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Husband and wife—Real estate of wife—Conveyance by husband and wife—Acknowledgment by wife—Ownership of purchase-money—Chose in action—Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 77, 79, 80, 89—Common Pleas Rules of Hilary Term, 1834.

At the date of her marriage the wife was owner in fee of real estate; no settlement was executed, and the property was shortly afterwards sold by the husband and wife for £23,500, the latter acknowledging the conveyance after examination by the commissioners in the usual way. The husband received £18,000 of the purchase-money and applied it for his own purposes, and £5,500 was invested to meet an annuity, the trusts of the residue thereof being declared, by a deed of even date with the conveyance, to be in favour of the husband and wife respectively, according to their interests by law for the time being. The husband died in 1884, but the annuitant was alive, so that the £5,500 was still outstanding.

Held, that the Common Pleas rules for the examination of married women were not ultrà vires, and that the effect of the examination of the wife and her acknowledgment of the conveyance was that she thereby gave up all her interest in the property and in the purchase-money, without having any provision made for her in return; that the whole purchase-money, therefore, became the absolute property of the husband; that no part of the £5,500 ever belonged to the wife, so that it never was her chose in action, and the doctrine of reduction into possession did not apply; that the declaration of trust did not alter the rights of the parties; and that the wife was not entitled to any interest in the £5,500.

Special case.

This was a case stated by the Scotch court under the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 63 for the opinion of the English court upon certain points of law affecting the devolution of the proceeds of sale of real estate in England, and the chief question was as to the effect, upon a sale by husband and wife, of an acknowledgment by her of the deed of conveyance under the Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, c. 74.

In 1876 the pursuer, Mrs. Tennent (then Mrs. Vidler), was entitled in fee simple to an estate in Shropshire called Overton, and negotiations were commenced for a sale of the estate by her to Lord Boyne.

On the 24th of March, 1877, she married a Scotch solicitor of the name of Welch, and he thereupon assumed the name of Tennent. No settlement was executed between Mr. and Mrs. Tennent. There were no children of the marriage, and in 1881 they separated.

Negotiations for the sale of Overton were continued, and on the 24th of July, 1877, a conveyance thereof was executed by the husband and wife, after it had been duly acknowledged by the latter before two commissioners. They certified that she was of full age and competent understanding, and had been examined by them apart from her husband and freely consented to the deed, and they further stated in an affidavit that they asked her whether she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in its place, and that she replied in the affirmative.

The purchase-money was £23,500, of which the husband received £18,000, and £5,500 was invested to meet an annuity charged on the estate. A declaration of trust of the £5,500 was executed whereby the residue of the fund was to be held in trust for the husband and wife, their executors, administrators, and assigns, according to their rights and interests therein as by law from time to time for the time being determined or regulated.

The Scotch action was begun in 1883 by Mrs. Tennent against her husband, claiming repayment of the £18,000, and a declaration that she was entitled to the £5,500 on failure of the annuity.

The husband died on the 8th of October, 1884, and the action was continued against his executors and general disponee. The annuitant was still living.

The Scotch court referred the following questions for the decision of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice.

1. Whether, at the date of the marriage, there was a valid contract for the sale of Overton?

2. Whether such contract operated as a conversion of the estate into personalty?

3. Whether such contract was a chose in action?

(In the event of the court holding that there was no contract)

4. What, after their marriage, were the respective rights and interests of the pursuer and the original defender, as the husband of the pursuer by the law of England in the estate of Overton; and were these rights or interests, or either of them, saleable by them or either of them, and on what conditions?

5. On the conveyance of the estate, what were the original defender's right and interest by the law of England in the price thereof; and did such right and interest in the price pass to the original defender by the said conveyance or by his jus mariti?

6. Whether, under the trusts of the declaration of trust, the pursuer is entitled absolutely to the said sum of £5,500, she having survived her husband, or whether she is otherwise entitled to it as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband during his coverture.

The defender's case was opened first, as the onus was upon him to establish the contract and conversion.

Rigby, Q.C., and C. B. MacLaren, for the defender (after arguing that there was a contract for sale at the date of the marriage).—The effect of the examination of Mrs. Tennent by the commissioners, and of her acknowledgment of the deed of conveyance, was to preclude her from claiming any settlement or provision out of the fund: Fines and Recoveries Act, 1833, s. 77; Common Pleas Rules, 1834; Shelford's Real Property Statutes, p. 400. Therefore the purchase-money belonged to her husband, and the £5,500 was not her chose in action. It never formed part of her personal estate. There is nothing unreasonable in her agreeing to this, as the ownership of Overton was changed at the marriage, and her husband's life estate was probably worth more than her reversion.

Marten, Q.C., and Hirst.—The acknowledgment only protected the purchaser; it did not prejudice the wife's rights as against the husband. The Common Pleas Rules are ultrà vires: sections 80, 89. At all events she was entitled to a settlement out of such part of the purchase-money as represented her reversion. The £5,500 was her chose in action, and was not reduced into possession by the husband, and so it is now hers by survivorship.

Rigby, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—Kay, J., held that there was no completed contract at the time of the marriage, and continued:—Assuming that no valid and binding contract for the sale of Overton had been entered into before the marriage, there was no such contract until the conveyance was executed; and the next question is, What was the effect of that conveyance? By section 77 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, Mrs. Tennent was enabled by deed to dispose of the Overton estate as fully and effectually as she could do if she were a feme sole, "save and except that no such disposition . . . shall be valid and effectual unless the husband concur in the deed by which the same shall be effected, nor unless the deed be acknowledged by her as hereinafter directed." By section 79 the deed, upon her executing the same, or afterwards, is to be "produced and acknowledged by her as her act and deed" before a judge, master in Chancery, or commissioners, who, before they receive such acknowledgment, are to "examine her apart from her husband touching her knowledge of such deed, and shall ascertain whether she freely and voluntarily consents to such deed"; otherwise they are not to permit the acknowledgment, and the deed, as to her execution, is void. Section 84 gives forms of a memorandum and certificate of acknowledgment, and section 89 provides that the Court of Common Pleas shall make orders and regulations touching the mode of examination by commissioners, and so on. Rules were made, the 3rd of which provides that the commissioners shall inquire of every married woman, separately from her husband and from the solicitors concerned in the transaction, whether she intends to give up her interest in the estate to be passed by such deed without having any provision made for her in lieu of, or in return for, or in consequence of her so giving up such interest, and where such married woman, in answer to such inquiry, shall declare that she intends to give up such her interest without any provision, and the commissioners shall have no reason to doubt the truth of such declaration, and shall verily believe the same to be true, then they shall proceed to receive the acknowledgment; but if it appears to them that it is intended that a provision is to be made for the married woman, they are not to take the acknowledgment until the provision has been actually made or the terms of it reduced into writing, which they are to verify by their signatures.

In this case all those ceremonies seem to have been strictly observed, and Mrs. Tennent did not require any provision. The effect of the conveyance was to convert the estate into personalty upon the execution of the deed. Supposing the parties to have been domiciled in England, it would follow from the mere fact of such conversion that the husband by his marital right would become entitled at once to whatever interest the wife might have in such personal property. But after making such acknowledgment and declining any provision out of the purchase-money or otherwise, it is difficult to see how the wife could have any possible interest in such purchase-money. The land could not have been converted into money, even as to the wife's interest in it, without the concurrence of the husband in the deed, not merely because he had an estate in the property in his marital right, but because the statute expressly makes his concurrence an essential requisite to any disposition by the wife. The husband might have conveyed away the life estate which he acquired by marriage in the wife's land without her joining or consenting; Co. Litt., 326a (n); Robertson v. Norris, 11 Q. B. 916. But the wife is in a different position. She could not convey or bind in any way such interest as she had in the property unless the husband concurred in the deed. Consequently, when the sale by husband and wife of the wife's land has taken place, if it is competent to inquire on what condition the husband gave his concurrence, it seems impossible, where the wife has refused any provision on her separate examination, to come to any other conclusion than that the purchase-money was to belong altogether to the husband, and that the wife was not to have any interest in it either at law or in equity. If she could afterwards assert a right to any interest in it, her refusal of a provision would be altogether nugatory.

The statute and the rules obviously intend to put her in the position that she may decline to execute the deed, and the commissioners may prevent her execution or may refuse to receive the acknowledgment which alone could make her execution valid if a provision is not made for her in case she desires it. As to any purchase-money actually received by the husband, it is impossible, after declining any provision, that she could assert any claim against this, but it has been argued that the same considerations do not apply to the £5,500 which was set apart to answer the annuity. The trusts of this were declared, by a deed dated the 24th of July, 1877, to be, out of the income to pay the annuity of £200, and next the costs of the trustees, and the residue of the income to Mr. and Mrs. Tennent, or their executors, administrators, and assigns, according to their rights or interests therein as by law from time to time for the time being determined or regulated, and after the death of the annuitant the capital was to be applied in payment of succession duty and costs, and the residue was to be in trust for Mr. and Mrs. Tennent, their executors, administrators, and assigns, according to their rights or interests therein as by law from time to time for the time being determined or regulated. Mrs. Tennent having survived her husband and the annuitant having also survived him, the question is whether she is entitled to this money either under the provisions of this deed or as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband in his lifetime. The deed merely preserves such rights as she might have according to law, and obviously did not intend to confer upon her any right if in law she had none. The only right in law which she could have would be on the supposition that this £5,500 was her chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband.

In order to make this out it is essential to show that it was a chose in action originally belonging to the wife. This certainly was not the case as to the whole of it. Some part of it was the purchase-money of the husband's freehold interest in his wife's real property. Some part also must be treated as the price of his permitting the wife to sell her interest by concurring in the conveyance. How can it be ascertained how much of it was the wife's chose in action? These considerations seem to me to throw light on the intention of the Act and rules. Suppose all the purchase-money had been left outstanding on securities by way of mortgage given to the purchaser, the question would be the same. Could the wife surviving the husband claim that fund or any part of it against his executor? The answer to such claim would be, "When you were separately examined you relinquished all claim to a provision out of the purchase-money or otherwise. The effect was to make such purchase-money the absolute property of the husband. Your right by survivorship is only to a chose in action which belonged to you, and which your husband, by his marital right, might have reduced into possession, but did not; but the indefinite interest which you had in this purchase-money you entirely relinquished by declining to claim any provision, and therefore no part of this money ever was your chose in action." The truth seems to me to be that one of the essential purposes of the separate examination of the wife is to ascertain what is the bargain between her and the husband—that is, whether the purchase-money is to belong to him or not. If she declines to have any provision made for her, the arrangement must be that she gives up to her husband all claim upon the purchase-money, and the doctrine of reduction into possession does not apply.

For these reasons I am of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the £5,500 cannot be treated as a chose in action to which the wife is entitled, but that, if the domicile of the husband and wife had been English, the whole would now belong to the executor of the husband.

It was argued that if this be the effect of the rules made by the Common Pleas they are ultra vires. That is not my opinion. By section 89 the court was to make rules "touching the mode of examination." By section 90 the commissioners are to examine the wife apart from her husband touching her knowledge of such deed, and shall ascertain whether she freely or voluntarily consents to such deed. These matters could not be ascertained satisfactorily, if at all, without bringing it clearly before the mind of the married woman that she might insist on having a provision made for her out of the purchase-money, or otherwise, before she consented to execution, and the questions which the commissioners are by the rule directed to put are apt for this purpose. The answers to the questions must be—(1) At the date of her marriage to the original defender—namely, March 24, 1877—no valid or binding contract of sale of Overton had been entered into by or on behalf of the pursuer as vendor and Lord Boyne or his trustees as purchasers. This makes it unnecessary to answer questions 2 and 3. The succeeding questions I answer thus:—(4) After the marriage the estate of Overton belonged to Mrs. Tennent in fee simple subject to a freehold estate of the husband therein during the continuance of the coverture (Co. Litt. 326a (n); Robertson v. Norris, 11 Q. B. 916); (5) these rights and interests were saleable by them, as to the husband's estate, without the concurrence of the wife (ib.); as to the wife's estate, only with the concurrence of the husband in an acknowledged deed under the conditions imposed by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, and the rules thereunder to which I have referred: (6) on the conveyance of the estate by the deed of July 24, 1877, the original defender by the law of England became absolutely entitled to the price thereof, such right and interest in the price passed to him by the conveyance and by the refusal by the wife upon her separate examination of any provision, rather than by the jus mariti; and (7) for the same reasons under the trusts of the indenture or trust deed of July 24, 1877, the pursuer is not entitled by the law of England to the sum of £5,000, either as having survived her husband or as a chose in action not reduced into possession by the husband during his coverture.

Patent—Infringement—Disclaimer—Terms upon which liberty will be given to apply for leave to amend specification by disclaimer—Costs—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 19.

The plaintiffs, in an action for infringement of patent, applied to the court for liberty to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend their specification by way of disclaimer. The pleadings in the action had been completed, and they asked that the costs of such part thereof as might be used at the trial of the action might be reserved.

Held, that liberty ought to be granted upon the terms that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of the application and the costs of and occasioned by the amendment; that both plaintiffs and defendants should have leave to amend their pleadings; that the plaintiffs must undertake forthwith, after disclaimer, to amend their pleadings, confining the action to the amended specification, or to consent to the action being discontinued, with costs; and that, in the event of the action proceeding, all other questions of costs should be reserved.

Motion.

This was an application by the plaintiffs in an action for infringement of patent for liberty to apply at the Patent Office for leave to amend their specification by way of disclaimer, and the question was upon what terms the motion should be granted.

The statements of claim and defence, and the reply in the action, had been delivered, and the pleadings completed and closed, with the exception of joinder of issue.

Meanwhile, in another action by the plaintiffs, the second claim of their specification had been held by Stephen, J., to be invalid.

They now moved for liberty to apply for leave to amend their specification by striking out the second claim thereof and making such other alterations as should be rendered necessary thereby, upon the terms of the plaintiffs paying to the defendants all the costs incurred in the action in relation to the matters proposed to be struck out, or upon such other terms as the court should see fit to impose, and that, pending such application or further order, all further proceedings might be stayed.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Aston, Q.C., and Carpmael, for the plaintiffs.—We do not object to a similar order to that made in Fusee Vesta Co. v. Bryant & May, 35 W. R. 267, 34 Ch. D. 458, except to this extent, that we ought not to be ordered to pay the costs now of any part of the pleadings that may be used at the trial of the action: Singer v. Stassen, 1 Rep. of Pat. Cas. 121.

Moulton, Q.C., and W. R. Bousfield, for the defendants, argued that they ought to have all the costs of the action up to the disclaimer in any event, and asked for a similar order to that in Fusee Vesta Co. v. Bryant & May.

Sir R. E. Webster, in reply, referred to Allen v Doulton, 4 Rep. of Pat. Cas. 377.

Kay, J.—This case differs from the Fusee Vesta case in this respect, that in the Fusee Vesta case very little had been done, but here I am told that the pleadings are completed, and that nothing remains but to prepare the evidence and bring the case on for trial. Now since this action was begun there has been a trial against another alleged infringer of the patent before Stephen, J., and he has decided that this patent, as to one of its claims, is bad. Of course that makes the patent bad altogether, and, of course, if that decision is acquiesced in and not reversed, this action, when it comes on for trial, must fail. Now the question is, what is right to be done when the application is made to the court for liberty to apply for leave to disclaim that part of the patent which Stephen, J., says is bad, and on what terms that leave ought to be granted? In the Fusee Vesta case, very little having been done, I thought that one of the terms ought to be that all the costs up to the time of the disclaimer should be paid by the plaintiff; but I did not think that he ought to have the expense of issuing a new writ, so that I allowed him to amend on certain terms, as very few proceedings had been taken, and to proceed upon the patent as amended by the disclaimer.

Now in this case I have to see what are the proper terms to be imposed where a good deal has been done, and I think it would be quite right that the plaintiffs should eventually pay all the costs of this action up to the time of the disclaimer, except only so far as the proceedings in the action may be utilized for the purpose of the trial upon the leave to amend which I propose to give, in case the plaintiffs should succeed at the trial. Supposing leave is given to amend by disclaimer, and the action goes on to trial upon the amended record, it may be that the plaintiffs on that amended record will succeed. So that they will, and the defendants will also, have the advantage of using all these pleadings for the purpose of the action as altered. Then so far as these pleadings are proper for the amended case the plaintiffs ought to get the costs of these proceedings, and so far as they are not useful the court will make them pay the costs. The effect of that will be that, if the proper distinction is made, instead of putting both parties to the expense of a new statement of claim, a new defence, and a new reply, I shall enable both of them to use for the purpose of the action the pleadings now put in subject to any amendment that may be thought proper. Therefore, I give the plaintiffs leave to amend their writ and statement of claim, and if necessary the reply after they have put in a disclaimer, and I give leave to the defendants also to amend their defence, and, that having been done, I think I must impose this other term, that the plaintiff must undertake forthwith, if he means to go on, to amend the action by stating the disclaimer, founding it simply upon the specification as amended, or consent to the action being discontinued with costs. Now, subject to that, the right order will be to reserve the costs according to the result, and if I have to deal with it I shall certainly not forget the intimation I have now given as to the mode in which the costs should be borne. I do not intend by this order to prejudice any of the rights of the parties.

The order made was to the following effect:—Application granted; the plaintiffs to pay the costs of this application and the costs of and occasioned by the amendment; the plaintiffs and the defendants to be allowed to make all necessary amendments of their pleadings after disclaimer; the plaintiffs to undertake forthwith after the disclaimer to amend their pleadings confining the action to the amended specification, or to consent to the action being discontinued, with costs to be paid to the defendants; in the event of the action proceeding all other questions of costs to be reserved.

Company—Transfer of shares—Deed—Seal—Validity.

By the articles of association of a company, transfers of its shares were to be made by deed. A., a shareholder, deposited certificates of certain of its shares with B., to secure a loan, and also signed and handed over to B. a blank transfer of the shares. There was no seal or wafer on the transfer opposite to A.'s signature, but only a circle printed on the paper inclosing the words "Place for a seal." The document purported to be attested by a witness as having been "signed, sealed, and delivered" in his presence, but there was no evidence proving that the document was signed, sealed, and delivered as a deed.

Held, that, in the absence of such evidence, the printed circle inclosing the words "Place for a seal," did not supply the place of a seal so as to make the document a deed, effectual to pass the shares.

(a.) Reported by J. Trustram, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

The articles of association of the Balkis Consolidated Co. provided that transfers of the shares of the company should be made by deed.

In April, 1887, A. J. Arnott, a shareholder of the company, deposited the certificates of 455 shares with his broker, F. Barnard, to secure the balance of his account, and at the same time signed and handed to him a blank transfer of the 455 shares.

In June, 1887, F. Barnard filled up the blank transfer with the name of L. Lehmann as transferee, and deposited the certificates and the transfer with him as security for a loan.

In October, 1887, F. Barnard sold the shares, and L. Lehmann, as transferee, executed the transfer and sent it to the offices of the company for registration to enable F. Barnard to complete the sale.

Thereupon A. J. Arnott gave notice to the company not to register the transfer of shares on the ground that his signature to the transfer had been improperly obtained. He also alleged that at the time of the deposit with L. Lehmann there was nothing due from him (Arnott) to F. Barnard, and that F. Barnard had no authority to make the deposit. The company also received notice that the transfer by A. J. Arnott had been executed in blank.

This was a motion by L. Lehmann under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, to rectify the registrar of shareholders of the company by substituting his name as the holder of the 455 shares standing in the name of A. J. Arnott.

On the production of the tranfer by A. J. Arnott in court, it appeared that there was no seal or wafer in the place of a seal opposite to his signature, but merely a circle printed on the paper and inclosing the words "place for seal." The document was attested by a clerk as having been "signed, sealed, and delivered" in his presence by A. J. Arnott; but no affidavit by the attesting witness was produced on the motion. There was an affidavit by F. Barnard to the effect that A. J. Arnott, in executing blank tranfers of shares, invariably put his finger on the place for the seal and said, "I deliver this as my act and deed," and an affidavit by A. J. Arnott denying that he invariably did so.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the summons.—The transfer by Arnott was effectual to transfer the shares. It was complete and valid on the face of it. In order to constitute the sealing of a deed it is not necessary that wax or a taper should be used, but only that there should be an intention to seal and deliver the document as a deed.

They referred to In re Sandilands, 19 W. R. 641, L. R. 6 C. P. 411; Tayler v. Great Indian Peninsular Railway Co., 7 W. R. 737, 4 De G. & J. 559; Hunter v. Walters, 20 W. R. 218, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 75.

Higgins, Q.C., and Boome, for A. J. Arnott.—The rules of the company require that tranfers of shares should be made by deed, and the transfer by Arnott was not effectual, as it had not been sealed, and therefore was not a deed. The fact of a circle printed on the paper inclosing the words "place for a seal" indicates an intention that a seal should be placed there, but this was not done.

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and G. P. Macdonell for the company, asked for costs.

North, J.—I am unable to give a decision on the materials before me in this case. There is no seal to the transfer by Mr. Arnott, but merely a round mark with a blank in the middle, in which are the words "place for a seal." The applicant's case is that a document was handed to him which, on the face of it, was a complete and valid transfer. Looking at the evidence I am not satisfied that the document was handed over to Arnott sealed and delivered as his deed. In the case of In re Sandilands the question for decision was not whether the document in question was a deed, but whether it was to be received and filed as a deed acknowledged by married women, and the court held that there was no reason why it should not be so filed. I am not satisfied that the transfer was intended to be sealed by Arnott; and under the circumstances I must dismiss the application.

Motion dismissed.

Copyholds—Devolution—Death of sole trustee between commencement of Conveyancing Act, 1881, and passing of Copyhold Act, 1887—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 30—Copyhold Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 73), s. 45.

A sole surviving trustee of copyholds, who was tenant on the court rolls, died in 1884. His executors had not been admitted tenants to the property before the passing of the Copyhold Act, 1887.

Held, that, on the passing of that Act, the Conveyancing Act, 1881, ceased to have any application to copyholds, and that the copyholds were vested in and could be dealt with by the persons in whom they would have been vested if the Act of 1881 had never been passed.

Semble, if, before the passing of the Copyhold Act, the executors had been admitted to the copyholds, and had made a disposition of them, they would have been able to make a good title.

Petition.

Thomas Mills (who died in March, 1847) by his will dated the 14th of November, 1846, devised certain copyhold hereditaments to three trustees upon the trusts therein mentioned. In 1847 the trustees were duly admitted tenants of the copyholds upon the trusts of the will. The last surviving trustee died in March, 1861, and by an order of the Court of Chancery dated the 24th of June, 1871, three new trustees were appointed in the place of the three original trustees of the will. On the 9th of April, 1872, the new trustees were duly admitted tenants of the copyhold hereditaments. On the 1st of May, 1884, the last survivor of the three trustees appointed by the order of the 24th of June, 1871, died, having by his will appointed his wife and two executors thereof. The executors were never admitted tenants to the copyholds.

This petition was presented by the purchaser of the beneficial interest in the copyholds for a vesting order, and the question was raised whether the copyholds were vested in the executors of the last surviving trustee or in his customary heir.

Lewis, for the petitioner.—Having regard to section 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and section 45 of the Copyhold Act, 1887, it does not appear clear in whom the legal estate in the copyholds is now vested.

North, J.—The question in this case is in whom the legal estate in certain copyhold property devised by the will of Thomas Mills, who died in the year 1847, is now vested. In 1871 new trustees of the will were appointed by an order of the Court of Chancery in the place of the original trustees, who had all died. The last survivor of the new trustees died in the year 1884, having appointed two executors of his will. Sub-section 1 of section 36 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, provides—to put it shortly—that where an estate of inheritance in any tenements or hereditaments is vested on any trust or by way of mortgage in any person solely, the same shall, on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to, and become vested in, his personal representatives or representative from time to time in like manner as if the same were a chattel real vesting in them or him. By section 45 of the Copyhold Act, 1887, it is provided that the 30th section of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, shall not apply to land of copyhold or customary tenure vested in the tenant on the court rolls of any manor upon any trust or by way of mortgage. In this case the property was vested in the tenant on the court rolls upon a trust in the words of section 45, and, under these circumstances, the question arises as to the effect of that section upon sub-section 1 of section 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, so far as it relates to copyholds. If the executors had made any disposition of the property between the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and the Copyhold Act, 1887, they could have made a good title to the property. But in September the Copyhold Act came into operation, and, therefore, as to the copyholds, from the date of that Act the Conveyancing Act ceased to have any application. The question is now asked whether the executors can dispose of the property. It seems to me that as to any disposition of the copyholds after the passing of the Copyhold Act it cannot be said that the executors have any power to deal with them. The persons in whom the copyholds are now vested, and who can now dispose of them, are the persons in whom they would have been vested and who would have been able to dispose of them if the Conveyancing Act had never been passed.

In re Bowes.

Earl of Strathmore v. Vane. (a.)

Executor—Leasehold of testator—Liability for rent—Administration action—Summons—Fresh action.

An executor who takes possession of leasehold property of his testator becomes personally liable, as assign of the lease, for payment of rent in respect of the actual value of the property from the time of taking possession; the actual value is the aggregate of what he has actually received and what with reasonable diligence he might have received provided that such aggregate does not exceed the full amount of the rent; but he is not liable for rent beyond such value.

Adjourned summons.

The action was brought for the administration of the estate of John Bowes, deceased.

On the 19th of April, 1872, John Bowes obtained a lease of a piece of land containing about 260 acres, part of Langton Wold, Yorkshire, from year to year until the tenancy should be determined by notice as agreed upon between the parties, the rent being payable half-yearly, on the 11th of April and the 11th of October. He used the land for the purpose of training horses, and also let it out to other persons for the same purpose.

In 1881 the lessor died, and C. B. Norcliffe became entitled as tenant for life to the rents reserved by the lease.

(a.) Reported by J. Trustram, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 9th of October, 1885, John Bowes died, and his executors, of whom E. Y. Western became the survivor, took possession of the piece of land and let it out to various persons for training horses and other purposes, and received rents from such persons as John Bowes had done, but did not themselves use it. It was uncertain whether the estate of John Bowes would prove solvent.

The tenancy was determined on the 6th of April, 1887, at which date four half-years' rent was due to C. B. Noroliffe in respect of the piece of land.

This was a summons in the action taken out by C. B. Noroliffe against E. Y. Western, the surviving executor, asking (1) that an account might be taken of the rent due to the applicant from the death of John Bowes to the 6th of April, 1887, when the tenancy expired, in respect of the 260 acres of land let to John Bowes. (2) That an account might be taken of the rents and profits received, or which, but for the neglect or default of the defendant, E. Y. Western, might have or ought to have been received by him or his agents in respect of the 260 acres of land since the 9th of October, 1885, the date of the death of John Bowes, to the 6th of April, 1887. (3) That the defendant, E. Y. Western, might be ordered to pay to the applicant the amount found due to him on the account first above mentioned out of the moneys with which the defendant was chargeable on the account secondly above mentioned, and to pay to the applicant his costs of the application.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and W. C. Druce, for the summons.—The defendant does not object to have the question determined on summons, and it will be advantageous for all persons interested to have the question decided on the summons instead of incurring the expense of a fresh action by the applicant. The lessor has a clear right of action against an executor who has taken possession of premises demised to his testator for the rent of such premises provided it does not exceed the profit or yearly value of the premises.

They referred to Hargreave's case, 5 Rep. 31 b; Rubery v. Stevens, 4 B. & Ad. 241; Buckley v. Pirk, 1 Salk. 316; Hornidge v. Wilson, 11 Ad. & E. 645; Platt on Leases, vol. 2, pp. 368, 369.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Deane, for the defendant.—The landlord's remedy to obtain payment of arrears of rent is to prove for the amount in the administration of the estate of the deceased tenant whose estate is being administered; and an action against the executor for the amount of the rent is not in such a case the proper course to adopt. Such an action, if brought, will be restrained pending the administration. If the estate should prove insolvent, the rules in bankruptcy ought to apply: The Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, has no application in this case: Tadman v. D'Epinieul, 30 W. R. 423, 20 Ch. D. 217.

NORTH, J. [after stating the facts set out above, proceeded].—At the end of the tenancy in April, 1887, four half-years' rent remained unpaid, one half-year practically being rent due in the lifetime of Mr. Bowes, the other three half-years being rent which had accrued after his death; and the question is what was the legal right of the lessor against Mr. Bowes, the lessee, and against his executor in respect of rent.

Now the right of the lessor, the claimant, as against the lessee is clear. He has a right to come in and prove for the whole of the rent; but on proving for the rent he is only entitled to receive in respect of it, if the estate is insolvent, as is possible in this case, the same dividend that other creditors would be entitled to receive in respect of their debts. What is his position as against the executor. If the latter is sued as executor and puts in a proper plea, he is only liable to the extent of the assets; but it is also open to the lessor to take proceedings against him as assign of the lease, and then the lessor is entitled to recover the rent from the executor as assign of the lease. But it would be hard upon the executor to be in possession of property for which he had to pay the full rent although the property itself was not worth as much as the rent. Therefore, the law is, as the cases cited and several others clearly establish, that if an executor is sued as assign of the lease for the rent accrued during the time in which he was in possession, he is entitled to set up by way of defence that he is only assign as executor, and that the profits or yearly value (I will consider the meaning of those words presently) of the property amount only to a sum less than the rent. Then he must pay into court the amount that he admits to be the value, and if his plea is proved, and that is the full value, he will be under no further liability in respect of the matter. I used the words "profits or yearly value." In some cases that have been referred to, the court has spoken of the liability of the executor in respect of profits; and it has been argued that profits mean merely what has actually been received minus the expenses, and therefore the profits cannot include anything which has not been received and which therefore cannot be profit. But in the cases in which the word "profits" was used the court generally assumed the profits to be more than the rent, in which case it did not matter whether they were called "profits" or anything else. In the few cases where the profits were referred to as being less than the rent, no suggestion was made that less than the full profits, whatever they were, had actually been received. I think that the word "profits" does not accurately describe that for which the executor as assign is liable. What he is liable for is to account for the actual value of the premises to him during the time in which the rent for which he is sought to be made liable has accrued or the time in which he has been in possession, independently of any question whether that value has actually been received by him or not. In the case of an executor who has proved the will it would be from the time of the testator's death.

In the form of plea as given in Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, at p. 263, it is stated that an executor "sued as an assignee of the term, and who has not assigned over, may plead, except as to £ (being the full actual value of the demised premises during the period in respect of which the rent is claimed, and which should be paid into court, or the claim for it be otherwise answered), that the term did not vest in him by assignment otherwise than as executor or administrator, and that he has not at any time since the death of the lessee received or derived, nor could he during any part of that time receive or derive, any profit from the said demised premises, except sums amounting to the sum excepted, and that the said demised premises have not since the death of the lessee yielded any profit whatever, except to the amount excepted." Then the plea deals with the surplus with respect to which his liability depended upon whether he had assets or not. That is the form of plea given. In the case of Hornidge v. Wilson, Lord Denman says:—"With respect to the value, it is clear that an administrator who has fully administered and is chargeable with no default or laches may discharge himself from liabilities to a greater extent than the real value; but we think that the real value, as against one who takes to the premises and accepts rent for them after the death of his testate, must be taken to be that which the premises would have been worth but for his own act," that is to say, what he has received is not the test, but the real value of the premises. There an executor as assign was held liable for what might have been received if he had kept a covenant to repair, which he had not done and also for rent which a tenant was bound to pay, but had failed to pay through insolvency. Therefore, the executor was held liable in respect of both these sums which he had not received, and as to one of which he could not actually have received through the insolvency of the tenant. That states the principle very clearly. But there is a later case of Hopwood v. Whaley, 6 C. B. 744, the facts of which come very near to the present. The marginal note is this: "Executor of lessee for years, is, in the absence of other assets, liable de bonis propriis, for the rent reserved to the extent to which he might by the exercise of reasonable diligence have derived profit from the premises." In that case the property was held for three years under a lease after the death of the testator, the rent payable to the lessor was £90 a year, and £270 was the amount of rent claimed. The executor himself was in actual occupation during one quarter, and his liability to pay one-fourth of the rent, or £22 10s. was clear. During the remaining two years and three-quarters the property was unlet, as the executor had tried to let it for a rent equivalent to the full rent payable, but had failed, and the property had remained unlet. The questions left to the jury are stated thus: "The learned judge was of opinion that as there was no plea of payment to cover the quarter during which the defendant occupied the premises the plaintiff must at all events have a verdict for that; and he left it to the jury to say, first, whether the defendant had in fact derived any profit or advantage from the premises, and if so to what amount; secondly," and this is the important point, "whether he might by the exercise of reasonable diligence have derived profit or advantage therefrom, and if so to what amount." The jury found that he had received the £22 10s., and also that although the property could not be let for £90 a year it might have been let for £60 a year; and the result was that the executor was held liable at the rate of £60 a year for the two years and three-quarters in which he had not himself occupied and for the full rent of the remaining quarter. After considering the form of plea, and commenting on the cases of Hornidge v. Wilson and Rubery v. Stevens, Coltman, J. says:—"The question then, in substance, is whether the defendant might have received profit and advantage from the premises to the amount of the rent due, or any part thereof." Maule, J., says:—"The cases on the subject of a lease devolving on an executor where the rent reserved exceeds the value of the premises are involved in some difficulty; I think, however, upon the authorities as well as on principle, that where the rent reserved exceeds the value of the premises, an executor in the character of an assignee, is liable to the extent of such value; and where the value exceeds the rent reserved, to the extent of such rent." These authorities clearly show that the executor in the present case is liable for the actual value of the premises during the time in which he held the premises as an assign, that is to say for a year and a half after the testator's death.

Then the question arises, How is the value to be valued at? It is clear from those authorities that the value is to be arrived at, first by considering what he has received, and then by considering what he might have received if reasonable diligence had been used. Therefore, those two items make up the total amount for the aggregate of which the executor is liable, provided that they do not together exceed the full amount of the rent.

In the present case the application is made in an informal way, which raises a difficulty I do not see how to get over, except by concession of the parties, although the respondent has not raised any technical objection to the form of the application. The application is by summons in the action to administer the estate of Mr. Bowes, and it asks, to put it shortly, that an account may be taken of what is due for rent since the death of Mr. Bowes to the expiration of the lease; that an account may be taken of the rent and profits received, or which, but for the wilful neglect or default of Mr. Western, might have been received in respect of the land during the same period; and then that Mr. Western may be ordered to pay the amount found due to the applicant on the account first mentioned out of the money with which he is chargeable on the account secondly mentioned, and to pay the costs of the application. As regards the estate of the testator, that form of claim is entirely misconceived. The right of the landlord against the testator's estate is merely to prove for the whole rent and be paid like any other creditor is paid. As against the executor he would have a right to bring his action, and to recover such an amount as was found to be due substantially upon the footing of such accounts as are asked by the summons. But that is not the measure o the liability of the testator's estate. As I understand the summons has been presented in this form upon the footing that the executor has been acting properly in the administration, and that whatever he is liable for the estate would be liable to recoup to him, and, therefore, the irregular step has been taken, with the consent of all parties, of making the claim directly against the estate instead of against the executor personally. But, as I pointed out, the measure of liability of the estate is the whole rent and nothing else; and, assuming that the executor pays the full amount that is asked for by the summons, he would not have a right to stand against the estate as creditor for that amount, because, even assuming that he was entitled to recover from the estate such a sum as he had actually received and accounted for to the estate, still he could not be entitled to receive from the estate what he has to pay by reason of his omission to recover what he might have done, because that is a loss that he would have to account for to the estate, and that the estate would not be answerable for. If, therefore, I were simply to direct the inquiry in the form asked by the summons, it would not give me any measure by which to ascertain the liability of the testator's estate. Then there is this difficulty. At the present time the only parties here are Mr. Norcliffe, the applicant, on the one hand, and the executor on the other as representing the estate, and no question between the estate and the executor can be decided where he is the only person representing his own interest, and also representing the estate, which really has an interest adverse to him. Therefore, upon this summons as it stands, I cannot give any relief; and as against the estate, but for what I am going to say, I should dismiss the summons without costs upon the ground that the application fails as regards the estate, but has been made in this form with the concurrence of the executor with a view to saving trouble and expense to all parties if it could be done. Strictly speaking, all that I can do is to dismiss the summons.

But I have pointed out what is, in my opinion, the liability of the parties. The liability of Mr. Western can, strictly, only be enforced by an action brought against him to recover the sums for which he is liable, and upon the present summons in the matter of the estate I cannot make any order against him. Unless he consents to an amendment of the summons it must be dismissed. But as the matter has been argued fully, and I have expressed my opinion, it is worth his while to consider whether it would not be better to amend the summons by adding, in addition to what is asked by it, an application that, in the alternative, if the court should be of opinion that the applicant is not entitled to any of the relief asked against the estate, then Mr. Western might be ordered personally to pay what should be ascertained to be due on taking the account. If that was done, and Mr. Western submitted, and it appeared on the face of the order that he submitted to be bound by the decision on the summons in the same way as if a writ against him had been filed, the parties would be in the position of having got a judgment upon the point in question in the cheapest possible way, and, of course, it would be open to him, if he was not satisfied with the view I have taken, to appeal from it. If that course is assented to, I should give no costs, because Mr. Norcliffe would only have succeeded by arrangement between the parties that a claim that was not right in form might be put right so as to be made formal. It is for the parties therefore, to say, whether they will adopt the one course or the other. In the one case the summons will be dismissed without costs, in the other I should make a declaration to the effect that Mr. Western is liable in the way I have suggested, and direct an account of the rent due during the time that he has been in possession; and also, on the other hand, an account, in the form used in the direction to the jury in Hopwood v. Whalley, whether he had, in fact, derived any profit or advantage from the premises, and, if so, what amount; and, secondly, whether he might, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have derived profit or advantage therefrom, and, if so, to what amount.

There are two points that were argued by Mr. Hardy about which I ought to say a word. The first was this. He says that no precedent can be found—and I am not aware of any myself—in which any such claim as this has been allowed in an administration suit. As the executor's liability is personal as assign, and not as executor, I should not expect to find any such claim made in an administration suit, because it is the subject of an action at law, and there are numerous actions reported in the books in which such a claim has been made personally. It is quite true, if he were sued and recovered against, he might have some claim against the testator's estate. As all parties interested in the estate are now represented by the same counsel, I cannot consider what the extent of the liability would be—whether the executor would be entitled to stand in the place of the lessor as creditor of the estate, or whether he would be entitled to have back out of the estate in full the amount that he has received and paid into the estate. It may well be that questions of this sort, which do not appear in the books, have arisen in administration suits; and the fact that no reported case is found bearing upon it in equity does not seem to me really important.

The second point was that the application was irregular. If it were regular it would be by writ. There is a suit to administer Mr. Bowes' estate. If a writ had been issued against the executor that action would have been stayed at once, because the creditor already has the benefit of the decree for creditors generally, and would not be allowed to prosecute that action, and Mr. Norcliffe ought not to be in a better position upon an irregular application than he would have been if the application had been in regular form. But that argument seems to me to be based upon a mistake. If this claim were against him as executor, I think the argument would have been right; but as it is made against him as assign it is against him de bonis propriis, and it is impossible to say that an action would be stayed against an executor merely because there is a suit to administer the estate of which he is executor when the ground of the action really is not his liability as executor, but his personal liability; suppose that, in this case, instead of the executor having become liable as assign, the testator had been liable for the rent, and Mr. Western had been surety for it. Of course, if he had been surety for the payment of the rent, no suit to administer Mr. Bowes' estate would have prevented an action being commenced and prosecuted to the end against the surety to recover the rent from him. Therefore, the executor being liable, not as such, but as assign de bonis propriis, it is impossible to say that an action against him in that character could be stayed merely because there was a suit to administer the estate of which he happened to be executor.

In re Jackson and Woodburn's Contract. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Summons—Determination of notice to rescind contract—Jurisdiction—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.

The court has jurisdiction, upon a summons under section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to determine the validity of a notice given by a vendor to rescind his contract to sell.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

On the 13th of October, 1886, an agreement was entered into between R. B. Jackson and Adam Woodburn, whereby the former agreed to sell to the latter certain real estate.

The contract contained the following conditions (inter alia):—No. 7.—"If the purchaser shall insist on any objection or requisition as to the title or abstract, or evidence of title, particulars, conditions, conveyance, surrender, or otherwise (not being a claim for compensation falling within the 10th of these conditions), which the vendor shall be unable, or on the ground that the expense would be unreasonably heavy, unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendor may, by notice in writing, to be given to the purchaser, or his solicitor, at any time, notwithstanding any negotiation or litigation in respect of such objection or requisition, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same, rescind the contract, unless, within fourteen days after the delivery of such notice, the purchaser shall, by notice in writing, withdraw such objection or requisition, and upon such rescission, the deposit shall be returned to the purchaser, but without any interest, cost of investigating the title, or other compensation or payment whatever."

No. 10.—"If any error or mistake shall appear to have been made in the description of the property, or the vendor's interest therein, the same shall not annul the sale, but, if the same shall be pointed out either by the vendor or purchaser prior to the time appointed for the completion of the purchase, compensation shall be allowed or given by the vendor or purchaser as the case may require."

There was also the following condition:—"The timber and coppice had been valued by Mr. George Barber, woodmonger, that on lot 1 at £180, that on lot 3 at £10, and that on lot 4 at £80, and that sum shall be paid by the purchaser of each lot in addition to his purchase-money."

The purchaser agreed to purchase lots 1, 3, and 4. He afterwards made a requisition that the vendor should allow compensation for a deficiency in the acreage of the property, and on the ground that the valuation of the timber was excessive.

The vendor refused to comply with this requisition and on the 29th of December, 1886, gave notice to rescind the contract. On the 10th of February, 1887 the purchaser took out this summons, asking for a declaration that the vendor was not entitled to rescind the contract; a declaration that the purchaser was entitled to compensation in respect of the deficiency in the quantity of the land comprised in the contract; a declaration that the purchaser was entitled to compensation in respect of the timber on the land being of less value than the sum mentioned in the contract.

The summons was adjourned into court.

preliminary objection to this summons. The court has no jurisdiction to decide this question on a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act. The question is one "affecting the existence of the contract," and is, therefore, within the exception in section 9.

Levett, for the purchaser.—It is too late to raise the objection after the vendor has filed affidavits in respect of the summons. The cases of In re Yeilding and Westbrook, 34 W. R. 397, 31 Ch. D. 344, and In re Harrison and Thompson's Contract, 34 W. R. 708, 32 Ch. D. 454, show the extent of the jurisdiction. The contract is still a subsisting contract, and the question is to what extent it exists. The contract cannot be put an end to until the vendor has returned the deposit.

North, J.—I do not think that the cases referred to have any bearing upon the present case; they do not relate to those words of section 9 of the Act which are now in question. In neither of those cases was any question raised as to the existence or validity of the contract. The point now raised is whether the question of the validity of the vendor's notice to rescind the contract is a question "affecting the existence or validity of the contract," and, therefore, excepted from the jurisdiction by summons given by section 9. The matter comes on for hearing in precisely the same way as it would if an action had been brought, and the court ought to dispose of it upon the summons if it can possibly do so. I think that, according to the true construction of section 9, the words of exception refer to the existence or validity of the contract in its inception, and do not preclude the court from deciding upon a summons the validity of a vendor's notice to rescind the contract. The question whether a power to rescind has been well exercised has often been decided by the court upon a summons under this section. In re Dames and Wood, 33 W. R. 685, 29 Ch. D. 626, is one of such cases. Therefore I overrule the preliminary objection. If the matter had been discussed before the chief clerk in chambers I should have thought that the objection to the jurisdiction had been taken too late. The matter, however, was not discussed at all in chambers, but the summons was adjourned at once into court. If I had allowed the objection I should have disallowed all the costs of the evidence on the summons.

The summons was then heard on the merits, and in the result North, J., held that the vendor was entitled to rescind the contract.

Best v. Applegate. (a.)

Practice—Mortgage—Foreclosure—Delivery of possession—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 18, r. 2; ord. 55, r. 5a (Dec., 1885).

In a foreclosure action commenced by originating summons, an order for foreclosure absolute may, as against the mortgagor in possession (he having been served and not appearing), include an order for delivery of possession, notwithstanding that such an order was not claimed by the summons.

Motion.

This action was commenced by originating summons on the 4th of December, 1886.

On the 13th of January, 1887, North, J., at chambers made an order that, in default of payment by the defendants to the plaintiff of the sum of £2,073 9s. and his taxed costs of the action (including any costs properly incurred by him as mortgagee), and any sum which the plaintiff might thereafter properly pay for ground-rents in respect of the mortgaged premises, on or before the 13th of July, 1887, the defendants should be foreclosed. And, the defendants consenting, a receiver was appointed to receive the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises.

The defendants made default, and, on the 4th of August, 1887, upon a motion by the plaintiff, North, J., made an order enlarging the time for redemption until the 2nd of September, 1887, and it was ordered that the receiver should pay the sum of £39 8s. 4d., which was in his hands, to the plaintiff on account of the £2,073 9s., and that on such payment the receiver should be discharged. And it was ordered that, in default of payment by the defendants, or some or one of them, to the plaintiff of the sum of £2,077 1s. 10d. on the 2nd of September, 1887, the defendants should be absolutely foreclosed. The sum of £2,077 1s. 10d. was made up of £2,034 0s. 8d. (the balance of the £2,073 9s. after deducting the £39 8s. 4d. received by the receiver), £29 17s. 2d. (the amount of the plaintiff's taxed costs), and £13 4s. which the plaintiff had paid for ground-rents since the date of the order of the 13th of January, 1887.

The defendants having made default, the plaintiff now moved that the order for foreclosure might be made absolute, and that the mortgagors might be ordered to deliver up possession of that portion of the mortgaged premises of which the mortgagors were in possession.

The defendants had been served, but they did not appear.

Jason Smith, for the plaintiff. [North, J., inquired whether the summons asked for an order for delivery of possession.]—I have not a copy of the summons. In Salter v. Edgar, W. N., 1886, p. 47, an order for delivery of possession was made although neither the writ or statement or claim asked for delivery of possession. A similar order was made in Lacon v. Tyrrell, W. N., 1887, p. 71, where the proceedings were commenced by originating summons and the summons did not ask for delivery of possession.

North, J.—I do not quite understand the cases referred to. I have some difficulty in seeing what jurisdiction there is to make an order for delivery of possession when the summons does not ask for it. But I will follow the cases cited if the registrar, on looking at the records in them, shall find that they are in point.

[It was subsequently ascertained from the registrar that neither the writ in Salter v. Edgar nor the summons in Lacon v. Tyrrell asked for delivery of possession.]

Litchfield v. Jones. (a.)

Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, sub-sections 3, 4—Solicitor—Town agent—Fiduciary capacity.

A solicitor who was the London agent of a country solicitor made default in payment of a sum ordered to be paid by him in an action for an account by the country solicitor.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendant was liable to imprisonment under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, as a person acting in a fiduciary capacity, but not liable under section 4, sub-section 4, as a solicitor ordered to pay in his capacity of officer of the court.

Motion.

In 1882 an action was commenced by the executrix of a country solicitor against his town agent, Richard [illegible]ps, a solicitor, for an account of his agency.

On the 14th of July, 1887, an order was made that the defendant should pay into court within seven days, as directed in the schedule to the order, a sum of £3,022 13s. 1d., and should pay to the plaintiff the costs of the action subsequent to judgment.

This was a motion by the plaintiff to commit the defendant for default in disobeying the order to pay into court the sum of £3,022 13s. 1d.

Cookson, Q.C., and Woodfall, for the plaintiff.—As the defendant acted in a fiduciary capacity he comes within the exception contained in sub-section 3 of section 4 of the Debtors' Act, 1869, and is liable to imprisonment. He also comes within the exception contained in sub-section 4, because he was ordered to pay in his capacity of officer of the court.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the defendant.—The relationship of solicitor and client does not exist between a town agent and country solicitor: Ward v. Eyre, 28 W. R. 712, 15 Ch. D. 130. Nor can it be said that the agent was acting in a fiduciary capacity, his duties are similar to those of a banker who is a mere debtor. The distinction between fiduciary agents and other agents appears from the case of Crowther v. Elgood, 35 W. R. 369, 34 Ch. D. 691.

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

North, J.—In respect to the application to commit I am not disposed to accede to it for the reason that I do not see what good could be got by an order to commit. There is evidence that the defendant has no money, and the plaintiff is seeking to attach his property, and I do not see that he has anything more. I think there is jurisdiction to do more. I think the circumstances are such that the defendant does come within sub-section 3 of section 4 of the Debtors Act. In my opinion he is a person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and, in point of fact, I have in this case expressed that view when I ordered him to pay interest. Whether he comes under the 4th sub-section I feel a good deal more doubt, because he is not brought here in his capacity of a solicitor. It is quite true he would never have been selected to act as agent if he had not been a solicitor, but that seems to me to be a very different thing from his acting in the capacity of solicitor. If the Legislature had intended that the mere fact of his being a solicitor should be sufficient to expose him to the penalty of imprisonment it would have said so.

Verney v. Thomas. (a.)

Practice—Counter-claim—Defendants to counter-claim—Default of appearance—Ord. 32, r. 6—Ord. 27, r. 1

Several persons as plaintiffs brought an action against a defendant, T., to restrain him from infringing certain commonable rights over a piece of waste land. T. counter-claimed against the plaintiffs and seven other persons not originally parties to the action for an injunction to restrain them from erecting fences on part of the waste land. The seven persons so joined did not enter an appearance, and judgment against them on the counter-claim in default of appearance was moved for by the defendant in the action.

Held, that the cause of action against the seven persons was not severable within the meaning of ord. 27, r. 1, and came within ord. 32, r. 6, and that the case was not one in which immediate judgment would be granted against the defendants to the counter-claim who had not appeared.

Motion for judgment.

In this action the plaintiffs sought an injunction against the defendant Thomas restraining him from infringing the rights of common of the plaintiffs over a tract of waste land in the county of Anglesea. The defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiffs and seven other persons not previously parties to the action for an injunction restraining them from erecting or maintaining any fences or other enclosures on the piece of land in question.

The counter-claim was served on the seven persons in December, 1887. No appearance was entered within the eight days limited by R. S. C., ord. 21, r. 13, and an affidavit of service was filed under ord. 13, r. 2.

Judgment on the counter-claim in default of appearance was now moved for ex parte by the defendant in the action as against the seven persons made defendants to the counter-claim.

Costelloe, for the applicant.—The seven persons were added as defendants to the counter-claim under ord. 27, r. 12. They ought to have appeared within eight days, ord. 21, r. 13. As they have not appeared, an affidavit of service was filed under ord. 13, r. 2. The conditions for making ord. 13, r. 12, applicable have been duly complied with, and a default of pleading arose. The combined operation of ord. 19, r. 13, ord. 32, r. 6, and ord. 40, r. 1, give me the right to move for judgment: Street v. Crump, 32 W. R. 89, 25 Ch. D. [illegible]

Kekewich, J.—In this case the plaintiffs ask a declaration that they are entitled to certain rights of pasture as appurtenant to their lands, over a piece of waste land, and an injunction to assist the right. The defendant Thomas has delivered a counter-claim against the plaintiffs and certain other persons. The defendants have not appeared, and judgment in default is now asked for against these new defendants. It is objected in the office that the rules as to filing a defence in case of non-appearance do not apply to a counter-claim, but, reading ord. 21, r. 12, and ord. 27, r. 1, in the light of ord. 67, r. 4, a plaintiff by counter-claim against a defendant by counter-claim, in the position as a plaintiff in an original action, and if appearance is entered he can take the course of serving a notice of motion and proceed as against absent parties.

But then comes the question whether this is a case where judgment should be given against such defendants yet. The case falls within ord. 32, r. 6, which gives the judge a discretion as to granting a judgment

(a.) Reported by J. W. Greig, Esq., Barrister-at-[illegible]

The rule is as follows:—"Any party may at any stage of a cause or matter, where admissions of fact have been made either on the pleadings or otherwise, apply to the court or a judge for such judgment or order as upon such admissions he may be entitled to, without waiting for the determination of any other question between the parties; and the court or a judge may, upon such application, make such order, or give such judgment, as the court or a judge may think just."

It is said the defendant has an independent right against these new parties, but, if so, it should not have been joined in this action. The policy of the Judicature Act of 1873 (section 24, sub-section 3) was to have all questions between the same parties settled, not to permit new claims to be dragged in as against other persons. If, on the other hand, this claim is connected with the original one, that is a reason for not granting the relief asked, as ord. 32, r. 6, and the latter part of ord. 27, r. 12, apply, and I think this motion ought to stand to the trial and the question raised in the counter-claim be decided then.

Davies v. Davies. (a.)

Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), s. 46—Tenant for years—Liability for permissive waste—"Wear and tear and damage by tempest excepted."

A tenant by the curtesy of a freehold tenement, granted, in exercise of the power contained in section 46 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, a lease of the premises for twenty-one years, and died soon afterwards. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee that he would "at all times during the term keep the premises in good and substantial repair, and the same in good and substantial repair deliver up to the lessor, at the expiration or sooner determination of the term, fair wear and tear and damage by tempest excepted."

Held, in an action by the owner in fee of the premises to set aside the lease, that the lease was invalid as it was "not made without impeachment of waste," and therefore did not conform to the conditions of section 46 of the Act.

Yellowly v. Gower, 11 Ex. 274, 4 W. R. Dig. 194, followed.

Trial of action.

Mary Davies was seised in fee of the White Swan public-house, situate at Llanfrynach, in the county of Brecon. She died in 1851, whereupon her husband, Thomas Davies the elder, became tenant by the curtesy of the premises.

By an indenture dated the 28th of October, 1885, Thomas Davies the elder, in exercise of the power conferred upon him by the Settled Estates Act, 1877, demised to the defendant, William Davies, the White Swan for twenty-one years from the 27th of September, 1885, at the yearly rent of £34. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee that he would, "at all times during the said term, keep the said premises in good and substantial repair, and the same, in good and substantial repair, deliver up to the lessor at the expiration or sooner determination of the term, fair wear and tear and damage by tempest excepted."

The plaintiff, T. Davies the younger, the heir-at-law of Mary Davies, after the death of Thomas Davies, the elder, by this action claimed a declaration that the lease was not a valid exercise of the leasing power conferred by the Settled Estates Act, 1877, on the ground that the demise was not made without impeachment of waste, as the covenant to repair was subject to an exception of "fair wear and tear and damage by tempest."

Warmington, Q.C., and Upjohn.—The lease does not comply with section 46 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877. In Yellowly v. Gower, 11 Ex. 274, 4 W. R. Dig. 194, there was an implied exception from permissive waste by reason of the express covenant by the lessor to repair, and the lease was held bad. A tenant for years would be liable for damage by tempest if nothing were said about it in the lease. "If the house be discovered by tempest, the tenant must in convenient time repair": Co. Litt. 53a. The object of section 46 is to preserve the corpus of the estate for the reversioner. Brown v. Trumper, 26 Beav. 11, shows that a tenant is bound to give up the premises in as good a state of repair as when he took possession.

Barber, Q.C., and Ingham.—The section means the lessor is not to give the lessee a right of active waste. The fair meaning of this covenant is that the lessee is to keep the premises in substantial repair.

Warmington replied.

Kekewich, J., after dealing with other points in the case, proceeded:—T. Davies the elder, being tenant by the curtesy of a tenement, granted a lease under section 46 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877. According to that section, certain conditions have to be observed in such grants, including one that "such demise be not made without impeachment of waste." All the other conditions have been conformed to, and the question is, how far this one has been fulfilled. The meaning of the statute is not that the words, "with impeachment of waste," are to be inserted in the lease, but that in effect the lessee is not to be without impeachment of waste—in other words, that the lessee is not to be free from any obligation to which he would be subject if nothing were said about waste in the lease. This raises the question whether a lessee for years is subject to liability for permissive waste. The case of Yellowly v. Gower, seems to me to stifle any doubt on the point. In Woodhouse and Walker, 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, Lush, J., and Field, J., had the same idea, and Lush, J., went into the old law with reference to a tenant for life, but evidently thought a tenant for years was liable for permissive waste. I can have no doubt that both a tenant for years and a tenant for life are impeachable for permissive waste. What, then, is the effect of the present lease? The covenant as to repairs exempts the lessee from liability for "fair wear and tear and damage by tempest excepted." If those words were not there, the lessee would have been liable in those respects, and I therefore think the lease is not in conformity with the statute, and is bad, and must therefore be set aside.

Probate—Practice—Administration with will annexed—Grant to Administrator-General of British Guiana—Law of colony.

A testator domiciled in British Guiana, and having property there and in England, by his will appointed two executors.

By the law of British Guiana an executor of a will is allowed a period of six months which may be extended) from the death of his testator in which to deliberate whether he will act as executor or not; and during that period he may do certain acts and things necessary to protect the estate.

One executor was resident in England, the other in the colony, and the latter administered the estate on his own behalf and as attorney of the executor resident in England. Under the provisions of the law in force prior to the 1st of July, 1887, he ultimately nominated the Administrator-General of the colony to act as executor on his behalf, but did not affect the rights of the other executor.

The court, on application by motion, made a grant of letters of administration, with the will annexed, to the attorneys in this country of the Administrator-General, until such time as either he or the executor resident here should apply.

Motion for grant of letters of administration, with the will annexed, of the personal estate and effects in England of H. M. A. Black to Charles Champion and Charles Goble Champion, the attorneys duly appointed for this purpose of the Administrator-General of British Guiana.

The testator, H. M. A. Black, resided ordinarily at George Town, Demerara, in the colony of British Guiana, where his domicile was. He was lost at sea between Flushing and Queenboro in the month of September, 1886, having first made his will, bearing date April 6, 1886, by which he appointed as executors of his will and guardians of his children E. G. Barr, of England, and J. Moore, of British Guiana, and there was a clause substituting other executors in case these refused to act. Barr and Moore entered on their duties as executors.

By the law of British Guiana an executor of a will is allowed a period of six months from the death of his testator in which to deliberate whether he will act as executor or not, and during that period he may do certain acts and things necessary to protect the estate, and if necessary, at the expiration of that time, apply for a future period of deliberation, and at the end of that period or periods (called the "Period of Deliberation") he may elect to act in or renounce the trusts of the will.

But if an executor acts after that period he becomes officially the executor of the will, and prior to the 1st of July, 1887, he could only release himself from the executorship by nominating and substituting the Administrator-General of the colony to be executor in his place. This was done in this case by J. Moore on the eve of his leaving the colony in June, 1887, to reside permanently in England, and the Administrator-General is now administering the estate of the testator in the colony of British Guiana.

E. G. Barr for many years past permanently resided in England; he had not substituted the Administrator-General, and in consequence of a new law in force in the colony as from July 1, 1887, he could not now do so without leave of the courts.

By the law of the colony the Administrator-General of British Guiana is entitled to administer the whole estate, wheresoever situate, of any testator or intestate whose estate he may represent; and in the present case is the person entitled to apply for and take out letters of administration with the will annexed to the estate of the said H. M. A. Black, deceased, in England, for the purpose of realizing and administering such portion of the estate of the said testator as is situated there, or for any other purpose connected therewith.

The Administrator-General is further entitled, the moment any person is missing or absents himself from the colony without leaving an attorney or proper agent to represent the estate of such person and administer it. No person can claim administration of the estate in opposition to the Administrator-General after he has been legally substituted, and the Administrator-General has full power and authority by law, without the colony where it may be necessary to do so, to appoint an attorney or attorneys.

The statements of the law in the colony were deposed to by the Attorney-General of the colony, who happened to be in England, and he also deposed to the fact that the exemplification of the will, which was not in the form of an English probate, was a notarial copy of the will given out of the registrar's office according to the law and practice of the colony.

The testator, beyond his property in British Guiana, was also possessed of a large estate in England, and the object of the application was to administer the English estate.

Inderwick, Q.C. (G. E. S. Fryer with him), in support of the application.

Butt, J.—I do not see that any harm can be done by granting administration to the applicants, as attorneys for the use of the Administrator-General until he and Mr. Barr or either of them shall apply. As to sureties, I think the bond of the applicants, who are solicitors in London, will be sufficient.

From Chan. Div. [and Chitty, J.] — Feb. 20, 21, 22; March 6.

Mutter v. Eastern and Midlands Railway Co. (a.)

Railway company—Debenture stock register—Shareholder's statutory right to inspect and take copies of register—Shareholder a "nominee" of a rival company—Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16), s. 45—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), s. 28.

The statutory right of a shareholder in a railway company to inspect the "Register of Mortgages" under section 45 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and to inspect the "Debenture Stockholders' Register" under section 28 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, includes a right to take copies of or extracts from such registers.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Motion.

The plaintiff was the registered holder of shares to the extent of £200 and of debenture stock to the extent of £500 in the defendant company, and by his writ in the action claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from preventing him having access at all reasonable times to the defendant company's register of mortgages and bonds, or their register of debenture stock, for the purpose of inspection and perusal, and from preventing him taking extracts from the said registers respectively of the names, addresses, and holdings of the persons and corporations entitled to such mortgages, bonds, and debenture stock respectively.

The plaintiff, after issuing the writ, moved for an interlocutory injunction in the above terms. It was agreed to treat the motion as the trial of the action.

The material facts, as they appeared from the evidence, were shortly these:—The shares which the plaintiff held in the defendant company had been transferred to the plaintiff for a nominal consideration by the chairman of the Great Eastern Railway Co.—a rival company; the debenture stock held by the plaintiff in the defendant company had been purchased by the plaintiff with money borrowed from the solicitor of the Great Eastern Railway Co.—who was, however, a personal friend of the plaintiff's, and the plaintiff had deposited other railway stock with the solicitor as security for the loan. The defendant company had, in fact, allowed the plaintiff to inspect the registers referred to, but had refused to allow him to take copies of, or make extracts from, the registers, and the real contest was as to whether the plaintiff had a right to do so. The question turned on the construction of section 45 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 16), and section 28 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118). Section 45 of the Act of 1845 provides that "a register of mortgages and bonds shall be kept by the company, and within fourteen days after the date of any such mortgage or bond an entry or memorial, specifying the number and date of such mortgage or bond, and the sums secured thereby, and the names of the parties thereto, with their proper additions, shall be made in such register; and such register may be perused at all reasonable times by any of the shareholders, or by any mortgagee or bond creditor of the company, or by any person interested in any such mortgage or bond, without fee or reward." Section 28 of the Act of 1863 provides that "the company shall cause entries of the debenture stock from time to time created to be made in a register to be kept for that purpose, wherein they shall enter the names and addresses of the several persons and corporations from time to time entitled to the debenture stock, with the respective amounts of the stock to which they are respectively entitled; and the register shall be accessible for inspection and perusal at all reasonable times to every mortgagee, bondholder, debenture stockholder, shareholder, and stockholder of the company, without the payment of any fee or charge."

Other sections of these Acts referred to as bearing on the question were section 10 of the Act of 1845, which directs that a "shareholders' address book," containing the names and addresses of every shareholder, be kept, and enacts that "every shareholder . . . may, at all convenient times, peruse such book gratis, and may require a copy thereof or of any part thereof," the company being authorized to charge sixpence for every 100 words copied; section 36 of the Act of 1845, which enables execution creditors of the company to issue execution against the shareholders to the extent of their shares in capital not paid up, and provides that, "for the purpose of ascertaining the names of the shareholders, and the amount of capital remaining to be paid upon their respective shares, it shall be lawful for any person entitled to such execution at all reasonable times to inspect the register of shareholders without fee"; section 119 of the Act of 1845 provides that a "book-keeper" should be appointed to enter the accounts of the company in "books to be provided for the purpose, and every such book-keeper shall permit any shareholder to inspect such books and to take copies or extracts therefrom at any reasonable time during the prescribed periods, and if no periods are prescribed, then during one fortnight before and one month after every ordinary meeting, and if he fail to permit any such shareholder to inspect such books or take copies or extracts therefrom . . . he shall forfeit to such shareholder for every such offence a sum not exceeding £5."

Romer, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the plaintiff.

R. S. Wright and C. Haigh, for the defendant company.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Chitty, J.—The first point taken by the defendant company is that the plaintiff is not a bonâ fide shareholder or debenture stockholder. But his name is registered as the holder of both the shares and the debenture stock, and primâ facie he is therefore entitled to sue. The result of the authorities is that the court cannot deny the plaintiff the exercise of such rights as are conferred upon him as a shareholder by the Legislature. The personal merits of the plaintiff do not affect the question, and the court cannot go behind the register, which is final. The matter came before the courts in Pender v. Lushington, where the late Master of the Rolls decided that the register was the only evidence by which the rights of members to vote at a general meeting could be ascertained.

The strongest case in favour of the view taken by the defendant company that the plaintiff is not a bonâ fide holder is Forrest v. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. But there have been many other cases since then taking a different view, and notably Bloxam v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., where it was held that the circumstances under which the plaintiff acquired his interest did not disentitle him from claiming relief.

No doubt the plaintiff here is acting in the interest of the Great Eastern Railway, but the state of the authorities do not justify me in going behind the register, and, accordingly, I must decline to accede to the argument, which is founded upon what has been termed the doctrine of "personal exception."

The second point taken by the defendants is one which depends upon the construction of the Companies Clauses Act. The plaintiff desires to inspect the register, and it is plain, under that Act, he has a right to inspect it and see every part of it. The object of the Act is that a shareholder should be able to ascertain the number of shares and the address of each shareholder and communicate with them. This is a use of the register which is frequently made by the directors themselves when they canvass the shareholders to support some particular matter at a general meeting. I think the shareholders are entitled to have the same convenience. Then the question arises whether the shareholders have not only a right to inspect, but also to take copies of, the register's contents. [His lordship then read sections 9, 10, and 45 of the Act, and continued:—] The Act contains no prohibition against a shareholder making notes of what he inspects. Why should it? It is plain, as Mr. Romer says, a shareholder might commit to memory as much as he could, and use the information he remembers, and I do not see why another shareholder with inferior powers of memory might not make a copy of the information he desires to use. I hold that it follows from his right to inspect that the plaintiff has a right to make copies, and is entitled to an injunction.

The defendant company appealed.

R. S. Wright and C. Haigh, for the appellant.—The plaintiff is a person employed by the Great Eastern Railway Co.—a rival company—to collect the names of memorialists to oppose a Bill in Parliament of the defendant company. The shares in the defendant company of which the plaintiff is the registered holder were not purchased by him, but were voluntarily transferred to him by the chairman of the Great Eastern Co.; the plaintiff is in reality the mere puppet of the Great Eastern Co., and this application is in reality made on their behalf, and on that ground the court ought not to grant this injunction: Rogers v. Oxford and Wolverhampton Railway Co., 2 De G. & J. 662, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 68; Forrest v. Manchester and Sheffield Railway Co., 9 W. R. 818, 4 De G. F. & J. 126; Seaton v. Grant, 15 W. R. 602, L. R. 2 Ch. 459; Bloxam v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 16 W. R. 490, L. R. 3 Ch. 337; Hattersley v. Earl Shelburne, 10 W. R. 881. [Lindley, L.J.—Those cases were suits by one "suing on behalf of all others," but your case is not that.] The plaintiff is guilty of misrepresentation; he at first alleged he was a purchaser for value of the shares, but on cross-examination had to admit he was a mere voluntary donee. That is sufficient to disentitle him to the injunction sought. Again, on the construction of the Acts the plaintiff is not entitled to take copies of the register of mortgages or of the regi[illegible] of debenture stock; section 45 of the Act of 1845 [illegible] section 28 of the Act of 1863, which give the right [illegible] inspect, say nothing about taking copies, and wher[illegible] it was intended to give the right to take copies the [illegible] expressly gives it, as in section 10 of the Act of 1[illegible] relating to the "Shareholders' Address Book," [illegible] section 19 of the same Act, relating to the "A[illegible] Books." Even if there exists a right to take copi[illegible] in the discretion of the court to refuse to interfere [illegible] the application is not bonâ fide: Reg. v. London [illegible] St. Katharine Docks Co., 23 W. R. 136. [Bowen, [illegible] —That was an application for a mandamus, and th[illegible] fore the matter was discretionary for some purposes.]

Romer, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the respondent[illegible] The object of the Acts in requiring these registers to [illegible] kept and in giving the right of inspection is to a[illegible] information to any stock or shareholder as to [illegible] names and addresses of the other stock and sh[illegible] holders, so as to enable him, if necessary, to comm[illegible] cate with them. This object necessarily implies [illegible] right of taking copies of the registers. If it did not [illegible] directors of a company could practically prevent a [illegible] holder canvassing other shareholders by refusin[illegible] allow him to take copies of their names [illegible] addresses, while the directors, having the reg[illegible] in their possession, could always canvass on [illegible] own behalf. The plaintiff, as a registered stockh[illegible] in the defendant company, has a statutory [illegible] to inspect these registers, and has by nece[illegible] implication a statutory right to take copies of them [illegible] course at his own expense. A right to inspect [illegible] always been held to imply a right to take copies: [illegible] v. Pratt, 30 W. R. 837; Coleman v. West Hart[illegible] Railway Co., 5 L. T. N. S. 266. This is not an a[illegible] by the plaintiff suing on behalf of himself and all [illegible] shareholders, and the cases cited on behalf of the a[illegible] lant are therefore not applicable. The motive ind[illegible] the plaintiff to acquire the shares in the defendant c[illegible] pany cannot be gone into and cannot deprive him [illegible] statutory right: Pender v. Lushington, 6 Ch. D. 70, [illegible] W. R. Dig. 64.

R. S. Wright, in reply.—Debenture stockholders [illegible] no votes, and therefore it cannot be the object of [illegible] Acts to allow inspection and the taking of copies for [illegible] purpose of canvassing such stockholders. [Lin[illegible] L.J.—But the stockholders would have a locus stan[illegible] oppose a Bill in Parliament.] That locus standi is [illegible] given by the standing orders of Parliament made [illegible] after these Acts; the only object of allowing insp[illegible] is that a shareholder may see that not more th[illegible] proper amount of debenture stock remains outst[illegible] and that does not imply the right of taking co[illegible] Chitty's Practice (Archbold), vol. ii., part v., c. [illegible] Bacon's Abridgment, vol. iii., Title, Evidence (F.); [illegible] Grant on Corporations were also referred to.

March 6.—The following judgment of the court w[illegible] delivered by

Lindley, L.J.—The plaintiff, who is a shareholde[illegible] and also a debenture stockholder, in the defenda[illegible] company, by this action claims the right, not only [illegible] inspect, but also to take copies, of the "Stockholde[illegible] Register," under section 28 of the Companies Clauses Ac[illegible] 1863. [The Lord Justice read the section, and con[illegible] tinued:—] The facts are simple. The plaintiff pre[illegible] sented himself at the office of the company in order t[illegible] inspect this register, which he was allowed to do, but h[illegible] was not allowed to take copies of, or make extract[illegible] therefrom. This action was then brought, and Chitty,

J., decided that the plaintiff was entitled to take copies. The defendant company have appealed, and two points have been raised on behalf of the appeal—first, that no right to take copies is given under that section; and, secondly, that even if the plaintiff had such a right, this is not a case in which the court would interfere on his behalf to enforce it. With regard to the second point, the argument is based on two grounds—first, that the plaintiff is merely a nominee in the interests of a rival company; and, secondly, that there has been such a want of candour in the affidavits made by the plaintiff as to disentitle him obtaining the interference of the court in his favour. That the plaintiff is merely a nominee has, in our opinion, been made out, but that fact in itself does not disable him from bringing this action, in which he does not assume to represent all other shareholders, but only to enforce his own statutory right as a registered shareholder. The cases cited, such as Forrest v. Manchester and Sheffield Railway Co., do not touch this; they were cases, not merely of a nominee taking shares, but also assuming to represent all other shareholders. It has, no doubt, been also established that the plaintiff was, to say the least, guilty of a want of candour in his affidavits, but we do not consider he has been guilty of such misrepresentation or deceit as to disentitle him to relief if he is entitled.

Is the plaintiff entitled to what he seeks? The question thus raised is one of considerable importance to companies and shareholders generally, and we therefore considered it desirable to look into the authorities before giving our judgment. The result of my own researches is negative rather than positive. I have not been able to find a single case, either at law or in equity, in which the court has ever held that a person having a right to inspect a document has not also a right to take a copy of it, or so much of it as he requires for some legitimate purpose. The right to take a copy is treated as incidental to the right to inspect, and the common form of orders to inspect is to inspect and take copies. This seems to be the common form at law when a mandamus is granted and when an order is made on a motion in a pending action, and this is, and, so far as I have been able to discover, always has been, the common form of an order to inspect when made in Chancery. A great number of cases on this subject will be found collected in the well-known note to Rex v. The Fraternity of Hostmen in Newcastle-on-Tyne, 2 Str. 1,223, and in Chitty's Archbold, i., p. 511, 14th ed., and an examination of those and other authorities has led me to the conclusion that, speaking generally, a right to take copies is always treated as incidental to a right to inspect. I say speaking generally because I have found an instance of a special Act relating to a company in which a right to inspect has been granted, but a right to take copies has been expressly excluded. One of the Acts relating to the River Dee Improvement Commissioners contains such a clause. Again, there may be cases where the inspection of a document is all that can reasonably be exercised for any legitimate purpose; or a document which a man may have a right to inspect may be in such a dilapidated state as to render it impossible to take a copy of it without destroying or at least seriously injuring it. Again, a person may have a right to inspect the whole of a book or document in order to find out what part of it really concerns him, and his right to inspect may therefore extend to much more than he has a right to take a copy of. When the right to inspect and take a copy is expressly conferred by statute the limit of the right depends on the true construction of the statute. When the right to inspect and take a copy is not expressly conferred, the extent of such right depends on the interest which the applicant has in what he wants to copy and on what is reasonably necessary for the protection of such interest.

The common law right to inspect and take copies of public documents is limited by this principle, as is shown by the judgment in Rex v. The Staffordshire Justices, 6 Ad. & Ell. 84, see pp. 99—101; so is the common law right of the member of a corporation to inspect and take copies of the documents of the corporation: Rex v. Merchant Taylors' Co., 2 B. & Ad. 115. Bearing in mind these principles, it is necessary to turn to the statute on which the plaintiff relies and to see what right it confers upon him. The section which gives him the right to inspect is silent on the subject of taking copies. There is, however, a section relating to another matter (Companies Clauses Act, 1845, s. 119) which expressly gives a right to take copies, as well as a right to inspect. But this section imposes a penalty, and as it was intended to impose a penalty, not only in the case of a refusal to allow inspection, but also in the case of a refusal to allow a copy to be taken, it was necessary to say so in express words and to mention both inspection and taking copies. The fact, therefore, that both are mentioned in this section, while inspection only is mentioned in section 28 of the Act of 1863, does not show that in framing this last section a right to take copies was intended to be excluded. Section 36 of the Act of 1845, which enables judgment creditors of the company to inspect the register of shareholders, would be practically useless if it were construed strictly and so as not to include a right to take copies. A judgment creditor of a company who cannot get paid by the company is entitled to sue all the shareholders in it whose shares are not paid up. For this purpose he must have their names and addresses, and it is idle to suppose that the right of inspection here given does not include a right to take a copy. Similar observations apply, though less forcibly, to section 45 of the Act of 1845, and section 28 of the Act of 1863. But it is obvious that a shareholder or debenture stockholder may desire to consult the whole of the debenture stockholders on some matter which concerns them all; and it is reasonable to suppose that the right to inspect the debenture stock register is conferred to enable him to do this, as well as for other purposes. Parliament having conferred the right to inspect, the court ought not so to construe the statute as to render the right conferred illusory; and if the court were to hold that in such a case as the present the right to inspect existed, but the right to take copies did not, the court would in effect be rendering the statute of no avail. Upon the ground, therefore, that in this case the right to take a copy cannot be denied without rendering the right to inspect practically useless, I am of opinion that the order appealed from was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

to the court for an order that C. & H. should pay to him the sum of money so received from Y.

Held, that the effect of non-compliance with the requirements of the section was that the money was paid by Y. to C. & H. to the use of the trustee, who was therefore entitled to recover it from them.

B. 286.

Jan. 30.—The judgment of the court (Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.) was read by FRY, L.J.—The facts which give rise to this appeal are shortly as follows:—On the 17th of June, 1884, Clutton & Hussey issued a writ against the bankrupt Smith claiming the sum of £50,000. On the 18th of June Smith gave a consent to judgment being entered against him in the action, and on the 19th of June judgment was signed accordingly.

The consent to this judgment was not filed as required by the 27th section of the Debtors Act, 1869, of which more hereafter.

Young owed to Smith a sum of £700 for principal lent and £8 0s. 5d. for interest, and on the 5th of July, 1884, the plaintiffs, Clutton & Hussey, obtained a garnishee order nisi against Young. On the 6th of July the order was made absolute upon the terms that Young should pay £208 0s. 5d. to the plaintiffs on or before the 1st of August then next and the balance of the £700 by instalments; and on the 8th of July the £208 0s. 5d. was paid by Young to the plaintiffs.

On the 10th of July, 1884, the twenty-one days allowed for filing the consent order under the Debtors Act, 1869, expired.

On the 11th of July, 1884, a bankruptcy notice was served on Smith, and in September of the same year a petition was presented on which he was adjudged bankrupt, the act of bankruptcy being non-payment under the notice.

The trustee in bankruptcy now applies that Messrs. Clutton & Hussey may pay to him £208 0s. 5d.

It appears to us that the only claim which the trustee can have against the respondents Messrs. Clutton & Hussey is on the footing that the money so paid to them was money received by them to the use of the trustee.

Cave, J., refused the trustee's application on the ground that the object of the enactment in question was to prevent rivalry between a judgment creditor by consent and an ordinary judgment creditor, and was not to enable the trustee or a creditor or all the creditors to recover money from a creditor to whom it had actually been paid under a consent judgment. The opposite conclusion he held to be monstrous. In this view of the learned judge we are not able to concur. We feel as he did the inconvenience of the enactment, but we think that the course of decision and of enactment in pari materia prevents our giving effect at this time of day to the argument ab inconvenienti.

It is necessary briefly to refer to the course of legislation on this subject.

The first statute which must be referred to is the 3 Geo. 4, c. 39, which was passed, as its preamble shows, to remedy the injustice frequently done to creditors by secret warrants of attorney to confe[illegible] judgments for securing the payment of money. It re[illegible] quired all such warrants of attorney, or a copy of them to be filed within twenty-one days after execution; [illegible] in the event of a commission of bankruptcy after the twenty-one days against the defendant, it declared the warrant of attorney, and the judgment and execution thereon, to be fraudulent and void against the assignees in bankruptcy, unless within the twenty-one days after execution one or other of three things had been done—namely, the warrant had been filed, or judgment signed or execution issued. But the statute not only declared that the warrant of attorney and the judgment and execution thereon were fraudulent and void against the assignees, but enacted that such assignees should be entitled to recover back for the use of the creditors all the moneys levied or effects seized under and by virtue of the judgment and execution. So far the statute dealt only with warrants of attorney; but by section 3, after a recital that "the object of the previous provisions might be defeated by any person giving a cognovit actionem instead of a warrant of attorney to confess judgment," it provided for the filing of every cognovit actionem in any personal action, or a copy of it, "within twenty-one days after execution, otherwise such cognovit actionem and any judgment entered up thereon, and any execution taken out on such judgment should be deemed fraudulent and void against the assignees of the person giving such cognovit actionem under commission of bankrupt issued against him, after the expiration of the twenty-one days, in like manner as warrants of attorney and judgments and executions thereon are deemed and taken to be fraudulent and void by that Act."

As regards a cognovit actionem, the statute contains no express words giving the assignees a right to recover the moneys levied or effects seized, but the intention of the Legislature to place a cognovit actionem in the same position as a warrant of attorney is so clear as to make it probable that no distinction could be drawn with success between the two cases. In fact, the Legislature seems to treat the cause of action accruing to the assignee in bankruptcy as a result of the avoidance of the judgment obtained by consent. This statute contains, it will be observed, no limitation as to the time within which the bankruptcy may occur, or the action of the assignees be brought after the signing of the judgment or the levy of the execution, and the inconvenience which might arise from opening up old transactions under the Act soon attracted attention.

Thus, in Wilson v. Whitaker, 1826, M. & M., Abbot, C.J., pointed out the great inconveniences which might arise from avoiding an execution which had been perfected, and doubted whether the statute would extend to cases where there had been no act of bankruptcy at the time of giving the warrant of attorney.

Before this doubt was resolved another statute was passed bearing on the same subject—namely, the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 60, which extended the provisions of the statute of George IV. to assignees in insolvency, and gave them by express language a right of action against persons who had received the moneys levied or effects seized where the warrant of attorney or cognovit actionem had not been duly filed. Under this statute the doubt which had been raised by Abbot, C.J., again arose, and this time it required decision. In the case of Biffin v. Yorke, 1843, 5 M. & Gr. 428, execution had been issued by the judgment creditor whose cognovit had not been duly filed, and the proceeds paid over to the judgment creditor before the insolvency. The court felt the inconveniences to which attention had been called, but held the language of the statute too clear and too general to enable them to put any limit of time upon it, and the assignee in insolvency recovered.

"It is said," observed Cresswell, J., "that it would be a great hardship if a party could be called upon after several years to refund that which he has honestly recovered. He can, however, be only called upon to refund money which he has recovered under an execution which is pronounced by the Legislature to be fraudulent."

The next legislation which it is material to mention is contained in the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), ss. 135—7. The section with which we are concerned is the 137th. It is obvious that the earlier legislation, whilst dealing with warrants of attorney and cognovits, had not touched consents to judge's orders to sign judgment; and hence a door was opened which the Legislature thought it needful to close; and accordingly, by the 137th section of the statute in question, it was enacted that every judge's order made by consent given by a trader (who thereafter became bankrupt) in any personal action, and whereby the plaintiff should be authorized to sign judgment, or to issue execution should, or in certain cases a copy thereof should, be filed within twenty-one days after the making of such order, otherwise such judge's order, and any judgment signed or entered up thereon, and any execution issued on such judgment, should be null and void to all intents and purposes whatever. This clause gave no express right of action to the assignee in bankruptcy.

On this section, again, the same question arose as under the Insolvency Act in Biffin v. Yorke—namely, whether it could apply to money paid under an execution prior to the act of bankruptcy.

This was in the case of Farrow v. Mayes, 18 Q. B. 516 (1852), where the judge's order, not having been filed, as required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, judgment was signed and execution taken out, and a sum paid by the bankrupt's brother which must be held as a payment under the execution. The assignees under the bankruptcy sued for the recovery of this money, and it was held that they could recover it as money had and received to their use. Then the argument was pressed on the court that the statute was not intended to affect judgments which had been perfected by execution; but the argument was repelled by the judges, who said that the course of legislation made it clear that the enactment was intended to render void all such transactions, though executed before the date of the fiat, without notice of the act of bankruptcy.

Thus matters stood with regard to consents to judgment down to the year 1869, when the Legislature passed three statutes, which must be regarded as more or less parts of one scheme of legislation. The first in order of date was the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; the second the Debtors Act, 1869; and the third the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvency Court Act, 1869, which repealed, amongst other statutes, the Bankruptcy Act, 1849. The fifth section of the Debtors Act, 1869, deals with consents to judgments, and is the enactment on which the present inquiry turns. This section provides that, "when a judge's order, made by consent, is given by a defendant in a personal action whereby the plaintiff is authorized to sign judgment or to issue or to take out execution, then the order, or, in certain cases, a copy of the order, shall, together with certain other documents, be filed as mentioned within twenty-one days after the making of the order, otherwise the order, and any judgment signed or entered up thereon, and any execution issued or taken out on such judgment, shall be void."

The language avoiding the judgment if the consent has not been duly filed is the same as that of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, and the clause is equally silent as to the time within which the judgment shall have been signed or execution levied. The case of Biffin v. Yorke and Farrow v. Mayes clearly apply to this new legislation as they did to the old. The Legislature shows no symptom of any desire to alter their effect, and in our opinion those cases were rightly decided, and we hold, therefore, that the existing legislation does apply, and gives the assignee in bankruptcy a right to recover as money had and received sums raised by execution out of the bankrupt's property.

But these considerations are not enough to solve the difficulties in the present case, because, as we have seen, the money sued for was not money raised by a levy of Smith's goods, but money of Young obtained under a garnishee order, a form of procedure as to which it is, to say the least, doubtful whether it can be accurately described as an execution.

The question is one of some difficulty. The statute, whilst avoiding the judgment, does not avoid any garnishee order obtained upon it, and on general principles and authority we hold it to be clear that in the absence of fraud a payment by a garnishee of the debt due from him to the defendant in the action is a good discharge to him, although the judgment on which the garnishee order was obtained be subsequently set aside (see Westoby v. Day, 1 W. R. 431, 2 E. & B. 605), and this conclusion is not, in our opinion, varied by the fact that the garnishee order gave Young a period within which to make the payment, and that he in fact made the payment before the last day of this period.

But what is the result if the judgment be set aside, and the garnishee order cannot? In our opinion the answer is as follows: When, on the 8th of July, Young paid the £208 0s. 5d. to Clutton & Hussey, he obtained a valid discharge of his debt pro tanto; he paid it to Clutton & Hussey, but to whose use? The judgment was subject to a double contingency, the consent order might still be registered within the twenty-one days, and, if so, the payment would be to the use of Clutton & Hussey, or the judgment might not be registered, but no bankruptcy might take place and no creditor seek to set aside the judgment, in that case again the payment would be to the use of Clutton & Hussey; or, again, the judgment might not be registered and a bankruptcy might occur; in that event the payment to Clutton & Hussey would be to the use of the trustee in bankruptcy. The payment by Young, and the discharge to him, cannot be affected by subsequent events, but the use to which the payment is made follows the validity or invalidity of the judgment, and is determined, therefore, by the contingencies which determine that question. As in the present case the consent was not registered within the twenty-one days, and bankruptcy has supervened, the judgment is void, and the payment made to Clutton & Hussey was made to the use of the trustee of Smith.

No question has been raised as to the competence of the Court of Bankruptcy to determine the issues raised; the proceedings must, therefore, we think, be taken to be valid, and the trustee is, in our opinion, entitled to recover from Clutton & Hussey the £208 0s. 5d.

employed in the mine that the mineral contracted to be gotten should be clean coal of a certain size, that coals sent from the stalls and headings should be paid for at a certain rate, and that no slack should be paid for, but all slack should be deducted. By section 17 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, where the amount of wages paid to miners depends on the amount of mineral gotten, the miners shall be paid according to the weight of mineral gotten, but the owner may agree with the miners to deduct in respect of stones or materials other than mineral contracted to be gotten.

Held (by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., Fry, L.J., dissenting), that the agreement was within the Act, and that the agreement for deduction of slack, being unauthorized by the Act, was void; and that, therefore, the miners were entitled to be paid at the agreed rate for all coal sent up by them.

Appeal from the decision of a Divisional Court (Stephen and Wills, JJ.) reported 35 W. R. 837, 19 Q. B. D. 357.

The action was brought in the county court to recover wages by men engaged in the defendants' colliery. The plaintiffs had signed a document in July, 1886, by which they agreed that the "mineral contracted to be gotten" referred to in the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, should, in all cases, mean and include only such pieces of clean coal as could not fairly be passed through a rake the clear spaces between the prongs of which were two and a half inches wide, and that coals sent from the stalls and headings should be paid for at 1s. 6d. per ton, and heading slack 7d. per ton. It was further agreed that a premium of 2d. per ton on the coal would be paid to all those places whose boxes of coal did not contain an average of more than 112 lbs. of dust each per week, and that no slack whatever would be paid for except that sent out as heading slack, all other slack would be deducted from the different places in proportion to their loading.

By the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, s. 17, "Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine to which this Act applies depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, such persons shall . . . be paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, and such mineral shall be truly weighed accordingly. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall preclude the owner, agent, or manager of the mine from agreeing with the persons employed in such mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or materials other than mineral contracted to be gotten which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten."

By section 18 "The persons who are employed in a mine to which this Act applies, and are paid according to the weight of the mineral gotten by them, may, at their own cost, station a person (in this Act referred to as a check-weigher) at the place appointed for the weighing of such mineral in order to take account of the weight thereof on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed. The check-weigher . . . shall have every facility afforded to him to take a correct account of the weighing for the persons by whom he is so stationed."

The method pursued at the defendants' colliery was as follows:—The coal was brought up the shaft in tubs, and was weighed at a weighing office three yards from the mouth of the shaft in the presence of a weigher employed by the defendants and a check-weigher appointed by the men. The tubs were then taken on trucks some little distance to an automatic machine known as a "Billy Fairplay," where the contents were sifted by being thrown on to a screen through which the slack passed and was automatically weighed.

It was admitted that it was impossible for the check-weigher at the mouth of the shaft also to supervise what took place at the "Billy Fairplay." The men were paid in accordance with the weight of coal raised, as ascertained at the mouth of the shaft, less the weight of the slack as ascertained by the "Billy Fairplay."

The action, which was a test action, was brought to recover the difference between this amount and that proportioned to the whole weight of coal raised.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendants, but the Divisional Court reversed this decision on the ground that the deductions had been improperly ascertained.

The defendants appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and McClymont, for the defendants.—The agreement was drawn up with the object of compelling the men to raise only large coal, and to leave the slack, which is valueless. Slack is not part of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and it may be deducted under section 17: Hynd v. Spowart, 22 Scottish Law Reporter, 702.

Alfred Young, for the plaintiffs.—Slack is coal, and as such, is part of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and cannot be deducted. The agreement is invalid.

Rigby, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it seems to me that the first thing to be done is to state my view of the construction of the contract, and then to see what effect the Act of Parliament has upon that contract. We must take into consideration the circumstances of fact and law existing when the contract was made. It was made after the Act of Parliament was passed, and it obviously referred in terms to the Act. It is a contract that the men should get all the coal in the seams, and not only coal of a certain size, and that they should be paid at the rate of 1s. 6d. per ton for the coal so got. Then it gives the premium of 2d. per ton to stimulate the men to make as little slack as possible. That is not, however, inconsistent with the agreement to pay 1s. 6d. a ton for "coals sent from the stalls and headings." Then it goes on that all slack, other than heading slack, shall be deducted. They treat it as a declaration. It is an endeavour to put upon the words of the statute a meaning which they will not bear. It is true that the men have agreed to this. But what is the object and meaning of the statute. It is, I think, intended to interfere with the freedom of contract, and it forbids the masters to bind the men to contracts contrary to the Act of Parliament. The Legislature intended to protect the colliers just as in the Merchant Shipping Act it intended to protect the sailors. But is a contract inconsistent with the Act of Parliament illegal? I think not. The Act will not let it be recognized as containing the sole contract, but it is valid so far as it does not conflict with the Act. If the wages of the men depend on the amount of coal gotten, then there can be no deductions from that amount, except such as are authorized by the Act, and if any other deductions are made by agreement that agreement is void. There is power to agree to certain deductions, and it is obvious that if it were not for that power no deductions whatever could be made. But they may agree to deduct "stones and materials other than mineral contracted to be gotten." It is clear that if coal is the mineral contracted to be gotten, there is no power to deduct slack, which is, after all, only coal broken small. The contract must, therefore, in my opinion, be carried out without the deduction, and the men are entitled to be paid the full price for the coal raised by them as ascertained at the weighing-office at the mouth of the shaft. As to the case of Hynd v. Spowart, it is not binding upon us, and with great deference to Lord McLaren, I cannot agree with that decision, and I decline, respectfully, to follow it.

It is unnecessary, I think, to determine the question of the correctness of the method of weighing, but I think that directly a case comes within the Act, and the owner claims to make deductions, it lies upon him to show that he has properly ascertained the weight so to be deducted, and that the weighing was such as to enable him fairly to claim such deductions. In my opinion the place of weighing fixed by him, and recognised by the men, was at the pit mouth, and, therefore, until that place was expressly altered, I do not think he had any right to weigh the coals elsewhere.

In my opinion judgment must go for the plaintiffs.

Fry, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ from the view entertained by the Master of the Rolls and my brother Lopes, and I need hardly say that it is with great diffidence, therefore, that I express my opinion.

We are bound, I think, in looking at the statute to endeavour to see what were the evils at which it was aimed and what reforms it intended to introduce. Section 17 states a contingency and contains an enactment relating to that contingency. The contingency is this:—Where the amount of wages paid to miners depends upon the amount of mineral gotten by them; and the enactment is that in such a case the miners shall be paid according to the weight of the minerals gotten by them, which shall be truly weighed. The evils aimed at appear to me to be two; (1) the ascertainment of the amount might take place by measure, or in some way other than by weight; (2) the weighing might be unfair to the men, and the deductions might be excessive. Provision is, therefore, made by the Act both for checking the mode of weighing and also for limiting the deductions.

Now there were, at the time the Act was passed, several modes of payment in existence. The men might be paid according to time, according to the profits of the concern, according to the amount of coal sold, according to the amount of coal gotten, or according to the amount of a particular part or kind of coal gotten, which is, I think, the case here. The Act, in my opinion, has reference only to the case in which payment is according to the amount of mineral gotten. The Legislature were, I think, only minded to deal with that particular contingency. The Act does not avoid any particular contract, but it only says that in that particular case certain things shall happen.

Now, according to my construction of this contract, the mineral to be gotten was not coal generally but entire coal of a certain size, and it was agreed that the men should be paid, not for the whole amount of coal gotten, but for the amount of this coal which ultimately remained of this size. I think that the deduction was only used in order to ascertain this amount. Therefore I think that the contingency to which the Act refers has not arisen, and that this agreement is not within the Act. The Act is a penal one, and I think we should construe it strictly. Even although I am wrong in my view of the contract, I cannot see how the men insisted on receiving 1s. 6d. per ton for all coal gotten when they had agreed that this was to be the price for large coal only, and had agreed to receive nothing for slack.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion in this case as the Master of the Rolls. It is, I think, almost impossible for miners to extract any mineral without also extracting other material at the same time. I think that section 17 was intended to interfere with the freedom of contract for the protection of persons working in mines. Directly wages are made to depend on the amount of mineral gotten the case falls within the Act. I think this agreement was made with reference to the Act, and that, inasmuch as it contains deductions unauthorized by the Act, it is void as to those deductions. Slack is neither stones nor material other than mineral contracted to be gotten. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether the deductions were properly ascertained, since there was no power to make them at all.

I agree with the Master of the Rolls as to the case of Hynd v. Spowart, and I think this appeal must be dismissed.

Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 31—Action for infringement of patent —Grant of certificate—Appeal—"Judgment or order" —Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 19.

In an action for infringement the defendant denied the validity of the patent, and delivered particulars of a number of objections thereto. He established one objection, but failed to establish the others. The judge gave judgment for the defendant, and, upon the application of the plaintiff, granted a certificate, that the validity of the patent came in question, under section 31 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883.

Held, upon appeal by the defendant from the decision granting the certificate, that no appeal lay, as the decision was not a "judgment or order" within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Action for the infringement of a patent. The defence was a denial of the validity of the patent, and particulars of a number of objections were delivered.

Upon the trial before Stephen, J., without a jury, one of the objections only was sustained, the defendants failing to establish any of the others. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendants, and the judge, on the application of the plaintiffs, granted a certificate under section 31 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which provides that "in an action for infringement of a patent the court or a judge may certify that the validity of the patent came in question; and if the court or a judge so certifies, then in any subsequent action for infringement the plaintiff in that action, on obtaining a final order or judgment in his favour, shall have his full costs, charges, and expenses as between solicitor and client, unless the court or judge trying the action certifies that he ought not to have the same."

The defendants appealed from the decision as to the grant of the certificate.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Aston, Q.C. (Carpmael with them), for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that the appeal did not lie.—By section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any "judgment or order" of the High Court of Justice. By section 100 "judgment" is to include decree, and "order" is to include rule. Ord. 58, r. 1, also speaks of appeals from any judgment or order. The grant of this certificate is not a judgment or order. The certificate imposes no burden upon the defendants, as it does not affect the costs in the present action: Penn v. Bibby, 15 W. R. 192, L. R. 3 Eq. 308. It has no effect in this action, but can only affect the costs in some future action. The plaintiffs may disclaim the one bad part of the patent, and the object of the certificate is to prevent the same issues being raised over again in a future action, except that pe eril of the party raising them.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Moulton, Q.C. (Bousfield with them), for the defendants.—The grant of the certificate is a proceeding in the action. The certificate is part of the formal order. It is a judicial act of the judge in the action. It is, therefore, an "order." The Court of Appeal may, it is submitted, under section 31 of the Patents Act, 1883, grant the certificate, inasmuch as by ord. 58, r. 4, it has all the powers of the High Court; and it would be strange if the Court of Appeal could grant a certificate while at the same time it could not hear an appeal from the judge who granted it.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—We must yield to the objection raised as to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the appeal. In my opinion the words "judgment or order" do not include the grant of a certificate. To hold otherwise would have the effect of bringing within the purview of those words a great number of certificates of different kinds. Having come to this conclusion, I do not think that we ought to express any opinion as to the action of the learned judge in granting the certificate.

FRY, L.J.—Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, gives the Court of Appeal "jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of her Majesty's High Court of Justice." By the interpretation clause (section 100) "judgment" includes decree, and "order" includes rule. Therefore this court has jurisdiction to hear appeals from judgments, decrees, orders, and rules. At the date of the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, a judge's certificate was a well-known method of expressing the action of the court. Judges granted certificates under the Patents Act, certificates for a special jury, certificates under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2, in respect of costs, where the plaintiff recovered less than 40s. in an action of trespass, and certificates that a summons at chambers was proper to be attended by counsel. There were these and many other kinds of certificates. It cannot be said, in my opinion, that they come within the words "judgment or order." If, therefore, the Legislature had intended to confer a right of appeal in this case it would have expressly given it. The Legislature is silent upon the point, and so no appeal lies.

WIGHT v. SHAW.

Practice — Costs — Following the event — Claim and counter-claim—Ord. 65, r. 1.

The defendant admitted the plaintiff's claim for £78, and obtained a verdict for £17 on a counter-claim. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for his claim, with costs to the date of the counter-claim, and for the defendant for his counter-claim, with costs thereof and subsequently, including the costs of the trial.

Held, that, no "good cause" having been shown, the judge had not jurisdiction to prevent the costs from following the "event."

Appeal from Denman, J.

The plaintiff sued for £78 15s. for a quarter's rent of a furnished house. The defendant did not dispute the claim, but counter-claimed for £142 13s. 6d. damages in respect of the insanitary condition of the house, which was such that three inmates were attacked with diphtheria, and the defendant was consequently put to expense for medical attendance, and had to do repairs under order of the sanitary authority and leave the house and live elsewhere while the repairs were being done.

At the trial the jury found for the defendant on the counter-claim, with £17 16s. damages.

Denman, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for £78 15s., with costs up to the date of the counter-claim, and for the defendant for £17 16s., with costs of the counter-claim and all subsequent costs, including those of the trial, on the High Court scale.

The plaintiff appealed against the judgment relating to costs.

W. Willis, Q.C., and H. Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiff, referred to ord. 65, r. 1; Jones v. Curling, 28 W. R. 651, 13 Q. B. D. 262; Mersey Steamship Co. v. Shuttleworth, 32 W. R. 245, 11 Q. B. D. 531.

A. G. MaIntyre, for the defendant, cited Baines v. Bromley, 29 W. R. 706, 6 Q. B. D. 691.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the question arises whether the judge had any jurisdiction to make this order with regard to the costs. He could have no jurisdiction to interfere with the costs on the ground that the verdict was wrong. It was suggested in argument that the verdict was the result of a compromise, and unsatisfactory. For this purpose the verdict must be assumed to be right. It seems to me, therefore, that there was no good cause why the judge should order that the costs should not follow the event. It was argued that the order was inoperative, because the costs would go under it in the same way as they would have done if it had not been made. I do not think that that is so. I think it would prevent the master from taxing the costs in the way in which it has been laid down in Baines v. Bromley, that they ought to be taxed in such a case. Therefore, the order is not inoperative; and, as I have said, I think there was no jurisdiction to make it. For these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree. If I could have seen any way in which the plaintiff could have got the balance of his claim without going to trial it is possible I might have taken a different view. I think the learned judge must somehow have proceeded on the supposition that the plaintiff could have got his £60 without going to trial.

LOPES, L.J.—It seems to me clear that the judge has, by his order, prevented the costs from following the event according to ord. 65, r. 1. The judge has no jurisdiction to do that except for good cause shown. The question, therefore, is whether there was any good cause here. It does not seem that there was. The result is that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

In re Brough.
Currey v. Brough. (a.)

Will—Bequest to one for life, with special power of appointment by will—Revocation of bequest by codicil—Effect on power.

A testator bequeathed a share of his residuary personal estate upon trust for his sister for life, and, after the decease of the survivor of herself and the tenants for life of the other shares of residue, upon trust for such of the children of two of his brothers as she should by will appoint, and, in default, upon trust for all such children living at the death of the survivor of the tenants for life, and the children of such of them as should be then dead. By a codicil the testator revoked all bequests whatsoever in favour of his sister.

Held, that the effect of the codicil was to revoke the power of appointment, and that the gift in default of appointment took effect.

Adjourned summons.

James Brough, by his will of the 22nd of November, 1876, gave and bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust, after payment thereout of debts and legacies, to invest the same and pay the annual produce thereof equally between his brothers Thomas and John and his sisters Harriet and Ann during their respective lives, and between the survivors of them during their respective lives, the last survivor to have the whole of such annual produce during his or her life, and after the decease of the survivor of his said brothers and sisters he directed that the said investments and the annual produce thereof should be held upon trust . . . (as to the original or accruing shares of his sister Harriet) upon trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children of his late brothers Arthur and William as his said sister Harriet should by will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for all such children or child as should be living at the death of the survivor of his said brothers and sisters and the children of such of them as should be then dead, such last-mentioned children to take equally between them the share to which their parent would have been entitled if living. And he will contained trusts in the same terms and in favour of the same persons with regard to the original or accruing shares of his brothers Thomas and John and his sister Ann. The testator made five codicils to his will, the last of which, dated the 15th of January, 1870, was as follows:—"I revoke all devises and bequests whatsoever contained in my will or codicils in favour of my sister, Harriet Brough." The prior codicils did not confer any benefits on Harriet Brough.

The testator died on the 14th of July, 1876. His sister Harriet survived him, and died on the 1st of January, 1886, having made a will which was assumed, for the purpose of this decision, to amount to an exercise of the power of appointment over one-fourth of the testator's residuary estate.

Both the brothers of the testator, Arthur and William, left children who were living at the death of John, the survivor of his brothers and sisters, which occurred in June, 1887.

This summons was taken out by the surviving trustee of the will to have it determined (inter alia) whether the fifth codicil operated as a revocation (1) of the special power of appointment given to Harriet Brough by the will, and (2) of the gifts in default of such appointment.

S. Dickinson, for the trustee.

Marten, Q.C., and Wace, for the persons entitled in default of appointment.

R. F. Norton, for the persons claiming under the will of Harriet Brough, contended that in spite of the codicil she retained the power of appointment, as the class to take was fixed by the testator, and not by her, as would be the case under a general power of appointment.

J. Simmonds and Leverson, for other parties.

Kay, J.—Under the will Harriet takes a life estate for her own benefit, and, besides that, this power of appointment amongst the children of Arthur and William. [His lordship read the power and the terms of the fifth codicil, and continued:—] There is no doubt that her life estate is revoked by the codicil. What becomes of the power of appointment? Is that a devise or bequest in favour of Harriet? Some people might think that the exercise of it was rather a burthen than a benefit, but the question is what the testator intended. Did he intend this to be in favour of Harriet? A person who gives to another the power of disposing of one-fourth of his residuary estate is, in my opinion, supposed to intend a favour to that person. The testator meant a favour by it. I do not doubt he considered it was a devise or bequest in her favour, and when he made a revocation, in the form I have read, I cannot doubt he meant to revoke the power of appointment, and that, as to this share, the gift in default of appointment must take effect.

In re Wenmoth's Estate.
Wenmoth v. Wenmoth. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift of income—Period of distribution.

Although, as applied to a testamentary gift of corpus, it is an established rule of construction that, where there is a gift to children as a class made payable on attaining a given age or marriage, the class closes when the first child becomes entitled to a share, and after-born children are excluded, nevertheless such rule will not be applied by the court in the construction of the will to a testamentary gift of income.

This action was commenced by originating summons by the surviving trustee of the will of William Wenmoth, for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court upon several questions. The principal point was whether the same rule of construction ought to be applied to a testamentary gift of income to children as a class as is applied to a testamentary gift of corpus to children as a class.

William Wenmoth, by his will, dated the 19th of April, 1870, after making certain pecuniary and specific bequests, gave to his trustees all his real and leasehold estate, and all the residue of his property, upon trust, out of the rents, interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, to pay certain annuities to his daughter, Eliza McKever; and, subject thereto, the testator directed his trustees, during the life of the said Eliza

(a.) Reported by A. D. Maclaren, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

McKever, to pay and apply the surplus of the said rents, dividends, interests, and annual proceeds, and, after her decease, the whole of such rents, dividends, and annual proceeds, unto and equally between his grandchildren (being the children of his son Joseph and his said daughter Eliza), on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years, during their respective lives, share and share alike. And the testator directed that from and after the decease of any of his grandchildren (save and except the last survivor of them) who should die leaving issue, his said trustees should pay and apply the share of such income and annual proceeds of such grandchild so dying unto and equally between his or her children (if any) who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or marry; and, if there should be only one such child, then the whole to be paid to that one child; and, from and after the decease of the last survivor of his said grandchildren, upon trust to sell and convert into money, and to stand possessed of, the net proceeds arising from such sale and conversion (thereinafter referred to as his "trust fund"), upon trust to pay and divide the same unto and equally between such of his great-grandchildren as should be living at the decease of the survivor of the children of his said son Joseph and his said daughter Eliza McKever and should attain the age of twenty-one years, and, if more than one, as tenants in common; and the testator thereby declared that the share of any grandchild of his in the said rents, dividends, interest, and annual proceeds of his real and leasehold estate should be invested by his said trustees during the minority of any such grandchild, and should form part of his trust fund. By his will the testator also empowered his trustees to apply all or any part of the share of the yearly income, or of the share of the capital of the trust fund to which, under the dispositions thereinbefore contained, any minor should for the time being be entitled, or presumptively entitled, in or towards the maintenance and education, advancement, or preferment in the world or otherwise, for the benefit of such minor during his or her minority, or, at the option of his trustees, to pay the same to the guardian of such infant to be so applied, but for the application whereof by such guardian his trustees should not be liable.

The testator died on the 15th of February, 1871.

Eliza McKever was alive. She had two children, and both of them died under the age of twenty-one years and in the lifetime of the testator.

Joseph Wenmoth, the testator's son, had eleven children, viz.:—(1) Jane Eliza Wenmoth, born March 25, 1862, and now alive; (2) Alice Elizabeth Wenmoth, born January 15, 1864, and now alive; (3) William Joseph Wenmoth, born February 5, 1866, and now alive; (4) Henry Edwin Wenmoth, born September 22, 1867, and now alive; (5) Frederick Wenmoth, born April 25, 1869, and now alive; (6) George Wenmoth, born April 2, 1871, and now dead; (7) Joseph Wenmoth, born June 10, 1873, and now dead; (8) Thomas Francis Wenmoth, born October 29, 1878, and now alive; (9) Edith Wenmoth, born January 21, 1881, and now alive; (10) Joseph John Wenmoth, born April 3, 1883, and now dead; (11) Florence Mabel Wenmoth, born February 8, 1887, and now alive.

The questions asked by the summons were:—1. Whether the trusts of the testator's will for the benefit of his grandchildren (being such children as above mentioned) were confined to such grandchildren as were living at his death or extended (a) to grandchildren born after his death and before the eldest grandchild attained the age of twenty-one years, or (b) to all grandchildren whenever born. 2. Whether the grandchildren of the testator who for the time being had attained the age of twenty-one years were entitled to the whole of the net income of the testator's estate (subject to the defendant Eliza McKever's annuity) and, if not, to what part of such income they were entitled, and whether the plaintiff could apply any, and what, part of such income in or towards the maintenance, education, or otherwise for the benefit of such of the testator's grandchildren as for the time were under the age of twenty-one years. 3. Whether, and to what extent, the trusts of the said will for the benefit of the great grandchildren of the testator, (a) concerning the income of his residuary estate before the death of his last surviving grandchild, and (b) concerning the capital thereof after the death of such last surviving grandchild, were void for remoteness.

His lordship intimated during the argument that he would not give any judgment at present on the third question for decision on the summons.

Whitaker, for the plaintiff, stated the facts.

S. Stephens.—Such of the children of Joseph Wenmoth who were alive at the testator's death are alone entitled to the surplus income: Elliott v. Elliott, [illegible] Sim. 276; In re Coppard's Estate, Howlett v. Hodson, [illegible] W. R. 473, 35 Ch. D. 350.

Dunham.—The class should be extended so as to include the children of Joseph Wenmoth who attain twenty-one years and were born between the death of the testator and the time when Jane Eliza Wenmoth, the eldest of his children, attained the age of twenty-one years, which is the period of distribution, and any child who was born afterwards should be excluded: Andrews v. Partington, 3 B. C. C. 403; Whitbread v. Lord St. John, 10 Ves. 152; Picken v. Matthews, [illegible] Ch. D. 264, 27 W. R. Dig. 234; In re Sayer's Trusts, [illegible] L. R. 6 Eq. 319, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 154.

Jason Smith, for the children of Joseph Wenmoth who were born after Jane Eliza Wenmoth attained twenty-one years of age.—The rules which have been contended for only apply to gifts of corpus. The gift here is one of income, and such rules do not apply: Mogg v. Mogg, 1 Mer. 654; Gillman v. Daunt, [illegible] J. 48; Emmet v. Emmet, 28 W. R. 401, 13 Ch. D. [illegible]; Pearks v. Moseley, 29 W. R. 1, 5 App. Cas. 714.

Ashton Cross, for Mrs. McKever.

Chitty, J.—Where there is an immediate gift to children the meaning of the testator is free from doubt, and is that all the children in existence at his death shall take. The death of the testator is the period of distribution. There can also be no question at the present day, where the legacy is to a class of children living at the death of another person or attaining the age of twenty-one years, that each child who is alive at the death of the testator takes a vested interest, and that the class remains open to let in after-born children until the period of distribution and then closes. Those who were alive at the testator's death and those who were born before the eldest attains the age of twenty-one years are equally members of the class. All children born after that event are excluded. This much is clear and established by a series of decisions which it is too late now to call in question. The explanation of the rule consists in the fact that there are two inconsistent intentions, and both of which cannot be fulfilled. On the one hand there is the intention that all the children should take a legacy, and on the other hand the intention that payment of the legacies should be made to each at a certain time when all the children cannot be ascertained. The court has, therefore, held that the period of distribution is the period of ascertainment of the class. The rule has been called a rule of convenience, but as to this I would simply remark that it is a rule which is very convenient for the eldest children and very inconvenient for the younger ones.

Now that being the rule as regards the corpus of the fund, has the rule any application to the income thereof

As regards the income there is nothing, it seems to me, which requires the application of the rule. Where, as in the will now before me, the distribution is of income and not of corpus the difficulty does not arise. In the case of the distribution of corpus the trustees can never ascertain what is the aliquot share of a member of the class until the class is closed; but in the case of distribution of income the trustees can distribute periodically. There is no reason, therefore, why the rule should be applied to the case of income. [His lordship then read the will as above set out, and continued:—] Thus the persons to take take only on attaining the age of twenty-one years, and there is nothing in the maintenance clause showing that they are to take the income until they attain that age. I think that the general principles which I have already stated do not apply to this case. It was argued that the cases of Elliot v. Elliot and In re Coppard govern the decision in the present case. These cases are not in point, because there was in each a question as to the operation of the rule against perpetuities which would have upset each of the wills, and the decision in each of these cases saved the will. But the question of construction must be decided apart from any question as to remoteness. In Pearks v. Moseley the rule applicable to cases of remoteness is stated by Lord Selborne thus:—"You do not import the law of remoteness into the construction of the instrument by which you investigate the expressed intention of the testator. You take his words and endeavour to arrive at their meaning exactly in the same manner as if there had been no such law, and as if the whole intention expressed by the words could lawfully take effect. I do not mean that in dealing with words which are obscure and ambiguous, weight, even as a question of remoteness, may not sometimes be given to the consideration that it is better to effectuate than to destroy the intention, but I do say that, if the construction of the words is one about which a court would have no doubt, though there was no law of remoteness, that construction cannot be altered or averted to something different for the purpose of escaping from the consequences of that law."

In Elliott v. Elliott and In re Coppard's Estate neither judge refers to the rule against perpetuities, and if I thought those cases were in point I would have to consider them carefully. In the present case there is a gift of income to the grandchildren of the testator who shall be living at his death and to those who have been born since his death, including one who has been born since the eldest grandchild attained the age of twenty-one years. They are all members of the class, but contingently on the attainment by each of the age of twenty-one years. Such a gift is not avoided by the rule against perpetuities. From the power of maintenance [his lordship read from the commencement of the power to the word "minority"] it appears to me that the objects of that power are, amongst others, the grandchildren, and a grandchild born since the eldest of them attained twenty-one years is an object of the power.

It is not necessary to decide any ulterior questions, and the present declaration must be limited to existing circumstances. There will accordingly be a declaration that, as the true construction of the will and in the events which have happened, the income of the trust fund, subject to the annuity of Eliza McKever, is divisible into eighths, one of which is payable to each of the three eldest grandchildren (who have attained twenty-one years of age), and that the other five-eighths are to be applied to the objects of the power of maintenance, and subject thereto any surplus arising from the five-eighths is to be accumulated upon the trusts contained in the will. The rest of the summons to stand over, with liberty to apply.

Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co. (a.)

Debenture—Agreement to issue debentures—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, s. 17.

A "debenture" is a document which either creates or acknowledges a debt.

By a memorandum of agreement a company agreed to pay a person who had advanced money to the company the sum of £600, with interest, and charged certain hereditaments with the repayment of the £600 and interest, and further agreed with the lender that the company would, at any time during the continuance of the security, at the request of the lender, execute a legal mortgage, and, further, to issue debentures of the company to the extent of £600, secured over the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects of the company, including uncalled capital present and future.

Held, that the agreement was a debenture and within section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act of 1882.

The question in this case was whether an agreement, so far as it related to the goods and chattels of a company ordered to be wound up compulsorily, was a debenture within the meaning of section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act of 1882, which is as follows:—"Nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company, and secured upon the capital, stock or goods, chattels, and effects of such company."

The agreement was dated the 3rd of March, 1885, and was to secure the repayment of £600, with interest at £10 per cent. By the agreement the company agreed to repay the plaintiff in June, 1885, the £600, with interest, and charged all the hereditaments comprised in certain deeds specified in the schedule to the agreement (which deeds were deposited with the plaintiff), with the repayment of the £600 and interest, and to execute a legal mortgage when called on; and further agreed to give the plaintiff debentures of the company to the extent of £600, secured over all the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects, including uncalled capital, both present and future, of the company, and that the debentures should be payable on the 3rd of June, 1885, and should bear interest as from that date at £10 per cent.

In October, 1886, the plaintiff commenced this action to enforce the agreement, claiming a charge on the hereditaments comprised in the deeds specified in the schedule, and a charge on all the capital, stock, goods, and effects of the company, including uncalled capital.

Romer, Q.C., and T. Ribton, for the plaintiff, contended that the agreement was within the saving of section 17 of the Act of 1882, and cited Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43, and Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215.

Sir Arthur Watson, Q.C., and Byrne, for the official liquidator.—The agreement to charge the capital and effects of the company should be in the form prescribed in the schedule to the Act of 1882, and should be registered. The word "debenture" is only applicable to documents in a prescribed form and issued in a series payable pari passu.

They cited The Pharmaceutical Society v. The London and Provincial Supply Association, 28 W. R. 957, 5 App. Cas. 857.

Romer replied.

(a.) Reported by V. de S. Fowke, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chitty, J.—The plaintiff in this case sues the defendant company on an instrument set out in the statement of claim, and the company take a legal objection to the action and say that the document in question is void under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, on two grounds, first, that it is one that requires registration, and it has not been registered, and, secondly, that it is not in the form prescribed by the schedule to the Act of 1882, and therefore void under section 9. In answer to these objections the plaintiff alleges that the instrument in question is, in effect, a debenture, and therefore within the exception of section 17. I need not read this section again, it was read in Edmonds v. The Blaina Furnaces Co., and I have but little to add to the general considerations to be found in the judgment in that case as to the meaning of the term "debenture," and the interpretations to be placed upon the wording of that section. In my judgment in that case I mentioned one or two reasons as possibly governing the intention of the Legislature in the formation of section 17. After referring to the two great classes of existing companies—viz., those established by Act of Parliament, incorporating the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and those incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, which are bound by statutory provisions to keep a register of their debentures, I said in that case:—"The Legislature, finding these existing provisions for registration, may have considered that it was not necessary to require the registration under the Bills of Sale Act of the secured debentures of an incorporated company. The Legislature may have acted on this ground or may have taken the broader view that the secured debentures of incorporated companies were not within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Bills of Sale Acts." I would merely add that the argument to-day was mainly addressed to the form of the instrument before me and to the protections which the Legislature has thrown upon instruments of this kind in favour of the grantor, and which seem scarcely required in favour of a company. I am not able to state any other grounds on which the Legislature proceeded when this clause 17 was inserted. Now, looking at this section once more, I observe that it may be divided into four parts; it relates, first, to the thing called a "debenture"; secondly, the "debenture" must be "issued"; thirdly, it must be issued by a particular company—i.e., a mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company; the term "loan" is a little awkward, and I do not know what is meant by a "loan company," but I pass it by, as also the term "mortgage company," which is also not quite clear, because I am satisfied that the words "or other incorporated company" are large enough, and must be construed as they stand, and are not to be cut down by the context; then the fourth part is that the debentures must be "secured upon the capital, stock or goods, chattels, and effects of such company." I am not prepared to say that a charge on the "capital stock" would not have been within the Bills of Sale Act. The material words here are "goods, chattels, and effects."

Now what is a debenture? I am unable to add anything to what I have already stated on this point in Edmonds v. The Blaina Furnaces Co. My attention has been called to an extract from Skeat's Etymological Dictionary and Blount's Law Dictionary, from which it appears that the word "debenture" is an old word, and is derived from the Latin debentur.

Bearing in mind the four divisions of section 17 as I have just given them, I must try and find out what the word "debenture" means. In the course of that argument I asked Sir Arthur Watson and Mr. Byrne to define a debenture, and they produced no satisfactory definition. I do not accept Sir Arthur Watson's attempted definition that a debenture must be one of a series of instruments, or must be an instrument issued pari passu with others. In my opinion a "debenture" means a document which either creates a debt or acknowledges a debt, and any document which fulfils neither of these conditions is not a "debenture." I cannot find any precise legal definition of the term, it is not either in law or commerce a strictly technical term, or what is called a term of art. It must be "issued," but "issued" is not a technical term, it is a mercantile term well understood, "issue" here means the delivery over by the company to the person who has the charge. As to what "company" means, I have already said it must be "an unincorporated company," and it must be secured on the "goods, chattels, and effects" of the company. Having thus gone through the section, once again I find I cannot add anything further on this point to what I have already stated in Edmonds v. The Blaina Furnaces Co.

I now proceed to look at the particular document before me, which I find contains an agreement to pay the £600 on a certain day, to charge certain hereditaments referred to in the schedule, and to execute a legal mortgage when called for, and then, further, according to the words of the statement of claim, which I am obliged to refer to instead of to the original document, because the defendant declined to allow the claim to be amended or to put in the original agreement, "to issue to the plaintiff debentures of the defendant company to the extent of £600, secured over all the capital, stock, goods, chattels, and effects, including uncalled capital, both present and future, of the defendant company, and that the debentures should be payable on the 3rd of January 1885, and should bear interest as from that date at the rate of £10 per cent. per annum." Now this document, it seems to me, is one which creates a debt, shows the extent of a debt, and acknowledges the debt. Apart from the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, this clause would in equity create an immediate charge in favour of the grantee, an agreement to give a charge is a charge in equity, and that is the meaning of Cotton, L.J., in Ross v. The Army and Navy Hotel Co. when he says:—"If the deed (that is the covering deed) had not been executed at all, there would have been in the debenture itself a contract to give such a security as was intended to be given by the deed." I have here a contract to give a charge which in equity is a charge; it is, therefore, a charge on the goods, chattels, and effects of the company; the goods, chattels, and effects form a security for this debt. Reasoning the case out in this way, the result is as plain as it can be on such a section as the one before me, which is by no means plain, that this document is a debenture, and that it is issued, and that it in fact complies with the four points I mentioned above.

I may add this, that if the debenture had actually been issued in compliance with the agreement, it is clear that section 17 would apply. I have here before me a document, not in form the same as a debenture in the commonly-accepted interpretation of that term, but its legal effect is the same, and it would be a strange interpretation to put upon this section to assume that it said that where the legal effect of two instruments was identical, yet because there was some slight difference in form the one should be good and the other void. It is true that the document before me is not called a debenture, but that is no sufficient reason why it should not if effect be one; I cannot read it as Sir Arthur Watson wanted me to read it, as a contract that it should not operate as a debenture; the parties had no such idea in this in their minds at the time, and I cannot impute such an intention to them. I think, therefore, that a mere agreement to issue what are called debentures is not sufficient to prevent the agreement itself from operating as a debenture within the protection of section 17. I cannot assent to Mr. Byrne's argument that after the execution of this agreement it would have been competent for the company to issue further debentures to rank pari passu with this charge.

There is no ground here, on the facts as they appear by this statement of claim, for saying that this agreement is not within the protection of section 17. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to the judgment he has asked for.

Will—Bequest of leasehold house—Subsequent contract by testator to purchase leasehold reversion—Death of testator before completion of contract—Liability of legatee to pay purchase-money—Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 34), s. 1.

Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877, applies to leaseholds.

A testator, by his will made in 1884, bequeathed to his wife the leasehold house "in which I now reside." At the date of his will he was residing in a leasehold house.

In 1887 he entered into a contract with his lessor to purchase the ground lease, but died before completion of the purchase. His widow accepted the bequest.

Held, that the testator's interest in the house passed to the wife subject to her liability to pay the purchase-money.

Originating summons.

This was a summons by the executors and trustees of the will and a codicil of J. H. Kershaw to obtain the opinion of the court on certain questions arising in the administration of his estate. The defendant was the widow of the testator, and she was also appointed executrix of the will.

The testator by his will, dated the 19th of November, 1884, gave to his wife "the leasehold house in which I now reside, provided she shall elect to accept the same, and declare such option to her co-executors within three months after my decease." At the date of the will the testator was residing in a house No. 14, Porchester-square, Paddington, which he held under a lease dated the 20th of April, 1870, for a term of seventeen years from the 25th of March, 1870.

On the 17th of April, 1885, he surrendered this lease to the lessor, and on the 18th of April, 1885, the lessor granted him a fresh lease of the house for a term of seventeen years from the 25th of March, 1885. On the [illegible] of February, 1887, the testator, through his solicitors, offered to purchase the head-lease under which the house held the house for the sum of £2,050. By a letter dated the 23rd of February the lessor accepted this offer, but no formal contract was entered into. On the [illegible] of March, 1887, the testator died. After his death the executors completed the purchase, paying the purchase-money out of the testator's estate.

The widow gave the executors notice that she accepted the bequest of the house.

The chief question raised on this summons was what interest passed to the widow under the bequest to her of the leasehold house in which the testator resided, and in particular whether she was entitled to the leasehold interest which belonged to the testator at the date of his will under the underlease without performing the contract subsequently entered into by him for the purchase of the reversionary leasehold interest, or whether she was entitled to have such contract carried out at the expense of the testator's estate for her benefit.

Phipson Beale, for the plaintiffs.—If your lordship holds that the testator's interest in the house passed to the widow she must pay the purchase-money: Broadbent v. Groves, 32 W. R. 223, 24 Ch. D. 94. Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877, applies.

Everitt, Q.C., and Carson, for the defendants.—The testator's interest in the house passed to the widow: Saxton v. Saxton, 28 W. R. 294, 13 Ch. D. 59. Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877, does not apply to leaseholds, and the testator's widow is not, therefore, liable to pay the purchase-money. In Solomon v. Solomon, 12 W. R. 540, it was expressly decided that the Act of 1854 did not apply to leaseholds. That case was followed by Hall, V.C., in In re Wormsley's Estate, 25 W. R. 141, 4 Ch. D. 665. The Act of 1877 no doubt contains the words "of whatever tenure" and "legatee." The former words were introduced for the purpose of including copyholds, while the word "legatee" only refers to a legatee of an estate pur autre vie.

Phipson Beale replied.

North, J.—The testator's interest in the leasehold house clearly passed to the widow. She must, however, pay the purchase-money. In my opinion, Locke King's Act Amendment Act, 1877, applies to leaseholds. The 1st part of section 1 of the original Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113), contains the words "die seised of or entitled to any estate or interest in any land or other hereditaments," and Lord Romilly, in Solomon v. Solomon, considered that those words, if they stood alone, would include leaseholds. Those words, however, are followed by the words "the heir or devisee to whom such lands or hereditaments shall descend or be devised," and on that ground Lord Romilly decided that the Act was only addressed to lands passing to an heir or devisee, and not to lands passing to a legatee. There were many defects in that Act, and the second Act, of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 69), was passed. That Act was also defective, and the Act of 1877 was passed, and it might well be thought that if failure had attended the first two Acts it would also attend the third Act. But, at any rate, that Act does, in my opinion, include leaseholds. The words in section 1 are "of whatever tenure." It must have been intended that those words should include leaseholds, which were not included in the prior Acts, while freeholds and copyholds were. Then, again, the section contains the words "devisee, legatee, or heir." It seems to me that the presence of the word "legatee" in that section prevents any argument founded on the former Acts from applying in the present case. I think it would be too narrow a construction to hold that the word "legatee" only referred to a legatee of an estate pur autre vie, and not to a legatee of leaseholds. For these reasons, therefore, I hold that Mrs. Kershaw is not entitled to have the purchase-money of the house paid out of the testator's estate.

payment of a life annuity and of various legacies, to be paid, as to one moiety, at the expiration of six months after his decease, and, as to the other moiety, at the expiration of six months after the decease of the annuitant.

A. became bankrupt, and the trustee of his estate entered into possession of the land. Arrears of the annuity and parts of the legacies remained unpaid. The land was sold, and the proceeds were insufficient to satisfy the arrears of the annuity and legacies.

Held, upon motion by persons entitled to the arrears of the annuity and the legacies, that they were not entitled to have the back rents of the land applied in satisfaction of such arrears.

Motion.

By his will George Allen devised real estate to his nephew, George Allen, subject and charged as thereinafter mentioned, and the testator bequeathed to Elizabeth Allen, the widow of a deceased brother, an annuity of £60 for her life, to be charged upon his real estate devised to George Allen. The testator also bequeathed to his nephew, Charles Allen, a legacy of £1,000, and legacies of £500 each to his nephew, P. L. Allen, and his nieces, Elizabeth Squire, Caroline Allen, Eliza Allen, and Esther Allen, all such legacies to be charged upon his real estate devised to George Allen. And the testator directed that the legacies should be paid, as to one moiety, at the expiration of six months after his decease, and, as to the other moiety, at the expiration of six months after the decease of Elizabeth Allen.

The testator died in June, 1865.

In January, 1881, a resolution was passed by the creditors of George Allen, the nephew, who had filed a petition in bankruptcy, that his affairs should be liquidated by arrangement, and John Longstaffe was appointed trustee of his estate, and as such entered into receipt of the rents and profits of the real estate devised to him by the testator.

In 1882 Elizabeth Allen died. There was then due from the estate of George Allen more than seven year's arrears of her annuity and parts of the legacies bequeathed by the testator and charged upon the real estate.

In 1883 the action of Allen v. Longstaffe was commenced by the executors of Elizabeth Allen and some of the legatees to enforce the charge, and in 1886 another action of Garfitt v. Allen was brought by mortgagees of one of the legatees with the same object. These two actions were consolidated. The real estate was sold under an order of the court, and the proceeds, which were paid into court, were insufficient to satisfy what remained due in respect of the annuity and the legacies.

An order was made in chambers "that the rents and profits of the real estate of the said testator received by the defendant John Longstaffe from the 27th of January, 1881, the date of his appointment to be trustee of the estate of the defendant George Allen, a liquidating debtor, down to the date of the sale of such real estate, after payment of the interest on the prior incumbrances thereon, and subject to all proper allowances for repairs and outgoings, be applied rateably in discharge of the annuity and legacies given by the will of the said testator so far as they remain unsatisfied; and the costs of this application are to be costs in the action."

This was a motion to discharge the order.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Eastwick, for the motion.—The annuitant and legatees have no right to recover back rents against a devisee who has been in possession, just as a mortgagee who has not entered into possession has no right to recover back rents from a subsequent mortgagee who has been in possession: Ex parte Wilson, 2 V. & B. 252.

E. B. Cooper, contrd.—The position of beneficiari under a will differs from that of mortgagee, but s sembles that of legatee and residuary legatee. T testator intended the legatees to be paid in full befo the residuary devisee received his share of the estate.

They referred to Birch v. Sherratt, 16 W. R. 3 L. R. 2 Ch. 644; Booth v. Coulton, 18 W. R. 87 L. R. 5 Ch. 684.

North, J.—The annuitant and legatees are in t position of equitable mortgagees. They have a charg on real estate, but they have no legal estate. Th could not have taken possession of the land. Th have not taken steps to enforce their charge b obtaining the appointment of a receiver or otherwis and they are, I think, in the position of a mortgag who has not entered into possession. But a mortgag who has not entered into possession has no right to a account from a subsequent mortgagee who has been i possession. I think the order made in chambers i wrong, and must be discharged. The costs of this ap plication will be costs of the action.

Birmingham and District Land Co. (Limited) v. London and North-Western Railway Co. (a.)

A land company had power, under several agreem with the leasing authority under an Estate Act, to e upon and build on part of the estate houses of a cert value, which were to be completed within a specif period. A railway company promoted, before the e piration of this period, a scheme for a railway pass through the lands in question, and the land comp obtained an indefinite extension of the time for com tion of the houses from the leasing authority. Sub quently the railway company obtained an Act authori their railway, and gave the usual notice to treat to land company, who, however, made no claim. Event the railway company entered into possession, dem that any interest in the land was vested in the l company.

In an action brought by the latter, claiming a de ation that the agreements were still subsisting, and compensation ought to be assessed and paid to the that footing,

Held, that the action would lie, and that the court jurisdiction to make a declaration in the terms asked, exact amount of compensation to be settled by an arbi trator under the Lands Clauses Act.

East and West India Docks Co. v. Gattke., 3 Mac G. 155, and London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cr 34 W. R. 201, 31 Ch. D. 354, distinguished.

Trial of action.

By a building agreement dated the 5th of Febru 1877, and made between M. P. W. Boulton, the lea authority under the Boulton Estate Act, 1874, of t one part, and the plaintiff company, of the other pa it was agreed that for a period of ten years from t 30th of November, 1875, the plaintiff company mig enter upon eight and a half acres of land—part of th estate—for the purpose of building houses of a certai value, paying rent in the meantime until leases wer granted. Power was reserved to the leasing authori to re-enter if the houses were not completed within th specified time.

By another agreement of the 5th of April, 187 expiring on the 30th of November, 1881, between th same parties, the plaintiff company agreed to take three acres more of land and to build thirty-five houses thereon, to be completed within six years from the 30th of November, 1875.

Under an agreement dated the 27th of October, 1879, the value of the houses to be built on the land was reduced, and a number of them were built and leases granted to the plaintiff company.

In 1882 the defendant company promoted a railway scheme which would, if carried out, have rendered necessary the acquisition by them of the land comprised in the agreements. Under these circumstances the plaintiff company applied for, and obtained from M. P. W. Boulton, an indefinite extension of the time for the completion of the houses, and suspended the building operations.

On the 31st of July, 1883, the defendant company purchased the fee simple of part of the lands comprised in the agreements, and with notice of them. Notice to treat was given by the defendant company to the plaintiffs with respect to about one-third of the lands, but no claim was sent in by the latter.

On the 4th of January, 1886, the defendant company entered upon part of the lands comprised in the agreements, but no deposit was lodged, and they gave no bond, as required by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and denied that the plaintiff company had any subsisting interest in the land.

This was an action by the plaintiff company claiming (1) a declaration that, as between the plaintiff and defendant companies, the building agreements were still subsisting, and that the price and compensation payable to them for the lands taken by the defendant company ought to be assessed on that footing; (2) an injunction restraining the defendant company from entering on the lands until they had complied with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Romer, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Woodroffe, for the plaintiffs.—The substantial issue is whether the plaintiff company have any interest in the land. After notice to treat the plaintiff company would not have been justified in continuing to build, as that would have cast additional expense on the purchasing company: Browne & Theobald's Law of Railways, p. 148; In re Marylebone (Stingo-lane) Improvement Act, 19 W. R. 1047, L. R. 12 Eq. 389; Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Woodhouse, 13 W. R. 516. Time was not of the essence of the contract as regards the building agreements, and, even if it were, had ceased to be so in consequence of the acquiescence of M. P. W. Boulton by accepting rent after the time fixed by the agreements: Ex parte Newitt, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D 522.

Ince, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the defendants.—In building agreements time is always of the essence of the contract. The jurisdiction of the court is ousted, and the question ought to be referred to arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845: East and West India Docks Co. v. Gattke, 3 Mac. & G. 155, 173; London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross, 4 W. R. 201, 31 Ch. D. 354, 373.

Kekewich, J.—The defendants, the London and North-Western Railway Co., have, under a special Act of 1883, compulsory powers of purchase over certain land in Birmingham, and under it they gave notice to treat to, amongst others, the plaintiffs, whom they conceived to be interested in the property. No claim was ever sent in by the plaintiffs. Eventually the company entered into possession, making no deposit, and giving no bond as required by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. This action was then brought, and the defendants contend that no compensation is due, on the ground that the plaintiffs have no interest in the land at all, and it is sought to exclude the jurisdiction of the court by suggesting that the question of any interest in the land is one that should go to arbitration under the Acts. Such a question is usually, no doubt, raised either under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, by payment into court and petition, or an action for specific performance after the purchase-money has been fixed by the arbitrator or a jury. But there can be no objection on principle or authority to the court deciding, as between a claiming landowner and the railway company, whether the former has or has not an interest. It would be sanctioning circuity of action and processes of delay if, now that the question is before me in an action, I were to say it must go to an arbitrator.

Two cases have been referred to as establishing the principle on which the jurisdiction of the court is said to be ousted: The East and West India Docks v. Gattke. That case was, however, one where a lessee applied, not to have his land bought and paid for; but for compensation under clause 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, on the ground that his lands were injuriously affected by the works of the dock company. The company tried to restrain a reference to an arbitrator, but the Chancery Division held a person might have his claim against a railway company adjudicated upon by the tribunal instituted by the Legislature, an arbitrator, or a jury. The same point arose in The London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross.

But the case here is very different, for the company say there is nothing at all to determine. The action was commenced rightly, and there could be no excuse, except inadvertence, for the company entering without making the usual deposit or giving the usual bond. What is the claim? It is said that time is of the essence of the building agreements, and that they are now at an end by effluxion of time. Whether it was so or not is immaterial, since I am of opinion that Mr. Boulton virtually waived the completion of the buildings at the original date fixed, and allowed the matter to stand over until the railway scheme was more fully known. Mr. Boulton would, under the circumstances, have been precluded from re-entering under the clause to that effect, since the time for completion had not expired. It is impossible to say what interest the company has under the agreements, but it has some, and I see no difficulty in declaring that these agreements are subsisting down to the present time, for if a reasonable notice to complete were required so as to give a right of re-entry, I can see no indication of any having been given. The actual assessment of the interest will be for the proper tribunal. There will be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

Bastardy — Affiliation order — Service of summons — Last place of abode—Bastardy Law Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 4.

G. L. resided at Sunbury from September, 1886, until the 20*th of April*, 1887, when he went to Southampton to "better himself." He returned to Sunbury for "his things" on the 14*th of May, and on the* 19*th of May he sailed from Southampton to the West Indies. On the* 18*th of May a bastardy summons was left for him at the house where he had resided at Sunbury.*

(a.) Reported by Cecil Chapman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that this was a good service at "his last place of abode" within 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, s. 4.

This was a motion to make absolute a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up a bastardy order to be quashed on the ground that, owing to an insufficient service of the summons, the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order. From the month of January, 1885, to September, 1886, the appellant was a journeyman baker residing at Dorking in the same service with Kate Brett, the complainant, and in September, 1886, he obtained fresh employment at Sunbury, where he resided till the 20th of April, 1887. He then left Sunbury and went to Southampton "to better himself" and stayed there in lodgings till the 19th of May, when he shipped as baker on board a steamer for the West Indies. He had returned to Sunbury for "his things" on the 14th of May, and a bastardy summons at the suit of Kate Brett was left for him at his house in Sunbury on the 18th of May. The summons was heard on the 18th of June in his absence, and the justices made an order against him for 2s. 6d. a week as the putative father of the child.

Taylor, in support of the rule.—Sunbury had ceased to be the appellant's last place of abode when the summons was served there. He had gone to Southampton to get better employment and he had no intention of returning. In Reg. v. Higham, 5 W. R. 507, 26 L. J. M. C. 116, which is the case most against me, there was an animus revertendi. It is not sufficient to leave the summons at what apparently was the last place of abode, it must be actually so: Reg. v. Evans, 19 L. J. M. C. 151.

Mead, shewed cause.—Lee's residence at Southampton was a temporary one. He went there to better himself, but he does not say in his affidavit that he intended to settle there, and he left it as soon as he found a ship. His "things" were left at Sunbury, and he returned there on the 14th of May to fetch them, which shows that he treated that as his permanent residence. He knew that the proceedings were likely to be taken, for the child was born on the 8th of April and the mother had seen him about it. In Reg. v. Higham the facts are almost identical. The man there had reason to anticipate a summons and left his father's house to reside with a farmer in another part of the country without any intention of returning. The summons was left for him at his father's house, and it was held to be good service at his "last place of abode."

He cited also Reg. v. Evans; Ex parte Davis, 22 L. J. M. C. 143; Reg. v. Brown, 24 J. P. 740; Reg. v. Damarell, L. R. 3 Q. B. 50, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 14.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that the certiorari ought not to go and that the order ought not to be quashed. The application is made to set aside the order on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it, as the party upon whom it was made did not appear, and the order was made in his absence and he never received the summons. Section 4 of the Bastardy Law Amendment Act, says: "On the appearance of the person so summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person or left at his last place of abode six days at least before the petty sessions." When this matter came before the magistrates they were satisfied that the summons had been duly served at the last place of abode, and that George Lee was the father. This would not in itself be conclusive, and a party who feels himself aggrieved by an order is entitled to prove that in fact there was not jurisdiction. This is very clearly stated by Coleridge, J., in Reg. v. Evans, 19 L. J. M. C. at p. 155. We have therefore to decide whether the summons was left at the last place of abode. As Cockburn, C.J., says in Reg. v. Damarell: "Proof that the summons was left at the last place of abode is sufficient without more to give the justices jurisdiction." T authorities cited do not much assist us.

In Evans' case the order was quashed, for the su mons was not served at the lodgings where the defen ant last lived, and there was no difference in t character of residence between them and those which had occupied before. In Reg. v. Davis the ratio decide was that four days' residence at an inn before leav for America did not constitute a "place of" abode.

In Reg. v. Damarell a summons was served at a fa house where the defendant had been lodging for s years, and it was held good, although he had left days before for the purpose of going to America. v. Higham is a very strong authority in support of order. There the defendant had left his father's h and had obtained employment elsewhere, and had intention of returning. Now we come to this There is no doubt that the defendant had lived in S bury as assistant to Hopkins up till April 20, 1887, till then that was his last place of abode. Accordi the evidence of one witness he left "his things" th May 14. That is evidence to be considered that he not finally decided to leave these lodgings. He went to Southampton to better himself, not to himself there or to get permanent employment particular work or with any particular person. T certainly nothing to show that his staying there w like staying in an inn. I should have expected t say that he intended it to be his permanent abo he gives no suggestion that it was and no facts abo residence to point to such a conclusion. Looking the facts I can see nothing to satisfy me that the trates had not jurisdiction, and I come to the con that they had and that the service was duly made last place of abode. The rule must be discharge costs.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the authorities assist us much. The facts case must be looked at by themselves. The que a short one—namely, what is the proper inferen drawn as to the defendant's place of abode fr affidavits. He left Sunbury on April 20 and Southampton to better himself. He took lodging he does not say with whom, nor does anyone he was a lodger. He simply stayed there. Can then that Southampton was his last place of ab am by no means satisfied that we can. He w to cast about for employment, and had to liv where meanwhile. He did live at the place but he did not take his goods and chattels days before the summons was served. I think place of abode was Sunbury, and that his at Southampton was a transitory one for a spec pose, and not a "place of abode" at all.

Rule discharged.

Hancock v. Hancock. (a.)

Married woman—Separate estate—Property acquired since the 1st of January, 1883—Effect of covenant in prior settlement to settle after-acquired property—Covenant by husband only—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 5, 19.

A marriage settlement made in 1870 contained a covenant by the husband alone for the settlement of any future-acquired property of the wife exceeding a specified amount (except jewellery and similar articles). After the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the wife became absolutely entitled, under a will made in 1883, to a share of the residuary estate, which exceeded the specified amount, without any limitation as to separate use.

Held, that the fact that the covenant was a covenant by the husband only did not prevent the settlement being a settlement within the meaning of section 19 of the Act, and that the effect of that section was to prevent the separate use given to the wife by the Act, excluding the operation of the settlement; and that, therefore, the wife's share was bound by the covenant to settle future-acquired property.

In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816, not followed.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 166), affirmed.

Appeal from an order of North, J., on petition (ante, p. 166).

The facts sufficiently appear from the report of the case in the court below.

Mulligan, for the appellant petitioner.—The main question is whether there is here "any settlement, or agreement for a settlement," within the meaning of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. A covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in the settlement here was a covenant by the husband (in which the wife, or intended wife, did not join) to settle property coming to him in right of his wife. The property was made the lady's separate property by section 5 of the Act, and, therefore, did not go to the husband in her right, or at all, but remained her own; as she did not herself join in the covenant, it could not bind her property. It follows that there was, in fact, as regards that property, no "settlement or agreement for a settlement," and, therefore, section 19 does not apply. That a covenant by the husband alone does not bind the wife's after-acquired property is shown by Armsden v. Smith, 2 W. R. 435, 2 Dr. 298, and by Jones v. Tredwell, 29 W. R. 793, 18 Ch. D. 354. In re Stonor's Trusts, 32 W. R. 413, 24 Ch. D. 195, and In re Whitaker, Christian v. Whitaker, 35 W. R. 81, 34 Ch. D. 227, there was a covenant by the wife, and therefore the settlement was a settlement within section 19 of the Act, which distinguishes those cases from the present one. If my first contention is right, In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816, is a clear decision in the petitioner's favour, being exactly on all fours with the present case, the lady's covenant having been there held void on the ground of her infancy, and the result, therefore, being the same as if she had not covenanted at all. In that case Chitty, J., pointed out some of the difficulties and absurdities that would arise from a literal construction of section 19.

E. R. Simpson, for the trustees, was not called upon.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of North, J. (made on a petition by a married lady), deciding that the lady's share under the will of her mother is bound by the settlement made upon her marriage. The settlement contained a covenant—undoubtedly by the husband alone—to settle after-acquired property coming to the wife or to the husband in her right, and it is not disputed that whatever he takes by the marital right is bound by the covenant. The property is not, by the mother's will, given for her daughter's separate use, and it is therefore clear that, apart from the statute, the husband would take this fund by the marital right. Then comes the Married Women's Property Act, and gives it to the lady as her separate property. The contention of the petitioner's counsel is that she is not bound by her husband's covenant, and undoubtedly, if the property had been expressly left to her as her separate property by the will, that contention must have prevailed. Is property that is made separate property by the Act in the same position, or is it excluded by the operation of section 19? That brings us to the question, What is the true construction of that section? [His lordship read the section, and proceeded.] It is said that we must not consider the words "settlement or agreement for a settlement" in this section apply except to a settlement or agreement for a settlement by the wife, because of certain difficulties suggested by Chitty, J., in In re Queade's Trusts as likely to ensue from a literal construction of the words. But in my opinion we must give the Act its true construction in spite of the difficulties Chitty, J., seemed to apprehend would arise from doing so. In my opinion the true construction of the Act requires us to say that the effect of section 19 is to prevent section 5 interfering with the settlement, and to put the parties in the same position as if the Act had not been passed. In my opinion, if the difficulties which Chitty, J., felt were ever to arise and come before this court, we should not be justified, if the words of the Act were clear, in not giving them their true meaning, whatever might be the effect of such a construction, and it would be for the framers of the Act, if not satisfied with the result, to endeavour to induce the Legislature to remove the difficulties. This Act, which was passed with the intention of remedying some of the grievances of married women, has, undoubtedly, interfered greatly with their position, and if that has not been in every case to their advantage, they must take the good and the evil together. In my opinion, therefore, this application fails.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Mulligan may be quite right in saying that there is no covenant here by the wife, but it does not follow that there is therefore no settlement within the meaning of section 19. That section says in plain terms that nothing in the Act is to affect what would have been the result of any settlement if the Act had not been passed. It is true that the section is badly framed, inasmuch as it says that nothing in the Act shall affect settlements, while the rest of the section itself does affect them. It is not now necessary to solve the puzzle suggested by Chitty, J., in In re Queade's Trusts. Possibly, if the difficulties he suggested ever really arise in a case coming before this court, the court may get out of them by holding that such a settlement is not a settlement within the meaning of section 19, or in some other way. In the present case I can see no sufficient reason for holding that this settlement was not a settlement, or agreement for a settlement, within that meaning.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The language of the earlier part of section 19 clearly applies to this case, whatever difficulties may result from what follows. This application must be dismissed, with costs.

FANSHAWE v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL DAIRY CO. (a.)

Practice—Mode of trial—Action to restrain nuisance—Application for trial with jury—Discretion of judge—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, rr. 6, 7 (a).

An action for an injunction to restrain a nuisance is not a cause or matter coming within ord. 36, r. 6, so as to entitle as of right any party to the action to an order for trial with a jury.

The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6, followed.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants carrying on the business of dairymen in such a manner as—by noise in removing milk cans at night—to injure the plaintiffs in their enjoyment of houses occupied by them in the neighbourhood of the defendants' premises.

The defendants applied to Kay, J., the judge to whom the action had been assigned, for an order that the action should be tried with a jury. Kay, J., refused the application. The defendants appealed.

Ince, Q.C., and J. H. Robertson, for the appellants.—The question turns on the construction of R. S. C., ord. 36, rr. 2—7.* Under ord. 36, r. 6, the defendants are entitled to have this action tried with a jury unless sufficient reason to the contrary is shown (In re Martin, Hunt v. Chambers, 30 W. R. 527, 20 Ch. D. 365; Clark v. Skipper, 30 W. R. 465, 21 Ch. D. 134), but Kay, J., refused the defendants' application without any such reason to the contrary being shown. [COTTON, L.J., referred to The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6.] The Temple Bar was a special case dealing with a matter specially assigned to the Admiralty Division: Fennessey v. Rabbits, 56 L. T. N. S. 138, 35 W. R. Dig. 158. Ord. 36, r. 7 (a), is not applicable to this application, which comes under rule 6.

Marten, Q.C., and Russell Roberts, for the respondents, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—The first point raised is whether there is a right to require trial before a jury. That point has been decided by the Court of Appeal in The Temple Bar, which case has been commented on by Chitty, J., in Coote v. Ingram, 35 W. R. 390, 35 Ch. D. 117. In Temple Bar decided that a cause only comes within rule 6 of order 36 when it does not come within the class of cases determined by the previous group of rules in that order. That was an admiralty action, and this is an action to restrain a nuisance; neither come within the class of actions assigned to the Chancery Division, but, while the former could not have been dealt with by the Court of Chancery, the latter belongs to a class of actions which formerly could, and can now also, properly dealt with by the Chancery Courts. The question, therefore, arises, is this an action which comes under rule 6 or under rule 7 (a)? I think that the reasons given in the judgments in The Temple Bar show that this action comes under rule 7 (a). It was said that the discretion given to a judge under rule 7 to order a trial before a jury was exercisable only by the judge ex mero motu, but, in my opinion, an application for trial before a jury may be made under rule 7 (a) by any party also, and applications of this kind have even been made to us. Where a discretion is given to a judge by a rule it would be wrong to say the parties are not to be at liberty to apply to him to exercise his discretion.

This application must, therefore, be treated as having been made under rule 7 (a).

Mr. Ince said that the judge ought to have been satisfied that there were reasons against having the trial before a jury, and the case of In re Martin, Hunt v. Chambers was relied on as showing that, where no reason is given for having trial without a jury, the judge could not be said to have exercised his discretion at all. That case was decided on the Rules of 1875. No doubt the parallel rule in the Rules of 1875 to this rule in the Rules of 1883 is in the same terms, but then different antecedent matters were dealt with. It was an antecedent matter to that rule in the Rules of 1875 that any party had a right to have his case tried by a jury unless there was shown some reason to the contrary, and therefore the Court of Appeal, in the case referred to, held that Bacon, V.C., had not exercised his discretion; but now that antecedent matter is gone, parties have not now the general right of trial before a jury.

Rule 6 does not apply to this action, as I have already held, and rule 7 (a) is the rule that is applicable. Trial by jury in such an action as this is not being given as a right, it was for the party asking the judge to exercise his discretion and to give trial by jury to show reasons for that.

When a judge has exercised his discretion it would be wrong, except under very special circumstances, for the Court of Appeal to interfere. In the present case the learned judge has exercised his discretion, and, in my opinion, exercised it rightly.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and adhere to the opinion I expressed in The Temple Bar. Rules 2—7 of this order form a group of rules, themselves containing new regulations as to the mode of trial, and we must not, therefore, go back to the old rules or we shall be misled.

Dealing with this set of rules as they now stand we find, first, that a party formerly entitled to trial by a jury is so entitled still; and, secondly, that a party formerly not entitled to trial by jury is not so entitled now. There were always, however, a class of cases where the parties might have got an order for trial by jury where without such an order, the trial would have been without a jury; and there were also cases where the court would order a trial without a jury where, without such an order, the trial would have been with a jury. Be

* Order 36, rule 3.—"Causes or matters assigned by the principal Act to the Chancery Division shall be tried by a judge without a jury unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order."

Rule 4.—"The court or a judge may, if it shall appear desirable, direct a trial without a jury of a question or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, arising in any cause or matter which, previously to the passing of the principal Act, could, without any consent of parties, have been tried without a jury."

Rule 5.—"The court or a judge may direct the trial without a jury of any cause, matter, or issue requiring any prolonged investigation of documents or accounts or any scientific or local investigation which cannot, in their or his opinion, conveniently be made with a jury."

Rule 6.—"In any other cause or matter, upon the application, within ten days after notice of trial has been given, of any party thereto, for a trial with a jury of the cause or matter or any issue of fact, an order shall be made for a trial with a jury."

Rule 7 (a)—"In every cause or matter, unless under the provisions of rule 6 of this order, a trial with a jury is ordered . . . the mode of trial shall be by a judge without a jury, provided that in any such case the court or a judge may at any time order any cause, matter, or issue to be tried by a judge with a jury, or by a judge sitting with assessors, or by an official referee or special referee, with or without assessors."

even in these respects the law is not new, as rule 5 is really only a substitution for a rule that existed under the Common Law Procedure Act, and the old Court of Chancery had always the power to direct an issue to be tried by a jury. The only new effect of the Rules of 1883 is to shift the burthen of proof to the party who wishes to get a trial by jury. A discretion is given to the judge to make exceptional orders in exceptional cases. The present case is a nuisance case. It seems to me that in such class of cases the judge must be satisfied that it ought to be tried by a jury, and if not so satisfied it must be tried without a jury.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we are bound by The Temple Bar, and in saying that I do not at all intimate that I do not agree with that case. As to the exercise of discretion, it is no proof that a judge did not exercise his discretion because he merely dismisses an application without saying he does so in the exercise of his discretion. I think that in the present case the judge clearly exercised his discretion, and in fact so expressed himself, and on the facts of the case I do not myself see why it should not be more properly tried by a judge without a jury than before a jury.

Appeal dismissed.

LYNCH v. MACDONALD. (a.)

Practice—Mode of trial—Action for redemption—Counter-claim for damages for fraud—Application for trial of action before jury—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 6; ord. 19, r. 3; ord. 21, r. 15.

A plaintiff, in his statement of claim, claimed (1) redemption of certain securities, consisting of shares; (2) damages for wrongful detention and conversion of the shares; and (3) a receiver. The defendant counter-claimed against the plaintiff for (1) an account of what was due to the defendant by the plaintiff; (2) damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, whereby the defendant was induced to credit the plaintiff with the proceeds of certain of the shares which had been sold.

After the institution of the action the plaintiff, under an order of the Court of Appeal, paid into court a sum of money admittedly sufficient—apart from the question of fraud raised by the counter-claim—to satisfy what might be due by the plaintiff to the defendant. Before notice of trial had been given the plaintiff applied for an order for trial of the action with a jury.

Held, affirming North, J., that ord. 36, r. 6, was not applicable, and therefore that the plaintiff was not entitled as of right to a trial with a jury.

An application made on behalf of the plaintiff at the hearing of the appeal for an order that the counter-claim might be tried separately, was refused, on the ground that the plaintiff ought to have made an application for that purpose before reply, under ord. 21, r. 15, or applied before trial to have the counter-claim disallowed under ord. 19, r. 3.

Appeal from North, J., reported ante, p. 136.

The nature of the action and the counter-claim, so far as material, will be found stated in the report of the case in the court below.

The plaintiff made an application by way of motion before North, J., that the action might be tried by a judge with a jury.

North, J., refused the application.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the appellant.—The appellant has a right to have the action tried by a jury, and the judge had no discretion to refuse it: ord. 36, r. 6. The action was, no doubt, originally in the nature of an action for redemption of certain shares. The defendant counter-claimed, alleging (inter alia) fraud and misrepresentation against the plaintiff. From what has taken place since the institution of the action, all that in substance now remains to be tried in the action and on the counter-claim is the question of fraud or no fraud, and that is an issue which the plaintiff has a right to have tried before a jury. A counter-claim, for many purposes, is a separate and independent action, and it is so here. The judge below thought himself bound by Gardner v. Jay, 33 W. R. 470, 29 Ch. D. 50, but that case is really in our favour. "Any other cause or matter" in rule 6 of order 36 means other than causes assigned to the Chancery Division which are dealt with in rule 3.

The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6, was also referred to.

Higgins, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the respondent, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a refusal of North, J., of an application for trial of the action before a jury. If it were admitted that the refusal was a matter within the discretion of the judge, and that he had exercised his discretion, we should refuse to interfere. But it is said that the plaintiff has a right to trial before a jury under ord. 36, r. 6. That rule says: "In any other cause or matter, upon the application . . . of any party thereto for a trial with a jury of the cause or matter or any issue of fact, an order shall be made for a trial with a jury." The rule does not say that an issue of fact which, if it had been a separate cause, must have been tried before a jury, shall be so tried when not standing alone, but only that "in any other cause or matter"—excluding actions assigned to the Chancery Division—an order shall be made for trial with a jury. In my opinion it was quite wrong for the plaintiff here to apply to have the action tried with a jury. The counter-claim is not merely for damages, but extends to matters which are assigned to the Chancery Division, and therefore we cannot treat this counter-claim as an action not assigned to the Chancery Division. The plaintiff, if he had wished it, and had come in time, might, under ord. 21, r. 15, have got this counter-claim tried as a separate action and obtained an order for that purpose; but, in my opinion, we ought not now, on the ground of exercising our discretion, allow him to have it tried separately.

The appeal therefore fails.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Ord. 19, r. 3, gives the court power, on the application of the plaintiff before trial, to disallow a counter-claim if it cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action.

The plaintiff made no application under that rule, and this appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

KNEBWORTH SETTLED ESTATES TRUSTS. (a.)

Settled land—Permanent improvements—Payment out of capital moneys—Approval of scheme—Expenditure in excess of original estimate—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 26.

Where a scheme for the permanent improvement of a settled estate, by providing it with an additional water supply, and thus rendering it available as a building estate, had been submitted to the trustees and approved by them, and in carrying out the scheme it was found necessary to incur additional expense to that authorized by the scheme, the court, being satisfied that the additional expense was incurred for work which fell substantially within the scheme, made an order, under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, directing the trustees to apply the capital moneys forming part of the settled property in payment of the additional expense.

In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, 35 W. R. 463, 35 Ch. D. 41, distinguished.

Decision of Stirling, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J.

This was an application by Lord Lytton, the tenant for life of the Knebworth Estates, to allow the payment out of capital moneys, forming part of the settled estates, of certain expenses in excess of the original estimate which had been incurred in carrying out a scheme, which had been sanctioned by the trustees, for permanently improving the estate by supplying it with an additional supply of water.

In 1885 a contract was entered into between Lord Lytton and Messrs. Spencer, Carter, & Co. for the provision of and distribution of an increased supply of water to a part of the property which had been laid out as a building estate, and also to the mansion-house, for the sum of £993 13s. A scheme was submitted to the trustees which referred to the contract, and was accompanied by a report of a surveyor who had been appointed by the Land Commissioners. In July, 1885, the trustees approved the scheme.

In carrying out the scheme it was found necessary to execute additional works at an expense considerably in excess of the amount named in the original contract. The cost of the additional works, which were certified to have been necessary, and properly executed, amounted to £850.

The question was whether the tenant for life was entitled to an order, under section 26 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, directing the trustees to apply the capital moneys, forming part of the settled property, in payment of the additional expense.

Stirling, J., on the authority of In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, 35 W. R. 463, 35 Ch. D. 41, refused the application.

The tenant for life appealed.

On the appeal the claim in respect of two sums, amounting to £200, which had been expended by the tenant for life on the improvement of the mansion-house on his own authority, was abandoned.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Lambert, for the appellant.—The additional expenses were incurred for work which was necessary for the proper execution of the scheme which was approved by the trustees. In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, upon which Stirling, J., based his refusal of our application, does not apply. In that case no scheme was submitted till after the improvements had been executed.

They referred to the Settled Land Act, 1882, ss. 21, 25, 26.

HALSBURY, C.—In this case no doubt various difficulties might be suggested in the abstract as to the meaning of the word "scheme" as used in this section, and as to the limits within which the expenditure authorized is to be confined. A definition might be given to it which, if narrowly insisted on, would render the Act unworkable. At the same time, it may be that, where the trustees have approved of a scheme limiting the expenditure to a certain amount, the excess of expenditure may be so large, and constitute so wide a departure from the scheme as approved, as practically to amount to a substitution of a new scheme for that which was approved of by the trustees. It is, therefore, impossible to lay down any general rule on the subject. Each case must be governed by its own particular circumstances. Looking at the scheme submitted to the trustees, and of which substantially they signified approval, we find that it was a scheme for improving the value of the Knebworth Estate, part of which was intended for a building estate, by giving it a sufficient supply of water. The scheme submitted, provided for getting water from a well and storing that water in a tank from which, by force of gravitation, it might be distributed to portions of the estate. I cannot believe that the trustees, in giving the approval which they gave to the scheme, were misled as to the amount of expenditure that would be required and other additional expenses which were not contemplated by them or the tenant for life when the scheme was submitted to them. The substantial plan, however, for which it was intended to charge the capital moneys in the hands of the trustees was the execution of works in accordance with the scheme which was originally submitted, and, although further operations were not contemplated, still I am of opinion that, striking out from these additional expenses the claims which have been abandoned, the additional works fell substantially within the scheme, and that an order may be made.

COTTON, L.J.—I should add nothing if it were not a case of importance on the Act, and, in fact, this is a case on the point, for it is not at all similar to In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, where the works were done without any scheme having been submitted either to the trustees or to the court.

The question we have to consider is whether the works which have been done, and in respect of which the additional expense not contemplated originally was incurred, were works which substantially fell within the scheme which was approved. It must be observed that the approval of the trustees was not conditional upon the works being completed for £993, and I am of opinion that the additional expense, after deducting some £200 in respect of items which have been abandoned, was incurred for works which were included in the proper execution of the scheme which was, in substance, approved by the trustees. The scheme, as stated by the Lord Chancellor, was for the purpose of obtaining a sufficient supply of water by deepening one of the wells on the estate and raising the water from it to a tower and distributing it over the estate. In carrying out that scheme it was found necessary, not only to sink the well lower than had been contemplated, but also to provide for storing the water by making underground headings, increase the size of the tanks and to do various other things which fell within the proper execution of the scheme which had been approved, but which had not been mentioned either in the scheme or specification. Take the case of the extra expenses incurred in sinking the well. If the trustees have approved of the particular work, and if that further sinking was necessary effectually to carry out that work, then I think that it was fully within the scheme and plan approved by the trustees. That being so, I think we may make the order for the reduced amount.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The inquiry which we have to entertain is this—What in fact is the scheme which was approved? Was the scheme which was laid before the trustees approved as a whole or in part only? That must require careful consideration in each case. It is obvious from the section that the proposals with reference to the expenditure to be incurred in the execution of the schemes form a substantial part of every scheme which is to be laid before the court or the trustees, and the approval to be given will be one which has some reference to such proposed expenditure without necessarily in substance requiring any limit as to expense. A scheme may be approved generally or subject to conditions as to expenditure. Probably if no limit was specified the trustees would be considered to impose, and a reasonable limit of expenditure in their opinion. But it may be that the scheme may be general without any condition. Was there any condition imposed in this case on the approval of the scheme, which, having regard to the end proposed, would exclude this proposed expenditure? I think the broader view of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice is the better view, that the scheme approved was a general one for the supplying the estate with water, and that no condition was imposed, and that consequently the application of the tenant for life in its amended form may be acceded to. The appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Income tax—Vicarial tithe rent-charge—Deduction of the cost of collection—Annual value—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35)—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34).

A tithe-owner is entitled to deduct from the assessment to income tax in respect of a vicarial commutation tithe rent-charge, the amount which he is compelled to expend in addition in order to realize the tithe.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (35 W. R. 839, 19 Q. B. D. 442) affirmed.

Appeal from a divisional court (A. L. Smith and Williams, JJ.), reported 35 W. R. 839, 19 Q. B. D. 442.

The Rev. Dr. Stevens, Vicar of Portslade, Sussex, was assessed to the income tax for the year ending April 5, 1884, in respect of the vicarial commutation tithe rent-charge in the sum of £142 4s. 11d., which he admitted to be the amount receivable by him in respect of such tithe rent-charge. He claimed to deduct from this sum £[illegible], costs necessarily incurred by him in the collection of the tithe rent-charge.

It was admitted that he was compelled to expend this sum in order to realize the tithe.

The Divisional Court held that he was entitled to the deduction, and the Solicitor of Inland Revenue appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and A. V. Dicey (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), for the appellant.—The question is, under which rule of the Act of 1842 is the rent-charge to be assessed? It is not under rule 1 of schedule A., because it is incapable of occupation; nor under rule 2, because it is not a commutation of tithes arising from lands. Therefore it falls within section 10 of No. IV. of schedule A., and the person assessed is not entitled to any deduction except those expressly given by section 32 of the Act of 1853. The deductions given by that section evidently contemplate the gross return, and no other deductions can be made.

They cited Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315.

F. M. White, Q.C., and Tyrrell Paine, for the respondent.—It would be a great hardship to say that a person must pay income tax on the whole amount which a person was entitled to receive, and not merely on that which he actually did receive. The assessment falls under rule 1 of schedule A. of the Act of 1842. The tithe rent-charge is to be taken as capable of occupation for the purpose of being rateable, and in order to fix the worth at which it could be let by the year the cost of necessary collection will be deducted.

A. V. Dicey replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 15.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the clerical owner of a tithe commutation charge has been assessed to income tax, and a question arises as to the proper mode of assessment. What is the valuation on which income tax is to be levied, and can the person assessed deduct the expenses of collection? He is assessed under section 32 of the Act of 1853, which runs thus:—"In assessing and charging the duties under schedule A. of this Act in respect of lands, tenements, or hereditaments subject to any rent-charge under the Act for the commutation of tithes in England, or any other rent-charge in lieu of tithe, it shall be lawful for the commissioners, acting in the execution of this Act, if they shall think fit, on a due return of such rent-charge being made by the owner thereof in order to an assessment upon him, to charge and assess such owner in the assessment for the said parish with the duty under schedule A. of this Act in respect of such rent-charge." It is not contested that the return has been made, and that the commissioners have exercised whatever option is given them. He is therefore assessed with the duty granted by the Act. Section 5 gives the method in which such assessment is to be carried out: "The duties hereby granted shall be assessed, raised, levied, and collected under the regulations and provisions of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35." It is an enactment and declaration that the assessment under schedule A. of the later Act is to be made under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The effect of that is to read into the Act of 1853 all the regulations and provisions of the earlier Act. They must therefore apply to this case, whether the words are exactly applicable or not, since it is expressly enacted that they shall apply. Any argument that they are inapplicable is, therefore, immaterial. We are driven, therefore, to see what was the mode of assessment prescribed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The method of assessment under that Act is contained in schedule A. It may be difficult to apply those provisions to such a case as this, but, as I said before, they must be applied.

In my opinion rule 1 of schedule A. is the rule applicable: "The annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages charged under schedule A. shall be understood to be the rent by the year at which the same are let at a rack rent, if the amount of such rent shall have been fixed by agreement commencing within the period of seven years preceding the 5th day of April next before the time of making the assessment; but, if the same are not so let at rack rent, then at the rack rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year, which rule shall be construed to extend to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments or heritages capable of actual occupation." It has been suggested that that rule cannot apply because this tithe rent-charge is incapable of actual occupation. To my mind there are two views to be taken of the rule. In the first place, it is by no means clear that the rule is exclusive. Matters incapable of actual occupation may very well be within the rule. But, in the second place, we must make the words apply, because we are forced by section 5 of the later Act to do so. This case cannot be brought within rule 2, because the descriptions there given will not admit it. It must, therefore, fall under rule 1.

I do not think that any of the other sections which were cited to us apply to the case of the assessment of a tithe rent-charge, or, if they do apply, they only direct the mode in which the assessment shall be carried out. Therefore, I think this tithe rent-charge had to be assessed under rule 1.

It follows, then, that the amount is to be the amount at which it would let at a rack rent. The cost of a merely optional collection could clearly not be deducted. Such a cost would not be taken into account in fixing the rack rent. But in this case we have it found that the amount could not be realized without this expenditure in the collection. In such circumstances there is no doubt that in fixing the rack rent the cost of collection would be taken into consideration and deducted. Therefore, I think that the cost of collection must be deducted from this assessment, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

The following judgment was read by

Fry, L.J.—I am of opinion that, under the statute of 1842, tithe rent-charge was not a hereditament charge under rule No. I. of schedule A. as a separate hereditament, but that it was assessed as part of the annual value of the lands, and was (under No. IV., rule 4) assessable either on the occupier of the land or on the person liable to pay the rent-charge—i.e., to speak popularly, on either the farmer or the landlord—that it could not be assessed on the rector or vicar, and that it was assessed on the gross amount of the rent-charge.

This was altered by the statute of 1853 to this extent, that the commissioners were authorized to assess the rent-charge on the rector or vicar under schedule A., and by section 5 the earlier statute of 1842 was made applicable to the income tax under the later Act. For the first time, then, the rent-charge is treated as a separate and independent hereditament chargeable as such under schedule A. on the occupant or quasi-occupant of the hereditament—i.e., on the rector or vicar—and if it is to be so chargeable it appears to me that the annual value can be ascertained only in the way pointed out by the general rule (No. I.)—i.e., by treating the annual value as equal to the annual rent when the property was let at the rack rent, and, if not, then at the rack rent at which the same is worth to let by the year.

It tends to confirm this conclusion that the statute of 1853 itself appears to show an intention that the amount to be charged under the new method of assessment—i.e., on the recipient of the rent-charge—should be different from that received under the older methods. I refer to the provision as to the deduction of the parochial rates and the special provisions as to deductions in Ireland.

I conclude, then, that on the method of assessment followed in the present case, seeing that the tithes were not let, we must find the rack rent at which they would let, and this clearly could not exceed their gross amount less the reasonable remuneration for collection. I hold, therefore, that the deduction was rightly claimed by Dr. Stevens, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—The combined effect of section 32 and schedule A. of the Act of 1853 is that this tithe rent-charge must be assessed on its annual value. How is that to be ascertained? We are sent by section 5 to the schedule A. of the Act of 1842, which by rule I gives us the method of arriving at the annual value of such hereditaments when not let at rack rent. I am of opinion that this tithe rent-charge would let for an amount which would be calculated on the basis that the necessary and proper cost of collection should be deducted. Therefore I agree with the Divisional Court that such cost should be deducted from the assessment, and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Highworth and Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Emancipation—Acquisition of settlement after attaining the age of sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 34.

By section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, where any person shall have resided for the space of three years in any parish in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would make him irremoveable, he shall be deemed to be settled there.

By section 35 no person shall be deemed to have acquired a settlement from any other person, whether by marriage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

The pauper, E. W., who had always been physically incapable of work, was the legitimate daughter of C. W. and M. W., and was born in the appellant union, in which her father was settled, on the 27*th of October,* 1861. 1862 she and her parents went to reside in the N. Union, where her father, C. W., died in 1868. In 1871 her mother, M. W., married again. On the 27*th of October* 1877, the pauper attained the age of sixteen, and on the 5*th of June,* 1880, she began to receive relief from the N. Union. In November, 1885, the pauper, with her mother and stepfather, with whom she had always resided, moved into the respondent union, where on the 21*st of September,* 1886, she became chargeable.

Held, by the Divisional Court (Stephen and Grantham JJ.), on the authority of R. v. Elvet, 7 W. R. 599; E. & E. 266, that she had acquired a settlement in the N. Union.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that she had not resided in the N. Union so as to acquire a settlement after she had attained the age of sixteen, and that she retained a settlement derived from her father, since her mother, on her second marriage, ceased to be a widowed mother, and that she was therefore settled in the appellant union.

Every child, on attaining the age of sixteen, which such child continues a member of its father's family or not, and whether mentally or physically incapable or not, is, for the purposes of settlement, emancipated, and capable of acquiring a settlement for itself.

Special case.

This was an appeal by the guardians of the poor of the Highworth and Swindon Union against an order for the removal of a pauper named Eliza Wait from the Westbury-on-Severn Union, in the county of Gloucester.

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker and A. P. Perceval Keep, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

to the union of the appellants, on the ground that the pauper was legally settled in the parish of Rhydgwern, in the county of Glamorgan, in the Newport Union, by reason of a three years' residence there.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Lopes, L.J. :—

The order of removal was made on the 18th of March, 1887. The pauper Eliza Wait is the lawful daughter of Charles and Matilda Wait, and was born on the 27th of October, 1861, in the parish of Wanborough, in the appellant union. Charles Wait was born in the same parish.

In 1862 the father and mother, with the pauper, left Wanborough and went to reside in the parish of Rhydgwern, in the county of Glamorgan, in the Newport Union.

The father died at Rhydgwern about the 2nd of August, 1863.

The mother and the pauper continued to reside at Rhydgwern, and in 1871 the widow married George Gibbs, and they continued to reside with him until he died there in 1884.

The mother married her present husband, James Woodman, in November, 1885, and they, with the pauper, resided in Rhydgwern until the 9th of November, 1886, when they went to reside at Adsett, in the parish of Westbury-on-Severn, in the Westbury-on-Severn Union, in the county of Gloucester (the respondent union).

On the 1st of September, 1886, the pauper became chargeable to the respondent union, whereupon the said order of removal was made, whereby it was adjudged that the last legal settlement of Eliza Wait was in the parish of Wanborough, in the appellant union.

On the 27th of October, 1877, the pauper attained the age of sixteen. The pauper was in receipt of relief from the Newport Union from the 5th of June, 1880, up to the time of her going to Adsett on the 9th of November, 1886.

The pauper is now residing with, and always has lived with, her mother, and now is and always has been physically incapable of work.

It is to be assumed that the pauper, being physically incapacitated, would have been regarded as unemancipated under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61). It is also a fact that she resided in Rhydgwern from 1862 to the 5th of June, 1880, without having received relief.

R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellant Union.—The question is whether the pauper has gained a settlement at Rhydgwern or not: The Guardians of Keynsham v. The Guardians of Bedminster, 26 W. R. 591, 3 Q. B. D. 79; Reg. v. Elvet, 7 W. R. 586, 2 Ell. & Ell. 266. The fact that in this case the pauper was residing with her mother did not prevent her from gaining an independent settlement.

He also cited Guardians of Holborn v. Guardians of Chertsey, 33 W. R. 344, 14 Q. B. D. 289, and on appeal 34 W. R. 498, 15 Q. B. D. 76; R. v. Leeds Union, 27 W. R. 708, 4 Q. B. Fraser McLeod, for the respondent union.—The pauper was unemancipated so long as she remained part of her mother's family, and was incapable of acquiring an independent status of irremoveability. The settlement of the pauper, therefore, will be her own last settlement, the parish of Wanborough.

He cited R. v. St. Olave's, 22 W. R. 75, L. R. 9 Q. B. 228; Guardians of Salford v. Overseers of Manchester, 27 W. R. 380, 10 Q. B. D. 172; R. v. Inhabitants of Cowarne, 2 B. & Ad. 861.

R. Cunningham Glen in reply.

Stephen, J.—In this case we must consider the position of the pauper at the time when she became chargeable, and whether at that time she had acquired any settlement of her own. Now, previously to the 5th of June, 1880, the pauper had resided in the parish of Rhydgwern for a number of years after her father's death, with her mother first, and then with her mother and stepfather.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that she became irremoveable and acquired a settlement in that parish. It is said that she did not reside so as to acquire a settlement, because the statute of 1876 does not apply to unemancipated children. But, in the first place, whether the pauper was unemancipated seems to be rather a matter of inference than of definite proof. I do not think that mere physical incapacity is necessarily proof that the pauper was unemancipated. Apart from that, however, I am of opinion that section 35 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61 very materially alters the state of the law with regard to these matters.

In the next place we have to consider the position of the girl at the time the order of removal was made, when her father's and mother's settlements were, so far as she was concerned, gone, the sole question being whether this girl had acquired any settlement of her own. There is certainly some difficulty in reconciling the statement of Hawkins, J., in the case of The Guardians of Salford v. The Overseers of Manchester with that he made in The Guardians of Holborn v. The Guardians of Chertsey. But it is not necessary to enter minutely into that, because in the case of Reg. v. Elvet all of the learned judges who decided the case speak of a girl as obtaining a status of irremoveability by residence with her father; and Erle, J., said, "when her father died the pauper had acquired an independent status of irremoveability, which she retained down to the time that the order of removal was made."

Now that case does not appear to me to be distinguishable in principle from the present case; and therefore, upon the same principle, it seems to me that this pauper did acquire a status of irremoveability in each year of her residence, although during such residence she lived with her mother and shared the house of her stepfather. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment here must be for the appellants, with costs.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion. She acquired irremoveability although she was unemancipated. This case is very similar to Reg. v. Elvet.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—The judgment of the Court (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.) was read by

Lopes, L.J.—This case raises important questions under the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. [His lordship then stated the facts as set out above, and continued:—] In our opinion the case is governed by sections 34 and

35. It will be necessary, therefore, carefully to consider these two sections. Section 35 abolishes all derivative settlements, except that which a wife may take from her husband and a child under sixteen may take from its father, if alive, or from his widow after his death, if she has acquired a settlement in her own right between the time of the death of the father and the child's attaining sixteen. Previously to the passing of this statute great expenses were often incurred by parishes in tracing remote derivative settlements and difficult steps in family pedigrees; and it was with a view to obviate this mischief that the 35th section was introduced into the Act, which at a stroke prohibits any question of a derivative settlement being entered upon beyond the two derivative settlements expressly mentioned: see R. v. Guardians of the Poor of Bridgnorth, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 314. But the provision with regard to the child is most important. It is only while the child is under sixteen that it is to be capable of taking the derivative settlement of the father or widowed mother; any settlement acquired by the parents after the child attains sixteen is not to be communicated to the child, but the child is to retain the derivative settlement it had when it attained sixteen, until it acquires another. The language in the latter part of section 35 is clear and distinct. It declares that every child under the age of sixteen "shall take the settlement of its father and of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." The Legislature hereby positively enacts what settlement a child shall take and hold up to sixteen and until it acquires another. The settlement of every child before sixteen and until it acquires another is definitely fixed and determined by the latter part of section 35. There is no qualification or limitation to the word "child," and we think that the doctrine of emancipation as it existed before 1876 can no longer prevail, and that every child on attaining the age of sixteen, whether such child continues a member of its father's family or not, and whether mentally or physically incapable or not, is for the purposes of settlement emancipated, and is rendered capable of acquiring a settlement for itself. Adopting this view of section 35, we have now to consider what the position of the pauper was on the 27th of October, 1877, when she attained sixteen. The father died in 1868. Up to that time she took his settlement, which was in Wanborough, in the appellant union, which settlement she would retain up to sixteen, unless her mother in the interval, whilst a widow, acquired a settlement in her own right, when she would take that settlement up to sixteen, and retain it until she acquired another. Her mother never acquired a settlement in her own right. Her mother has twice married, and would on each occasion take her husband's settlement. Under the law before the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, the mother's settlement so acquired would not have been communicated to the pauper, and under the 35th section of the statute the same result, in our opinion, follows, because on the second marriage of the pauper's mother she ceased to be a widowed mother, and consequently her settlement by such second marriage would not be communicated to her child. Therefore, under the provisions contained in section 35, the pauper would retain her father's settlement in Wanborough until she acquired another. Has she acquired another? It is said that she has acquired a settlement in Rhydgwern by three years' residence under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act. To have acquired this settlement she must have resided in Rhydgwern for the term of three years in such a manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render her irremoveable. But this must mean a residence after she attained sixteen, because up to that time she took her father's settlement and retained it until she acquired another. The pauper, in fact, has not resided in Rhydgwern so as to acquire a settlement there since she attained sixteen, because, attaining sixteen on the 27th of October, 1877, she was in receipt of relief on the 5th of June, 1880, and continued in receipt of relief up to the 9th of November, 1885, when she went to Adsett, where, on the 21st of September, 1886, she became chargeable.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the pauper has not acquired a settlement in Rhydgwern, but is settled in Wanborough, in the appellant union, the place of her father's last legal settlement.

The decision of the court below must be reversed, and this appeal must be allowed.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — Feb. 11, 13.

In re Arnold.

Ravenscroft v. Workman. (a.)

Will — Construction — Charitable legacy — Residue — Mortmain — Direction to marshall assets — Real estate — Land in colony.

Testatrix gave all her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to convert and pay debts and legacies; she gave several legacies, and directed that they should, in the first instance, be payable out of her real and leasehold estate. She then directed her trustees to divide the residue into three equal parts between three charities, and provided "that the foregoing charitable legacies shall be paid exclusively out of such part of my pure personal estate as is legally applicable for that purpose." The testatrix left pure and impure personalty; the only real or leasehold estate she possessed was at Cape Town, and not subject to the Mortmain Acts.

Held, that the provision for payment of the charitable legacies was equivalent to a direction that the residue should consist of pure personalty, and that that was a direction to marshal the assets in favour of the charities. The legacies must be paid out of the real estate at Cape Town, and the balance of the legacies and the debts and administration expenses must be paid out of the impure personalty, leaving the pure personalty for the charities.

Further consideration.

The question was whether, on the true construction of the will of Mrs. Arnold, her debts and legacies ought to be paid out of impure personalty, so as to leave her pure personalty to form part of the residue bequeathed to charities.

The testatrix gave to trustees all her real and personal estate upon trust for sale and conversion, and out of the moneys thus produced to pay debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies. She gave several pecuniary legacies, and directed that all the above legacies should be paid as soon as conveniently might be after her death, and should, in the first instance, be chargeable upon and payable out of the proceeds of sale of her real and leasehold estate (if any), and as to all the rest and residue of her estate not thereby already disposed of, she directed that her trustees should divide the sum into three equal parts, and should pay one such third part to the Bishop of Cape Town for certain charitable objects, and another to the Bishop of Lahore for similar purposes, and the other to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts and the Additional Curates' Aid Society. And she directed "that the foregoing charitable legacies shall be paid exclusively out of such part of my pure personal estate as is legally applicable for that purpose."

By the chief clerk's certificate it appeared that the estate consisted of cash and other pure personalty, money invested on mortgage or otherwise connected with land, and freehold property at Cape Town, which, according to the law of Cape Colony, passed by the will, and could be given by will for charitable purposes.

The testatrix had no real estate in this country.

It was stated that the Cape Town property would not be more than enough to pay the legacies.

Horace Smith, Q.C., and Fellows, for the trustees of the will.

Martin, Q.C., and C. Williams, for the next of kin and heir-at-law.—The debts and administration expenses ought to be paid rateably out of the real estate (after paying the legacies), the impure personalty, and the pure personalty, and then the residue of the pure personalty will go to the charities. It is only a gift of the residue, and there is no direction to marshall the assets in favour of the charities: Beaumont v. Oliveira, 17 W. R. 41, 269, L. R. 4 Ch. 309.

Stock, for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and the Additional Curates' Aid Society.—The testatrix directs that the residue is to consist entirely of pure personalty; that is equivalent to a direction to marshall: Wills v. Bourne, L. R. 16 Eq. 487.

Dacinous Sturges, for the Bishop of Cape Town.—The word "exclusively" shows that the testatrix meant the whole of the pure personalty to be reserved for the charities: Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., p. 236; Miles v. Harrison, 22 W. R. 441, L. R. 9 Ch. 316. The land at Cape Town is not affected by the Mortmain Acts, and the surplus of it, after paying legacies, should be given to the charities also.

Martin, Q.C., in reply.—The land at Cape Town was the only real estate she had, and it is not pure personalty. There is nothing in the will to take it out of the general rule: Llewellyn v. Rose, 17 W. R. 984, W. N. 1869, p. 178; Lewis v. Boetefeur, 38 L. T. N. S. 93, 26 W. R. Dig. 4, W. N., 1879, p. 11.

Kay, J.—The question I have to decide is the question of the construction of this will. No doubt there is a rule of law that, although the courts of equity favour charities, as it is said, yet they will not marshall the assets so as to make a charitable bequest payable out of pure personalty unless there is a direction in the will that it should be done. Of course the testator may direct what he pleases in his will, and the proper way to deal with the will upon which a question of this kind arises is first of all to construe the will, without referring to rule of law, and see what it means, and then apply to it the rule of law. Now in this case I have the case of a testatrix who died having three kinds of property. One was what we should call real estate, that is, land situate in Cape Town; she had no freehold or leasehold property situate in England. Another species of her property was personalty in England, which was not of real estate, and therefore could not be validly given for charitable purposes in England; and the third description of her property was pure personal estate, which could be given for charitable purposes in England. Having these three kinds of property at her death, and intended at the date of her will, she makes her will in this form, reading it shortly:—[His lordship referred to the will, and continued:—] Now there were no charitable legacies properly so called; the only thing given to charity was the residue. Therefore these last words really come to this:—"I direct that the residue which I have given to charities shall be paid exclusively out of my pure personal estate." Now what is the difference between those words and if she had said, "I direct that the residue which I have given to charities shall consist exclusively of pure personal estate." I see no difference at all. How can you give any meaning whatever to these words, that the charitable legacies shall be paid exclusively out of the pure personal estate, without attributing to them this meaning—that the residue which I have given in charity shall consist exclusively of pure personal estate? The words seem to me to have that meaning, and only that meaning, and it is quite impossible to my mind to give them any other meaning. But then if the testatrix had said: "I give my residue to charity, and I direct that the residue shall consist exclusively of pure personal estate," that means, "You shall discharge all other liabilities out of my estate which is not pure personalty as far as that will go in the first instance, and shall reserve my pure personal estate as far as you can to pay it to these charities"; and that seems to be, on the face of the will, without regarding any authority in the matter, as plain a direction to marshall to that extent and in that sense as could be given. I read the will as meaning this: "I give all my real and personal estate in a mixed fund to my executors to convert; I direct that certain legacies shall be paid out of it; and then I direct that, after all the previous purposes of my will have been satisfied, the pure personalty shall be reserved, so far as it can be, and be given as residue to the charities."

There is another point in the will, which is this. As I have said, after giving legacies which are not legacies to charities, she directs expressly that those legacies shall, in the first instance, "be chargeable upon and payable out of the proceeds of the sale of my real and leasehold estate (if any)." The only real and leasehold estate she had at the date of her will or at her death was certain property in Cape Town, and again, without regarding any rule of law, I must first of all construe the will. Is that, or is it not, a direction that these legacies shall be payable first of all out of the proceeds of the Cape Town property? It seems to me as a matter of construction that it is impossible to read it in any other way. It is said, "Oh, but she might have had real estate in England at her death, and it only applies to real estate in England." How can I arrive at that conclusion? She had not at the date of her will any real estate at all except this real estate in Cape Town. An English testatrix would look upon it as real estate undoubtedly, and, therefore, as a matter of construction I can only arrive at the conclusion that this direction must be obeyed by applying, first of all, what real estate, as we should call it, or leasehold estate (because the direction applies to both) she had in Cape Town in payment of the particular legacies which are, according to this will, to be paid in the first instance out of her real and leasehold estate. That is an imperative direction, but what the consequences may be is a matter with which I have nothing to do.

Now I am to apply to this the rule of law. In the first place I am told there is no law in Cape Town which would prevent the real estate there being applied to charity, but that does not in the least degree interfere with the construction of the will; and this will, as I said, according to its true construction, seems to me to devote the real and leasehold estate in Cape Town to the payment of certain legacies other than charitable legacies, and I gathered that it would not be more than enough to pay those legacies. Therefore it would be exhausted. Then I must deal with the rest of the will. As I have said, I can give no meaning whatever to these last words except this meaning, that the assets are to be marshalled as far as possible so as to leave the pure personalty to be the "residue" of the estate. What does "residue" mean. "Residue" means what is left after payment of all debts, funeral, testamentary expenses, and legacies. That is the residue. And when she had directed that her residue should consist of pure personalty it involved of necessity a direction that the debts, funeral, testamentary expenses, and other legacies, so far as the Cape Town property should not be sufficient to satisfy them, must be paid in the first instance out of the impure personalty so as to leave the pure personalty free for charities.

Now I am referred to various authorities. They do not exactly, of course, touch the will, but they come so near to it I think as entirely to confirm the mode in which it seems to me to be right to construe this will.

The first case which was cited was the case of Beaumont v. Oliveira. [His lordship read the headnote to that case, and proceeded :—] There it was held that there was no direction to marshall in favour of the charitable legatees. There was not there a gift of the residue, but the decision was that between the charitable legatees on the one hand, and the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the other legacies on the other hand, there was no direction to marshall. That really does not touch the question I have to decide at all, because here I am to give a meaning to these words "that the residue is to consist of pure personalty," which I take to be a short mode of expressing what the testatrix has expressed in this will.

But there are two other cases which touch it very much more nearly. One is the case of Wills v. Bourne, which came before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, when he was sitting for the Master of the Rolls. That was a case of an annuity and certain pecuniary legacies, and the testator devised his real estate to trustees to sell, and out of the proceeds of sale to pay all the costs and expenses attending the sale. Then to pay all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the annuity and legacies so given, and then all the personal estate was given to the said trustees to convert into money, and to pay such debts as the proceeds of sale of his real estate would not extend to pay, and should stand possessed of all residue of the personal estate for charitable purposes. Then there came this direction. That "only such part or parts" of the testator's estate and premises should "be comprised in the residue" thereof and be so divided as might "by law be given for charitable purposes." There you have the very words which seem to me to be involved in the expression here; only such part as was pure personalty should be comprised in the residue, that is, the residue should consist only of such part as was pure personalty, and the Lord Chancellor held that that amounted to a direction to marshall. It is quite true that the words there were more explicit than the words I have got in this case.

There is another case, of Miles v. Harrison, which follows that in the Court of Appeal, and there the words were different. After giving some small pecuniary and specific legacies, the leasehold estate and the residue of the personal estate was given to trustees in trust to convert into money and to pay the income to his wife so long as she would remain his widow. Then to raise various sums for the purchase of Government annuities, and then other legacies, and then the residue was given thus, "As to all residue and remainder of my personal estate" to charities, "And my will is, and I expressly direct, that the three last-mentioned legacies or bequests" (which were to charities) "shall respectively be paid and satisfied out of such part of my personal estate as can lawfully be applied to the payment thereof, and which shall be reserved by my trustees or trustee for the time being for that purpose." There, again, it was as clear a direction to make the residue consist of pure personalty and to reserve the pure personalty in order to deal with it as residue as could be given, and Lord Cairns accordingly decided that that amounted to a direction to marshall, and James, L.J., the same, and Mellish, L.J., the same, but Mellish, L.J., said this :—"I think the case is really governed by the judgment of Lord Selborne in the case of Wills v. Bourne, for the will in that case was substantially the same as this will would have been if there had been no direction to reserve. If the direction of the trustees had stopped at the words, 'and I will is, and I expressly direct, that the three last mentioned legacies or bequests shall respectively be paid and satisfied out of such part of my personal estate as can be lawfully applied to the payment thereof,' then that case would have been directly point, and the words which follow seem to me only make the matter still stronger and clearer than it otherwise would have been." It is not necessary to say whether one quite agrees with that or not; it is certainly an expression of opinion on the part of a very great judge that words such as we have in this would be quite sufficient of themselves to amount to a direction to marshall.

Now I have heard nothing at all cited which is in conflict with these cases except a case before Kay, V.C., which was before these last two cases, and according to the reports, this case was not referred to either of the cases before the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices. It is the case of Llewellyn v. Jones, and the only reference I have to it is in the Weekly Notes of 1869, page 178. There the bequest was pecuniary legacies to individuals and one charitable legacy, and then all the residue of the estate to charities, and a direction that "the several charitable bequests given by her will should be paid out of such part of her personal estate only by law applicable to bequests of that nature," and there the Vice-Chancellor held that the circumstance of the bequests to the charities being residuary only rendered the direction contained in the will as to the mode of payment nugatory." That is not quite accurate according to the report, because there was one bequest which was not residuary, to the Liverpool Infirmary. But I have only a very short note of it in the Weekly Notes, and I certainly cannot think that as an authority which in the least degree impairs the authority of the two cases which I have referred to before Lord Selborne and the Court of Appeal.

Another case was cited, of Lewis v. Bodefear, which did not follow those two cases, and in which those two cases were cited. That was a case which depended on the construction of the whole will, and all I can say is that was a very different will indeed to that which I have to construe.

Now there can be no sensible meaning given to those words which direct that the residue shall be paid out of the pure personal estate except that the pure personal estate shall be reserved as residue, and, at all events, as a matter of construction, I come to the conclusion that this does amount to a direction to marshall for the benefit of the charitable institutions to which the residue is given; and accordingly the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the costs of the action, and what remains of the pecuniary legacies must be paid out of the impure personalty so far as it will go—as to the legacies, first of all out of the Cape Town property, and the balance out of the impure personalty—leaving, as far as possible, the pure personal estate to constitute the ultimate residue given to charity.

In re Moore.

Trafford v. Maconochie. (a.)

Will—Construction—Illegal condition—Limitation—Public policy—Personalty—Annuity "during such time as she may live apart from her husband."

A testator gave all his property to a trustee upon trust, after payment of debts, &c., to pay to M. M., "during such time as she may live apart from her husband, before my son attains the age of twenty-one years, the sum of £2 10s. per week for her maintenance whilst so living apart from her husband," and the will contained a gift of residue. M. M. and her husband were living together, and the property consisted of personalty.

Held, that the provision as to living apart was void, as contra bonos mores; that it was a limitation, and not a condition; and that, therefore, the annuity was void also.

Adjourned summons.

The summons was taken out to decide the question whether a legacy to Mrs. Maconochie of £2 10s. per week during such time only as she might live apart from her husband during the infancy of J. W. Moore was valid or not.

John Moore, by his will of the 2nd of April, 1885, gave all his property to a trustee upon trust after payment of debts, &c., "to pay to my sister, Mary Maconochie, during such time as she may live apart from her husband before my son attains the age of twenty-one years, the sum of £2 10s. per week for her maintenance whilst so living apart from her husband," and the will contained a gift of residue. At the date of the will and down to the testator's death on the 17th of April, 1885, Mr. and Mrs. Maconochie were living together as man and wife, and had always done so since their marriage.

The testator's property consisted entirely of personal estate.

Williamson, for the trustee.

Marten, Q.C., and Whitehouse, for Mrs. Maconochie.—The annuity is given on condition that the annuitant should live apart from her husband, and in order to induce her to do so; such a condition is contra bonos mores, and is void, but it is a condition precedent, not a limitation, and the gift remains good freed from the condition. The words "apart from her husband" should be struck out: Brown v. Peck, 1 Eden. 140; Wren v. Bradley, 2 De G. & Sm. 49; Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1; Bean v. Griffiths, 1 Jur. N. S. 1045, 4 W. R. Dig. 113; Cartwright v. Cartwright, 3 De G. M. & G. 982; H. v. W., 3 K. & J. 382, 6 W. R. Dig. 29; Hindell v. Dwarris, John. 172, 7 W. R. Dig. 107. Kay, J., referred to Webb v. Grace, 2 Ph. 701].

Mitchold, for the residuary legatee.—This is a limitation, not a condition, and the whole gift is void: Nicol v. Nicol, 34 W. R. 283, 31 Ch. D. 524; Heath v. Lewis, 1 H. L. 314, 3 De G. M. & G. 954; Cocksedge v. Cocksedge, 14 Sim. 244; on appeal, 5 Hare, 397.

Marten, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—Kay, J., referred to the will and continued: Before applying rules of law to a provision of this kind, it is proper to determine, independently of any such rule, what is the construction of this bequest. At the date of it Mary Maconochie had been married for many years, and had never lived apart from her husband, and they have been living together up to the present time. The testator's son is still under the age of twenty-one years. Independently of any rule of law or decided case, the construction of the words which I have read is indisputable. It is a gift of a fixed sum every week during a certain period. To that period there are two limits. It is not to extend, in any case, beyond the joint lives of the husband and wife and the time when the testator's son attains twenty-one, but the payments are only to be made during such part of that period as Mary Maconochie may be living apart from her husband, and for her maintenance whilst so living apart. As matter of construction, it is impossible to hold that any of these payments are given to her while living with her husband. The living apart from the husband is of the essence of the gift in this sense—that it is the measure of the duration of these payments.

It has been argued that it must be treated as a legacy given upon a condition precedent, which, being against the policy of the law, must be rejected, leaving the legacy free from conditions. If it be treated as a gift of an indefinite number of weekly payments of £2 10s., there being a condition attached to each that in the week for which it is payable the legatee should be living apart from her husband, if the condition be rejected it must fail, because the number of payments is undefined. In other words, if it be a gift of so many sums of £2 10s. as there should be weeks in which the legatee was living apart from her husband, then, if you strike out the words, "living apart," &c., there are no means of computing how many such payments should be made.

The duration of these payments is a limitation, not a condition, and to give them any longer or other duration than that prescribed by the will cannot be done by treating them like a legacy of a sum of money given subject to a condition which may be discharged. To treat this gift in that manner would be making an entirely new and essentially different bequest.

It may be said, you do, in effect, make a different bequest when you reject a precedent condition and establish the legacy discharged from it. That is so. It is doing great violence to the will. In cases of real estate the common law of England will not permit such a construction. But this rule adopted from the civil law ought not to be extended. By rejecting a precedent condition upon which a simple legacy of a sum of money is bequeathed, the amount of the legacy is not altered. But in this case the argument requires that an annuity given during one period should be altered into an annuity for another and wholly different period. This is, for the present purpose, the essential difference between a condition and a limitation.

If the gift were during the joint lives of the husband and wife, until the son attained twenty-one, with a condition defeating it if the husband and wife lived together, it might be necessary to reject the condition and maintain the gift, but I think it impossible to construe the will in that way. Suppose it were a legacy of a sum computed by the number of illegal acts committed by the legatee at £2 10s. for each; obviously such a legacy must fail if you reject the mode of computing it.

Then suppose it to be £2 10s. for every week in which the legatee should commit an illegal act; if the limitation be rejected, the computation would be equally impossible; and I am not aware of any rule of construction or rule of law which would justify the court in treating such a gift as a life annuity.

The argument in its most plausible form, is that from the nature of the gift, there are two limits contemplated, and if you take one away the other only is left, and, therefore, in this case the gift should be read as though it were £2 10s. a week during the joint lives of husband and wife until the son attains twenty-one. But what authority is there for thus removing an essential limit.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There is none, unless it can come under the law as to conditions, or, what is in some cases equivalent, conditional limitations defeating an interest previously given. But before this law can be applied it must be determined as matter of construction whether the gift is of that nature. In my opinion the true construction of this bequest is that it is a limitation of weekly payments during a specified time, and that it is not a legacy subject to a condition either precedent or subsequent. The object of the limitation being obviously to induce the person in whose favour it is made to live apart from her husband, the whole limitation may possibly be void, but, the event not having happened, the trust has not arisen at all.

For this construction it seems to me that there is clear and distinct authority. In Webb v. Grace, a covenant to pay to a single woman during her life, subject to the proviso after contained, an annuity of £40, provided that if she married the annuity should be reduced to £20, was held to be valid because it was in effect an agreement to pay £40 a year to her during so much of her life as she should remain unmarried, and £20 a year afterwards, and that this was a limitation, not a condition.

In Heath v. Lewis a gift by will to a woman who had never been married, if she should be unmarried at the death of M., of £2 10s. a month during her life if she should so long remain unmarried, was read "as a limitation as distinguished from a condition," and therefore the payments ceased on her marriage. This gift might have been construed to be a defeasible life annuity more easily than the provision in the will now before me, and, of course, the defeasance would have been void.

In Evans v. Rosser, 12 W. R. 570, 2 H. & M. 190, the testator gave real and personal estate to his son-in-law during the term of his life or till marriage again, and, after his death or marriage, over. And it was held that this was a limitation till marriage, and not a gift of a life estate defeasible on marriage.

The same construction was applied in the well-known case of Rochford v. Hackman, 9 Hare, 475, where a limitation in form determining a life estate upon alienation was held to amount to a limitation until alienation and then over—a construction which has been followed in a multitude of cases since that decision.

But it is said that the court is bound by authority to hold that the legatee in this case is entitled to £2 10s. a week whether she lives apart from her husband or not. The authorities cited demand a careful consideration.

Undoubtedly our law in dealing with bequests of personal property has adopted some doctrines of the civil law which seem to me much less satisfactory than the rules of the common law which we apply in the case of devises of real estate. Swinburne, part 4, s. 5, 7th ed., p. 384, states four sorts of impossible conditions, of which the second are "those which be contrary to law or good manners," instancing a gift of £100 to A. B. f he murder such a man or deflower such a woman. In ipart 4, s. 6, he says that where a condition is impossible such condition hindereth not the legatary, but that he may recover the legacy as if such had not been at all expressed. In part 4, s. 6, p. 407, it is stated that when the condition is both impossible and unhonest the disposition is void in disfavour of the testator who added such a condition, whereas, if the condition had been only impossible or unlawful, the disposition had been good, and that in favour of the testament.

Jarman, at p. 12 of vol. 2, 4th ed., states the law adopted from the civil law to be that, where a condition precedent is originally impossible, or is made so by the Act or default of the testator, or is illegal as involving malum prohibitum, the bequest is absolute, just as if the condition had been subsequent. But that, where it is illegal as involving malum in se, the civil agrees with the common law in holding both gift and condit void.

This law is recognized in Williams on Executors, ed., p. 1174.

In Tothill, p. 141, is a short note of a case Te v. Brale, November 8, 6 Jac., a devise made to daughter to pay her a sum of money if she w divorced from her husband. The gift made though the condition void.

The doctrine that conditions precedent as w conditions subsequent which are against the po the law are treated as void in cases of legacies of sonal estate, and that the legacy "stands pure simple," is distinctly recognized by Lord Hardwic Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. p. 332. And the borrowed from the civil law were held by the Master of the Rolls to apply to a mixed fund o proceeds of real and personal estate: Bellairs v. Be 22 W. R. 942, L. R. 18 Eq. 510.

I assume, therefore, that if this is to be treated legacy given upon a precedent condition or defe by a subsequent condition which is bad as ins that which is malum prohibitum, the legacy must effect discharged of the condition.

In Brown v. Peck the testator, noticing in hi that his niece Rebecca had married without the c of her mother, directed that, if she lived with her band, his executors should pay her £2 a month more; but, if she lived from him and with her then they should allow her £5 a month. Lord K Henley held that she was entitled to the monthly ment of £5, "and that the condition annexed, b both impossible at the time of imposing it and bonos mores, the legacy was simple and pure." I referred to the registrar's book, and it seems clear the condition was only impossible in the sense everything which is prohibited by law is so in the templation of law. The husband, wife, and seem to have been all three living. It is evid the will was read as a gift of £5 a month to for life upon condition that she did not live w husband, or £5 a month for life cut down to £2 should live with him. Such a condition was agai policy of the law, and was therefore treated as a It appears from the registrar's book that the point not argued, the other parties desiring that the should have the £5 a month.

In Wren v. Bradley one bequest was to pay to testator's daughter in case she should be living from her husband, A., and should continue so during the lifetime of the testator's wife, an £30; but if she should cohabit with him it should cease during such cohabitation. The husband and wife were living apart at the date of the will, but were living together at the death of the testator, and the Vice-Chancellor, evidently with considerable hesitation held that she was entitled to the gift discharged of the condition. He came to the same conclusion with respect to a direction to pay the interest of one-third of the residue to his said daughter "during such time as she shall continue to live apart from her said husband," but if she cohabited with him the income was to be paid to other persons, and after her death the capital to given over. This latter gift is in the form of a limitation rather than a condition. I must follow the decisions in any case governed by them. But the construction of one set of words is not binding where we are construing a different provision. Because the c in those cases held the words were conditional it does follow that other words are to be so construed. decisions are only binding when the bequest is ne tained to be conditional by independent construct They do not lay down any rule as to what bequests to be so considered. No canon of construction established by either of the cases for this purpose.

I confess that I find it difficult to understand these two decisions. As to Brown v. Peck the legatee must have been entitled to the gift of £2 a month. That was not affected by any illegality. If the reason given in the short report be good, she should have had the £5 a month as well as the £2. The only mode of preventing this was by treating it as an annuity of £5 a month during the joint lives of the husband and wife cut down to £2 a month if they lived together. I should have had great difficulty in so construing it.

But such a bequest is altogether different from a gift of a weekly payment during a period only defined by the lives living apart from her husband. In that respect the wording of the bequest in this case differs materially from that in Brown v. Peck.

Here the payments can be made "during such time as she may live apart from her husband," and there is no alternative life annuity or gift for any longer period. In Brown v. Peck it was, if she lived with her husband, £2 a month, but if she lived from him £5 a month, one either of those payments being intended to last during the joint lives.

In Wren v. Bradley, however, the gifts more nearly resembled the bequest in the present case, especially the gift of interest of one-third of the residue, which was to be paid "during such time as she should continue to live apart."

The gift of residue was obviously construed as a life interest with a conditional limitation divesting it which should be rejected. With all respect I think this construction doubtful. But, again, the words differ from those in the present case. It was more possible to construe the gift as a defeasible life interest than it would be to put that construction upon the words I have to consider.

In one sense the rule rejecting certain conditions, which is borrowed from the civil law, is a rule of construction. That is, when you find a legacy coupled with a bad condition, the will is to be construed as if the condition was not there. But obviously it must first be ascertained whether there is a conditional legacy, and the construction for this purpose is independent of and must precede the application of the rule.

I hold that the legatee in this case is not entitled to the payment of £2 10s., because those payments are legacies given upon a condition, but are to be made only within certain limits which the court has no power to alter.

In re Gibbes' Settlement. White v. Randolph. (a).

Will—Power of appointment—Appointment by testamentary instrument—Subsequent appointment by will—Revocation—Wills Act (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.

Under a marriage settlement £1,000 was settled upon trust for such persons as G. should by will or codicil, or any writing in the nature thereof, appoint. G. executed a document which he called a testamentary appointment, and thereby, in pursuance of his power of appointment under the settlement, he appointed the £1,000, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, whether of his testamentary appointment or of any will or codicil affecting his general property, unto his four sons. G. afterwards by will, after making various specific bequests to his four sons and three daughters, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto all his children equally. Probate was granted of the will, but not of the testamentary appointment.

Held, that, by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act, the gift in the will operated as a revocation of the prior testamentary appointment, and as an execution of the power of appointment given by the marriage settlement.

By a settlement dated the 27th of October, 1834, and made on the marriage of the Rev. Heneage Gibbes and Margaretta Gibbes his wife, the sum of £1,000 was settled upon trust, after the death of the husband and wife, for such person or persons and in such shares, manner, and form "as the said Heneage Gibbes at any time of times hereafter by his last will and testament in writing, or any codicil thereto, or any writing in the nature thereof respectively to be signed and published by him in the presence of one or more credible witness or witnesses shall direct or appoint, give or bequeath, the same."

On the 20th of June, 1883, Heneage Gibbes executed a testamentary appointment, and thereby, in pursuance of the power given him by the settlement, appointed, "the sum of £1,000 over which I have a power of appointment by the said settlement, after payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, whether of this testamentary appointment or of any will or codicil affecting my general property, unto my four sons in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. And I appoint George Graham White, of Launceston, in the county of Cornwall, gentleman, executor of this testamentary appointment."

On the 20th of July, 1883, Heneage Gibbes made a will, and thereby, after making various specific gifts of plate and furniture to his four sons and three daughters, proceeded, "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, I give, devise, and bequeath unto all my children equally as tenants in common. I appoint George Graham White, of Launceston, in the county of Cornwall, gentleman, executor of this my will."

On the same day he also made a codicil to his will, and thereby provided, "In case any creditor or assignee of my son Heneage Gibbes, or any person claiming or being entitled to claim any property or effects given by my said will to my son Heneage over and above the sum of £300 referred to in the testamentary appointment of my late wife in favour of my said sons, such property or effects I give unto my son George Edward absolutely."

The testator died in 1887, his wife having predeceased him, and his will and codicil were proved by George Graham White, but probate of the testamentary appointment of the 20th of June, 1883, was refused.

This was a summons by George Graham White, as plaintiff, against the surviving trustee of the marriage settlement and two of the testator's sons, as defendants, asking for a declaration that the plaintiff, as executor of the will, was entitled to the sum of £1,000 comprised in the marriage settlement, over which the testator has a general power of appointment given by the settlement.

The question to be decided was whether the testamentary appointment of the 20th of June, 1883, had been revoked by the will of the 20th of July, 1883, by virtue of the Wills Act, s. 27.

Section 27 of the Wills Act enacts that "a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he shall have power to appoint in any manner he may think propor, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

Cookson, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the summons.—The plaintiff is entitled to the £1,000 comprised in the settlement, because the testamentary appointment of the 20th of June, 1883, is, by virtue of the 27th section of the Wills Act, revoked by the will of the 20th of July, as no contrary intention appears by the will.

They referred to the Wills Act, s. 27.

J. Henderson, for the defendants.—The testamentary appointment is not revoked by the will, which does not expressly revoke it: Pomfret v. Perring, 3 W. R. 81, 5 De G. M. & G. 775; Palmer v. Newell, 3 W. R 333, 20 Beav. 32. They were intended to operate together; and the executors might have applied to the Probate Division to allow proof of both.

They referred to In the Goods of Fenwick, L. R. 1 P. & D. 319, 15 W. R. Prob. Dig. 16; Inglefield v. Coghlan, 2 Coll. 247.

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—I think that the testamentary appointment of the 20th of June, 1883, and the will of the 20th of July, 1883, were meant to operate together. I think that what the testator intended was that by the former he should exercise his power of appointment, and that by the latter he should dispose of his property not included in the appointment. The provisions of the codicil confirm this view. I do not believe the codicil was intended to apply only to the instrument of the 20th of July. In the case, however, of In re Jones, Greene v. Gordon, 35 W. R. 74, 34 Ch. D. 65, Kay, J., says:—"I think that this case is covered by the Act. As I read the statute it is useless to speculate about the intention of the testatrix. The court may have a strong suspicion that the testatrix did not intend to exercise what is called a general power of appointment, and that if she had been told that she had done so she would have been very much surprised to hear it. But the statute renders any such speculation fruitless." The question is really as to the second instrument as it stands.

It is a pity that the application to allow proof of both instruments was not made to the Probate Division, as this would have removed all question as against the trustee of the settlement. But for some reason or other the parties have not taken that course. The question is as to the strict legal rights under the will. [His lordship read the will as set out above, and continued:—] I should have thought that in itself was sufficient to show the testator's meaning, without any other instrument, and meant, "I give, devise, and bequeath everything I have not hereinbefore disposed of," and that would be sufficient to operate as an execution of the general power of appointment if the testamentary appointment had never existed. Does the testamentary appointment, not referred to in the will, alter the matter? In my opinion it does not, because the Wills Act itself shows what a contrary intention is, and the mode in which it is to be shown. Section 27 says a general bequest is to operate as an execution of a general power over personal estate, "unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." Now I think that the will referred to there is the instrument in which the general bequest is contained, and therefore I cannot look beyond that document to find a contrary intention. The contrary intention must be found within the four corners of the will itself—or, of course, I might look at the subsequent codicil. I do not find it there.

Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that the will operated as an execution of the power of appointment, and a revocation of the previous appointment, and that probate of the testamentary appointment need not be taken out.

KINGDON v. KIRK. (a.)

Specific performance—Non-appearance of defendant—Default in completion—Declaration that vendor entitled to forfeit deposit—Costs.

In a vendor's action to enforce a contract to purchase real estate, the plaintiff, by his statement of claim claimed specific performance, or, in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to forfeit the deposit and resell the property.

The purchaser had accepted the title, but had failed to complete on the day fixed for completion. There was a condition empowering the vendor to forfeit the deposit and resell the property in case the purchaser failed to comply with any of the conditions of sale. The defendant had not appeared to the writ.

Held, that, if, in such a case, the writ had claimed such an alternative declaration as was asked by the statement of claim, the declaration might be made.

But held, that the order should direct the plaintiff to pay the costs of the action.

Motion for judgment.

This was an action by a vendor for the specific performance of an agreement to purchase real estate. The purchaser had paid a deposit. By one of the conditions of sale the vendor was empowered, in case the purchaser should fail to comply with any of the conditions, to forfeit the deposit, and to resell the property. The purchaser accepted the title, but failed to complete at the time fixed by the agreement. By his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed specific performance of the agreement, or, in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to forfeit the deposit and to resell the property in accordance with the conditions. The defendant had not appeared to the writ, and the statement of claim had been delivered by filing it.

The action now came on on motion for judgment.

Levett, for the plaintiff.—I ask for a declaration according to the second alternative of the statement of claim. No doubt in Stone v. Smith, 35 W. R. 545, 34 Ch. D. 188, Kekewich, J., refused to give similar relief, but in that case the statement of claim had only asked for specific performance.

The defendant did not appear.

NORTH, J.—I will make the declaration asked for. The declaration is, however, in the nature of a luxury for which the plaintiff ought to pay, and the plaintiff must, therefore, pay the costs of the action, and it should appear on the face of the order that it is made on the terms of his doing so.

On its being subsequently discovered that the writ had only claimed specific performance, NORTH, J., following Gee v. Bell, 35 W. R. 805, 35 Ch. D. 160, said that as the defendant had not appeared, the plaintiff could only have judgment for specific performance.

KERFORD v. SEACOMBE, HOYLAKE, &c., RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Notice to treat—Part of a house—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 92.

The plaintiff was the owner of a piece of land, fronting a private road, whereon he had built for himself a dwelling-house. He afterwards bought some land fronting the same road on the other side, immediately opposite his dwelling-house, and built stables, coachhouse, and greenhouses as part thereof, and laid out the rest as a garden, all of which he used together with and as part of his residence. A railway company gave notice to treat for the piece of land whereon the stables, &c., were situate.

Held, that they could not be compelled under section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, to take the dwelling-house also.

Trial of action.

This was the hearing of an action brought by a landowner against a railway company who had given notice to treat for a part of some land belonging to the plaintiff, to compel the company to take the whole of such land, and the question was as to the construction to be put upon the words "part of any house" in section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. In 1853 the plaintiff bought a piece of land at New Brighton, in the county of Chester, adjacent to the north side of a private road known as Alexandra-road, and built thereon a dwelling-house called Buena Vista. In 1864 he bought a piece of land on the south side of the said road, immediately opposite his dwelling-house, and erected thereon stables, coachhouse, coachman's and gardener's cottages, and greenhouses, which he used together with his dwelling-house. On the 25th of January, 1887, the defendant company, under their statutory powers, served on the plaintiff the usual notice to treat for the purchase of the land lying on the south side of the road. On the 17th of February, 1887, the plaintiff served on the defendant company a counter-notice stating that he would not sell the land lying on the south side of the road unless the company would also take the whole of the land occupied by the plaintiff, including the said dwelling-house. This the company declined to do, and began to take steps to obtain possession of the land comprised in the notice to treat only. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, claiming (1) a declaration that the defendants are not entitled to take the property included in their notice to treat without taking the remaining part of the property called Buena Vista; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any proceedings to assess the compensation payable to the plaintiff in respect of the land comprised in their notice to treat only, and from entering upon or taking any other proceeding to obtain possession of the said land. The statement of claim alleged that the buildings on the land comprised in the notice to treat were appurtenant to the dwelling-house and essential to the occupation and enjoyment thereof. This allegation was denied by the defendants. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff was liable under a covenant for the repair of half of the private road.

Warmington, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the plaintiff.—The stables, coachhouse, cottages, and greenhouse are part of the curtilage of, and appendant to, the dwelling-house, and so form part thereof within the meaning of section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act: Sparrow v. Oxford, &c., Railway Co., 2 De G. M. & G. 94. Spackman v. Great Western Railway Co., 1 Jur. N. S. 790, 4 W. R. Dig. 83, shows that the intervention of the road makes no difference.

Barber, Q.C., and R. Neville, for the defendants.—This case is governed by Steele v. Midland Railway Co., 14 W. R. 367, L. R. 1 Ch. 275, and Fergusson v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., 11 W. R. 1088, 3 De G. J. & S. 653. The ground comprised in the notice to treat is not a curtilage, and would not pass by a devise of the dwelling-house.

They also referred to Smith v. Martin, 2 Wms. Saund. 401a; Hearn v. Allen, Cro. Car. 57; Treadwell v. London and South-Western Railway Co., W. N., 1884, p. 233; Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 94 (ed. 1820).

Warmington, in reply.—It is not necessary that the part taken should be actually continuous with the rest or acquired at the same time: Governors of the Hospital of St. Thomas v. Charing Cross Railway Co., 9 W. R. 411, 1 J. & H. 400.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is to my mind somewhat strange that in the year 1888 I should not only be called upon to decide a question of difficulty on the application of the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but that I should be told, and told with truth, that it is a novel question. For I long period of my professional life I was familiar with the many cases, some reported and some not reported, some fought and some not fought, which arose on the 92nd section, and I well remember how we rested our case in Pulling v. London Chatham, and Dover Railway on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fergusson's case, and ultimately succeeded. But so it is, that for some reason or other, because, perhaps, for the reason suggested in argument, there has been a cessation of hostilities or a comparative cessation of hostilities on the construction of this section, either the profession has been satisfied with the conclusions or for some other reason; but there have not been cases of recent years, with very few exceptions.

Now it would be equally useless and impertinent for me to say, or even to consider, what my judgment would be if this question were res integra. It is not. I am bound, of course, by the authorities which have, so far as they have decided the question, settled the law, but I may venture to say this, that if I were entirely at liberty to follow the bent of my own opinion, I should be disposed to follow the more liberal construction indicated by Knight-Bruce, L.J., a construction which is expressed, I observe, by Wood, V.C., in giving judgment in the case of Steele v. Midland Railway Co. I am not sure that what he there says about Knight-Bruce, L.J.'s view is to be found in any report of any case—at any rate, I am not aware of any at the present moment. But on p. 279, L. R. 1 Ch. App., Wood, V.C., there referring to the view taken by Knight-Bruce, L.J., says:—"Everything which is necessary for the convenience and comfortable occupation of a house is to be included by a liberal construction of the Act as part of that which is protected by the 92nd section." But there has not been adopted so liberal a construction, and I must, as far as I can, ascertain what is the proper construction of the section.

(a.) Reported by P. F. WHEELER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now the section is the 92nd section, which must be read, I think, in order to ascertain its meaning—that is to say, in order to ascertain the policy of the Legislature in connection with the 23rd section, which has itself led to some little litigation. The Legislature is dealing, in the 92nd section, with land that is built upon, and it divides land that is built upon into three parts. It is land consisting of a house, or land consisting of other buildings, not being houses, whatever houses may mean, or, thirdly, they may be manufactories; and in the 93rd section the Legislature deals with land which is not situate in a town or built upon (it seems to assume that land in a town will be built upon)—that is to say, land in the country, rural land; and it provides that, when land of that character is intersected so as to leave only less than half an acre on either side of the railway, then the landowner shall not be obliged to remain the owner of so small a part, but the company shall be bound to take the whole. That was a provision for the benefit of the landowner, and in the 92nd section there is another provision for the benefit of landowners applied to those other classes of properties. That it was intended for the benefit of landowners is evident on the face of the Act of Parliament, and was expressed by Knight-Bruce, L.J., in what I think may be called the leading case as regards the word "house"—namely, the case of Grosvenor v. The Hampstead Junction Railway Co. On page 452 he says: "I thought that all such questions"—that was, whether "house" was to have a limited meaning—"had been set at rest, and, for the sake of general convenience and for the sake of ordinary justice to private proprietors, it had been considered right to read the word 'house' different from the ordinary legal sense and different from that which is contained in a conveyance, and as against the railway company." There it was held that the word "house" was to be construed in its ordinary legal sense, or, as Turner, L.J., put it—and it is important to observe his words—"I take, therefore, the question to be, What would pass under a conveyance of the house?" There the judges decided against the railway company that that was the proper construction. It is now urged from a different point of view.

It was urged in three other cases, to which I will call attention, that restricting the meaning of the word "house" to what it would mean in a conveyance is in favour of the railway company and not against it. Now I am asked, or I am invited rather, to hold that this piece of land (it is quite unnecessary for me to refer to the plan for a description of it) on the south side of the road—public or private is immaterial for this purpose—is not part of the house, because it is detached from the house, and it is said that a piece of land detached from a house will not pass as part of the house, whether it be garden or stables, or, as Mr. Warmington suggested in reply, a coal-shed or anything of that kind. I am not prepared to express any opinion on that point. I do not think it is necessary to the case, and I think that that is a question which may well be properly left open for consideration until it is necessary to decide it. In saying that I embrace both the cases where there is physical connection by means of a bridge, a tunnel, or level crossing, or where the physical connection is wanting, I can well conceive cases where detached property might pass as part of the house on the strictest interpretation of a conveyance, but I do not intend to decide that in this case.

Now I turn to the three decisions of Fergusson v. The Brighton Railway Co., in 1863, Pulling v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., in 1864, and Steele v. The Midland Railway Co., in 1867, all decisions of the Court of Appeal and all decisions in which Knight-Bruce, L.J., at any rate did not concur with his colleague, Turner, L.J., but where, nevertheless, the decisions of the Court of Appeal were consistently in one direction, and must be taken to be expressed in [illegible] judgment of Turner, L.J. In the course of those [illegible] I observe that Turner, L.J., distinctly states that Kn[illegible] Bruce, L.J., did not agree with him. He says, in [illegible] judgment, "Unfortunately I and my learned br[illegible] differ in our judgment upon the point." Knight-Br[illegible] L.J., according to his habit, which many of m[illegible] familiar with, did not say he differed, but [illegible] intimated a doubt. He followed the same course in [illegible] other two cases, but, as regards them, I do not find [illegible] definite intimation by Turner, L.J., that Knight-Br[illegible] L.J., differed from him. But whatever Knight-Br[illegible] L.J.'s opinion was, whether it was a distinct differ[illegible] only not expressed because he deferred to his colle[illegible] or knowing that, whatever his opinion was, he coul[illegible] alter the decision, there being then only two jud[illegible] the Court of Appeal and Turner, L.J., being for [illegible] ing the decision of the court below—whatever may [illegible] been his real opinion, the decision is the decision of [illegible] Court of Appeal, and is the decision of Turner, [illegible] and what it comes to is this—it expressed, [illegible] different language, over and over again what he [illegible] said in the case of Grosvenor v. The Hampstead Ju[illegible] Railway Co., upon which I have already said a [illegible] words. He holds that the question under the [illegible] Clauses Act is that, when you come to consider [illegible] a particular building is a part of a house so th[illegible] railway company can be prevented, under the [illegible] Clauses Act, from taking the piece of land [illegible] taking the whole house, whatever is properly de[illegible] by that, you must ask yourself what would pass by [illegible] word "house."

Now in some of the cases the question is, [illegible] would pass by a devise or conveyance? and [illegible] has been taken in the argument to that alternative [illegible] of stating the proposition. I think the exceptions [illegible] have been omitted, and for this reason. The que[illegible] not what would pass by a house in a devise [illegible] regard to the rest of the will, but what would pa[illegible] house either by a devise or conveyance of the house [illegible] that is to say, construing that part of the will by [illegible] because one never does construe one part of a w[illegible] itself independently of the other. But that is [illegible] meaning of the proposition in that way—devise or [illegible] veyance. You must not have appurtenances. You [illegible] not have any such words as "in my occupation," or [illegible] such words as a reference to a conveyance—"con[illegible] by such and such a deed," or any such words as "k[illegible] or called by" or anything of that kind. The qu[illegible] must be, What would pass by a conveyance of, as [illegible] case, "my house" or "the house, Buena Vista"? [illegible] this land here would pass by such a description, [illegible] in a devise standing alone or by a conveyance, then [illegible] garden would pass—this garden, stables, and so on; [illegible] if that would not pass then the company are not co[illegible] pellable to take the residue, when they take the g[illegible] and stables, as part of the garden and stables. Now [illegible] my mind, looking at it from a conveyancer's poi[illegible] view, and that is the point of view to regard it fro[illegible] think this garden and other property would not pa[illegible] part of the house. Putting myself in the position [illegible] conveyancer advising on the title, I should say I h[illegible] a conveyance of the house some time after 1864, w[illegible] the larger part of the property was conveyed to [illegible] Kerford, and if I find a conveyance of the house, or [illegible] house, "Buena Vista," I should say that passes the [illegible] dence, and does not pass the garden and stables on [illegible] other side of the road. It is not necessary to refe[illegible] any length to the deeds that were put in, and not s[illegible] to the mortgage, which was a mere contract between [illegible] Kerford and some person who was willing to lend [illegible] money, to show what property should be included in [illegible] mortgage. It includes these properties and some o[illegible] properties. It is not necessary to look to see how [illegible] property is referred to; there is nothing there to [illegible]

...ion. The northern part of the property is where the ...idence is built, and where another residence is also ...t, and that was purchased in the year 1853 by Mr. ...rd. There was no house then built, and I see ...ing really in the conveyance at all to help one. It ...ld be quite immaterial whether he contemplated ...asing the other property if he could get it, but ...e is no reference to it at all, and, in fact, I ...er from the conveyance that the southern prop... belonged to other persons, and therefore, one ...ld not expect any reference the one to the other.

The only thing which I will mention is this reference ... a private road. To my mind it is not necessary to ...ate that at any length, but I stopped Mr. Neville on ...t part of the case because that is confessedly not a ...ivate road in the sense of a road belonging to the ...operty on the northern side of it only, so that it is pri... in the sense of really being in the same ownership. ...can only be a private road in the sense of not being ...dicated to the public, but being open to the use and ...joyment of those persons whose houses front on it. I ...not see really, regarding it as a private road, how it ...be of any use to one side or the other. The con...ance in 1864 of the southern part obviously con...plates the erection on the southern property of the ...dge, cottage, stables, coachhouse, and other offices ...r buildings to be used or occupied with the present ...elling-house of him, the said Geo. Briscoe Kerford." ...That is what he intends, and the conveyance provided ...that and that only shall be erected on the piece of land ...he bought. Now from that time forward I have no ...doubt that it has been so occupied with stables, garden, ...and so on, which are a very convenient adjunct to his ...house. I do not consider it to be any advantage, from ...my point of view, to investigate narrowly whether any ...one in the neighbourhood has stables or gardens or ...ild houses and so forth. I have no doubt that these ...convenient adjuncts to the house, and if it were a ...question of comfortable enjoyment I have no ...that that the property has been held comfortably and ...veniently with the house; that it has been intended ...be so used ever since 1864, and, there being nothing ...show the contrary, that it is intended to be used now ...in the future. But to my mind that does not con...ate the case. According to the authorities the ques...n is whether the garden and so forth would pass by a ...nveyance of the house. On that ground, and on that ...ound only, and considering myself bound by the ...ecisions of the Court of Appeal, I hold that the plain...f has no right to call upon the defendants to purchase ...residence because they have taken the whole or some ...—I understand they have really taken the whole—...the property on the south side of the road which has ...been used as stables, garden, and coachhouse. My ...gment would be the same whether they had taken ...whole or any part. Licensed Victuallers' Newspaper Co. v. Bingham. (a.)

Copyright—Trade name—Title of newspaper—Exclusive right acquired by reputation and acceptance—Question of fact—Copyright Acts (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45).

No copyright in the title of a newspaper is acquired by registration of the paper under the Copyright Acts.

An exclusive right to the use of the title of a paper may, however, be acquired at common law by reputation and acceptance, and the existence or non-existence of such reputation and acceptance is a matter of fact to be decided on the evidence.

Appeal from North, J.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the publication by the defendant of a newspaper dealing with racing and matters connected with the licensing trade under the title Licensed Victuallers' Mirror, on the ground that the plaintiffs had previously published a newspaper dealing with similar subjects under that title.

The facts, as they appeared from the evidence, were as follows:—

The plaintiffs' paper was first published on Friday, February 3, 1888, and on February 4 it was registered at Stationers' Hall under the Copyright Acts, on which day an advertisement, containing an announcement of the publication and the name of the paper, was sent to another paper called the Sporting Life; this advertisement appeared in the Sporting Life of Monday, February 6. The plaintiffs had previously advertised the fact that they intended to bring out a new sporting paper, but they did not advertise the title they intended to give it until the date mentioned. The plaintiffs had found some difficulty in getting a new title, as the defendant had previously published no less than twenty-five papers, each of which was an exact copy of the other, except that each had for its title a different word in connection with the words "Licensed Victuallers"—e.g., Licensed Victuallers' Chronicle, Licensed Victuallers' Herald, &c., &c. The defendant, however, had not previously hit upon the title Licensed Victuallers' Mirror. On February 6, however, the same day on which the plaintiffs' advertisement appeared in the Sporting Life, the defendant published a paper also called the Licensed Victuallers' Mirror. It appeared that there had been only five copies of the plaintiffs' paper sold on February 3, the day of its first publication, and ten copies on February 4, but that on February 17 as many as 1,900 copies were sold. The plaintiffs, after issuing the writ in the action, applied for an interlocutory injunction. North, J., refused the application, on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence to show that the plaintiffs had established a reputation in the market entitling them to such an injunction.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Everitt, Q.C., and St. John Clerke, for the appellants.—The case of a newspaper published with a particular title is peculiar. The right we claim is not that of a trade-mark; nor is it copyright in the strict sense. But in a newspaper, from the subject-matter of the case, the right is one necessarily identified with the title under which the paper is published. The proprietor of a newspaper has a right to prevent any other person adopting the same name for any other similar publication and this right is a chattel interest: Kelly v. Hutton, 16 W. R. 1182, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 703; Maxwell v. Hogg, 15 W. R.

(a.) Reported by M. J. Blake, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

467, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 307; Weldon v. Dicks, 27 W. R. 639, 10 Ch. D. 247. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Was not Weldon v. Dicks disapproved of in Dicks v. Yates, 18 Ch. D. 76, 29 W. R. Dig. 57? The Lord Justice also referred to Lawson v. The Bank of London, 4 W. R. 481, 18 C. B. 84].

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Edward Martin, the for respondent, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of North, J., refusing an injunction to restrain the defendant publishing a newspaper called the Licensed Victuallers' Mirror at the suit of the plaintiff company, who are the publishers of a paper with the same title. Now the principle on which an injunction is granted in such cases is that, by reputation or otherwise, the plaintiff has acquired an exclusive right to use the name in question, not merely that he has the right to use it. Have the present plaintiffs established any such exclusive right? The plaintiffs say that they registered their paper under the Copyright Acts on Saturday, February 4, but they admit that the registration under the Copyright Acts does not give them the right to the use of this name. They say, however, that they sold five copies of their paper on Friday, February 3, the day of the first publication, and ten copies on Saturday, February 4; but in my opinion such small sale of their paper before the 6th of February, when the defendant commenced selling his paper, cannot be sufficient to get the plaintiffs by reputation the exclusive right to the use of the name. The larger sale of the plaintiffs' paper subsequently is immaterial; the question is whether, when the defendant first began to use the name on the 6th of February, the plaintiffs had got the exclusive right to it. If the plaintiffs had not then got the exclusive right to use that name, the defendant has an equal right to use it. In my opinion the decision of North, J., is right, and is based on the right grounds.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs must make out that they have either an exclusive right to the use of the name in question in connection with their paper or have copyright in the name. As to copyright, I am of opinion the Copyright Acts will not help them in any way. The case of Weldon v. Dicks, before Malins, V.C., cannot, I think, be now considered to be correct law, as the registration of the title of a book does not give any exclusive right to the use of the title. If the Copyright Acts fail the plaintiffs, they must fall back on common law principles—that is, they must establish such reputation as the court can recognize as a fact. Have the plaintiffs got such reputation? That is a matter of fact to be decided on the evidence, and in my opinion the plaintiffs, who first published their paper on February 3, had not by February 6 acquired such a reputation in the title as to give them at common law an exclusive right to the use of it.

This matter is one of very great importance, for it seems to me there is a flaw in this respect in the Copyright Acts. In a newspaper the name is all important commercially—the goodwill of the name is all important. The value of the Times, for instance, depends on its name; the copyright is of no value. The Times, of course, is safe enough. But, as the law stands at present, I am sorry to say, if anyone starts a newspaper under a new name, any other person can adopt the same name the next day. That is the law.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think that there is no copyright in the name of a newspaper, even if registered under the Copyright Acts. The only question that remains for consideration, therefore, is whether an exclusive right to the title had been acquired by the plaintiffs at the time when the defendant published his paper. This exclusive r must be acquired by reputation, and in the case newspaper by sale. The true principle is laid dow Lord Westbury in the well-known "Anatolia" liqu case, McAndrew v. Bassett, 12 W. R. 777, 4 De G. 380, and is cited by Cairns, L.J., in Maxwell v. " "Property in the word for all purposes cannot exist; property in that word, as applied by way of s upon a particular vendible article, as a stick of liqu does exist the moment the article goes into the m so stamped and there obtains acceptance and reputa whereby the stamp gets currency as an indicati superior quality or of some other circumstance w render the articles so stamped acceptable to the publ Mutatis mutandis that dictum applies to the case newspaper acquiring a reputation in the market. proprietor of a newspaper does not acquire an exc right to the use of its name until he has enjoyed use of it by sale to such an extent that the name notes something to intending purchasers. The qu in each case is whether the defendant's conduct c shown to be reasonably calculated to deceive persons might be reasonably expected to buy the pl article into the belief that the defendant's artic the plaintiffs'. To do that it must be shown th has been such a sale of the article by the pl under the name in question as to establish in the of persons who were likely to buy it a connecti tween the name and the plaintiffs' article. That only be established by a sale for such a reasonable as would build up the reputation of the plaintiffs. not always easy to define the exact moment at the reputation is acquired, but unless it had be quired it cannot be said that any exclusive right use of the name has been acquired. In my o the judgment of the learned judge in the court was most exact, and put the law as well as possibly be put.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from a decision of Kay, J.

(a.) Reported by W IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case Kay, J., on the application of the plaintiff, who was the proprietor of the Morning Post, granted an injunction restraining the defendants, who were a limited company, from publishing, selling, or advertising for sale any newspaper by the name of the Evening Post, or by any other name calculated to induce the public to believe that such newspaper was an edition of the Morning Post.

The defendants appealed.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J.

Renshaw replied.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we have been asked to reverse a judgment of Kay, J., by which he issued an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing a paper under the name of the Evening Post, with which is incorporated the Daily Recorder. Now the facts of the case are simple to a degree. Everybody is aware of the existence of the Morning Post, an old-established paper of high character, which has existed for a great many years. It seems that some years ago the plaintiff was in the habit of publishing, later in the day, sometimes as late as three in the afternoon, a second or third edition of the Morning Post, but still always under the name of the Morning Post. It is not suggested that the plaintiff ever did intend, or does intend, to publish a paper called the Evening Post in connection with the Morning Post, of the same nature and under the same authority as the Morning Post. Under these circumstances an application was made to Kay, J., to issue this injunction, and he issued it. It was not suggested that it came exactly within the authority of any case in which the very name, or a colourable imitation of the name, had been taken by the person against whom the application was made. Under such circumstances there is plenty of authority, authority founded on the soundest sense, to show that the court would interfere as to a matter of property. There may be property in a name as well as property in anything else, and anything like an interference with property in a name would be immediately restrained by the court. It is to be observed that in the advertisement of the Evening Post the office was stated in large type, and that the office was said to be 168, Fleet-street, whereas most persons who have lived in London for some time are aware that the Morning Post is published at a large house in Wellington-street, on the front of which house appears the name Morning Post in large letters.

Now the defendant company, towards the end of the month of December, advertised that they were about to publish a paper under the name of the Evening Post, and that they had incorporated with it the Daily Recorder, which is an old paper, and had apparently a large circulation. These are all the facts except this, that as many as twenty applications have been made to the office of the Morning Post for copies of the Evening Post, showing that the applicants were under the impression that there was some connection between the Evening Post and the Morning Post, and that one could be bought at the office of the other. But the plaintiffs' case is not put mainly upon that. It is put somewhat in this way. It is said that the Evening Post is the natural name for the Morning Post, if it issued an evening edition, to assume; that anybody who saw the Evening Post advertised, if he looked at it carelessly and did not observe where it was published, might not unnaturally come to the conclusion that it was an evening edition of the Morning Post, and that, being an evening edition of the Morning Post, it was issued under the authority of the Morning Post, and would be conducted by the same persons as the Morning Post, and would represent the general opinion of the Morning Post; and that persons who took the evening paper under the impression that they were taking something issued by the writers or editors or staff of the Morning Post might be so annoyed and displeased with what they saw in the former paper that they would discontinue their support of the latter paper, the Morning Post, and that, therefore, the proprietor of the Morning Post would be injured. All that, no doubt, is conceivable, but it seems to me that it is only conceivable—that the damage suggested is not a damage that, as far as I am aware, has ever yet been made the ground for interference on the part of this court; and if the matter stood there, there is good reason for saying that what is suggested is not sufficient to justify the interference of the court. But it is put, and can only be put, as I think, upon another ground, and that ground is this, that the assumption of the name of the Evening Post was intended by the takers of it, and might by reasonable people be supposed to indicate a connection between the two papers, and that therefore there was an attempt upon the part of the assumers of the title of the Evening Post to trade under the colour of the Morning Post, and to take advantage of the benefits which the connection might be supposed to give to the new paper; and that as there is no such connection, and as the benefit suggested to be gained would be gained under a mistake and misapprehension induced by the defendants, that would be a ground for the interference of this court. I am not at all prepared to say that if it were clearly made out, not only that such a thing might happen, but that there was any ground for supposing that it had happened, this court would not interfere and would not confirm this judgment; but what strikes me in the matter is that there is no evidence that the Morning Post has suffered any damage. There have been twenty applications, and twenty only, made to the Morning Post for copies of the Evening Post, and from that the court is asked to draw the inference which I have already indicated. But there is no evidence that a single copy less of the Morning Post has been sold than would have been if the defendants had not taken the action they have. Under those circumstances it seems to me that there is not enough in this case to warrant the interference of the court by injunction, and that the judgment of Kay, J., must be reversed. But I could not for my own part clear my mind of a lurking suspicion that the name the Evening Post was taken because there was a Morning Post, and that, although the Morning Post has not been hurt, and perhaps the Morning Post never will be hurt to the extent of one penny, yet the public and the persons who buy the Evening Post may possibly think there is some connection with this old-established paper; and at all events I cannot quite feel certain that the assumer of the title did not wish that the public should so think. And under those circumstances, although we reverse the judgment, I think there must be no costs in the case, and that the company must pay their own costs at all events in respect of the experiment they have made both here and in the court below.

GORELL, L.J.—I agree in that conclusion, and as we differ from Kay, J., I must state my reasons for differing from him. In his judgment and in argument a good many authorities were referred to. In my opinion, in cases like this, and especially cases arising under the circumstances before us, authorities are of no use when once we have got the true principle on which the court ought to act. That very clearly appears from a case which was referred to by Mr. Marten, of Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 225, where the publication of a work put forward by the defendant was stopped at the instance of the plaintiff, the publisher of another work. There Lord Eldon says the question is this:—Whether there is a representation that the work of the defendant is the same as the work of the plaintiff? His words are:—"I shall take the question here to be not whether the work is the same, but whether the defendant has not represented it to be the same." Now I will state the case here a little more favourably for the plaintiff, because it is not only whether the defendants have represented their paper to be the same as the plaintiff's, but whether the public would not understand that the defendants' paper was issued from the office of the Morning Post, and connected with the Morning Post in such a way as to damage or prejudice the plaintiff. That I think is the question we have to consider; and there is this fact in this particular case which distinguishes it from most of the cases which have come before the court, that these two publications cannot be called competing publications; the one is a morning paper, the other is an evening paper; and although at one time the proprietor of the Morning Post did publish later editions, he did not publish an evening paper, but only published from time to time late editions of the paper entitled the Morning Post at a time of day when the evening papers begin to be issued. But I think it could not be suggested that anyone would, in consequence of the representation contained in the title Evening Post, understand that to be in competition with, or that it would interfere with the sale of, the Morning Post. That could hardly be contended. Of course, if that had been the case, it would have been much easier to make out that that was the object intended by the defendants, and that there would be damage resulting from such a representation, whether intended or not intended; because if one paper is bought for the other, there must at all events be the loss of the sale which would otherwise take place of the work of the plaintiff. Therefore there is this circumstance to be taken into consideration, that these are not competing papers, so that the title would be understood to be a representation, even if it were not so intended, either that this was an evening edition of the Morning Post, an Evening Post issued from the offices of the Morning Post, or that it was an evening paper connected with the publication of the Morning Post.

There is this also to be observed. This is not like the sale of tea or soap or anything else bought by the public where the article is done up in packets and the purchaser fixes upon some one distinctive feature which easily catches the eye, such as a particular word in large type, and is misled by the imitation of the word in large type, because the representation must be assumed to be made only to those who are going to buy, who will be the reading public, and they will not be people who will only take, so to speak, one catch look at the paper. They will read it, and they would also be people who would be in a position to form an opinion upon the politics contained in the Evening Post. Therefore they are persons of rather more intelligence than the class of purchasers I have already referred to. I think that the Evening Post would be the natural name for the Morning Post to assume if it were published as an evening paper, but then there is no suggestion that the plaintiff has really intended to publish an evening paper, and one comes to the question, assuming that this paper or the name could be understood by some persons to be connected in some way with the Morning Post, can it be said that there is any reasonable prospect of damage or injury to the Morning Post? It is only the name. The papers are not alike; the get up is different, and there is nothing, in my opinion, except the name of the Evening Post, which can be considered as a suggestion that it was connected with the Morning Post. In my opinion in order to justify us in granting an injunction, we ought to be satisfied that there probably will be injury to the pocket of the plaintiff. Therefore, really this is only a common law action for representing that the work of the defendant was the work of the plaintiff, or was so connected with the work of the plaintiff as to do the plaintiff some damage by injuring the selling of his work. It is true we are dealing with it on equitable principles in this way: We are granting an injunction, and, although courts of common law now have the power of granting injunctions, still it is an equitable remedy, and it ought not to be granted unless the court is satisfied that there is damage to the plaintiff, or probable damage, not damage already incurred, as the result of the defendants' action. There must be some evidence that the defendants' work will cause injury to the plaintiff, and will prevent the plaintiff from selling some copies of his work. But here the only suggestion which is put forward is this—subject to one which I will mention presently—that people will be so disgusted at seeing the way in which the editor of the Morning Post is supposed to be issuing the evening edition of the paper that they may say, "We must get rid of the Morning Post when the proprietor issues anything like The Evening Post." But I do not think anybody who has read the paper would think that this was issued by some person who prepared and issued the Morning Post. But then it was suggested that anyone who had heard called out at a railway station, "Terrible Accident," or "Frightful foreign news," or anything of that sort, and saw an evening placard, would buy the paper and would then say "I relied upon the Morning Post, being sure that the Morning Post would contain correct intelligence," and finding that the news could not be depended upon, would then give up his Morning Post. But that is not a reasonable conclusion. Anyone who reads the paper would at once see that it was not from the same hand. If it differed in politics they would at once see the difference. They would not imagine that the Morning Post advocated one kind of politics in the morning and another kind in the evening. As regards the news, they would see when they read the paper that it did not come from the same hand, and therefore there is no probability of damage or injury to the proprietor of the Morning Post by the mistakes or failures of The Evening Post to act as well as the Morning Post does for the benefit of the public. There is only a suggestion of possible injury, and I think we ought not to act on that. In order to justify us in granting an injunction we must have evidence to satisfy us that there is reasonable probability that, in fact, there will be injury to the party complaining. In my opinion the action ought to be dismissed, and I agree with the Lord Chief Justice, that it should be dismissed without costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—This seems to me to be a very difficult case, and one very much upon the line, and I am not at all surprised that the proprietor of the Morning Post has brought this action, or that the learned judge in the court below came to a different conclusion from that to which we arrive. Now what is the question we have to ask ourselves—the test of the law which we have to apply? This is an action the gist of which is that in embodying at the head of the paper the title Evening Post, the defendants, it is said, have put forward an untruthful representation which is calculated to injure the property of the Morning Post—the untruthful representation being an implied representation that there was a proprietary connection between the new paper and the old paper. That is the gist of the action. In order to see if it can be supported we must ask ourselves the question, is the title The Evening Post calculated to deceive persons into the belief that the paper was published by the proprietor of the Morning Post in a way calculated to injure the business of the Morning Post? Unless this complex and double proposition can be answered in the affirmative, the application for an injunction must fail. In order to succeed the Morning Post must make out that the title Evening Post is calculated to deceive people into the belief that the paper is published by the Morning Post, and in a way which is likely to injure the Morning Post. Now, first of all as to the deception. Is it calculated to deceive? Twenty persons have been deceived. I do not lay, I hope, undue stress upon that. Secondly, why has the title Evening Post been deliberately adopted by that paper? The world is wide, and there are many names. Why was there a persistent resolve to take the title Evening Post when the Evening Courier, or Evening Gazette, or some other name might have been taken? The proprietor of the Morning Post apparently is not about to publish an evening paper; but suppose it was his intention to publish an evening edition, and that intention was carried out, what name would it be more natural for him to choose than the Evening Post? The Daily News, if it published an evening edition, would in all probability call it the Evening Daily News; but you cannot suppose a paper which is called the Morning Post if it published an evening edition would call itself the Evening Morning Post. That would be too absurd. The natural title which the Morning Post would take would be the Evening Post. Now why has that title been taken? One ought not to hesitate when one is judging facts as well as law to draw a sharp line, and I do not hesitate to draw the inference that the title was taken to deceive somebody. But that is not enough. Is it calculated to deceive the public in a way which would injure the Morning Post? It may be that it is taken to deceive the public without injuring the Morning Post. In my opinion that is exactly what has happened in this case; it has been an attempt to deceive the public, but there has not been shown any probability of injuring the Morning Post. The Morning Post is an old-established paper—everybody knows it, its character and politics, and literary position. I am of opinion that this attempt is one which never could touch that. In the first place, it is not a competing paper, and there arises a broad distinction between this case and almost all the others which have been cited to us. It is not entering into competition. A person does not buy the Morning Post the less because he buys the Evening Post. When, if at all, is it to be suggested that the injury will be done to the Morning Post? When the public buy it? We then asked the learned counsel who argued the case for the Morning Post how he suggested that a person who bought the Evening Post in the evening would be less likely to buy the Morning Post in the morning, and, as the Lord Chief Justice suggested, would the Morning Post take one penny the less? The counsel was then driven to this ingenious suggestion, that a person going by railway might buy his Morning Post overnight. Fancy the portrait of a gentleman buying the Morning Post overnight. It is a suggestion which seems to me most remote and imaginary. It is as unlikely as if you were to have your breakfast overnight. The only case in which I can conceive a person having breakfast overnight is when he is not likely to have it next morning; and, therefore, if a person is not likely to be able to purchase a Morning Post overnight, it is just as likely he might then purchase the Evening Post. But the hypothesis is that in such a case he cannot buy the Morning Post next morning, and, if so, where is the injury? It is too remote and fanciful to suppose that anything of that sort will happen. In the next place, is a person who reads the paper likely to be deceived? He must be an extremely unintelligent person if he thinks that the Evening Post, which disclaims all connection with the Morning Post, and writes upon different topics and in a different style, is connected with the Morning Post. The suggestion would explode itself before he got half way through the first page. I think the Morning Post is not likely to be hurt. Still, I think a trick has been attempted to be played, and for that reason I think the justice of the case is sufficiently met by dismissing the action, without costs.

Appeal allowed.

DOWNING v. FALMOUTH UNITED SEWERAGE BOARD. (a.)

Practice—Discovery of documents—Discretion of judge—Use of affidavits on application for discovery—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, r. 12.

On an application for discovery of documents under ord. 31, r. 12, the court has discretion to refuse discovery which it considers cannot be reasonably expected to be of any use to the applicant. On such an application it is not the practice of the court to require or allow affidavits to be made in order to enable the court to decide whether there ought to be discovery; but the court, in order to come to a conclusion, must look at the pleadings, and may also look at any affidavits for some other purpose already made in the action. The party intending to use such affidavits must give notice of his intention to the other side and specify the particular affidavits or particular passages in affidavits that he relies on. A general notice to read all such affidavits ought not to be given, and will render the party giving such general notice to read liable to pay the costs occasioned thereby.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants using a sewer tank in such a way as to cause a nuisance.

The plaintiffs were several persons who occupied shops and houses near the tank. The defendants were the local sewerage authority at Falmouth. The defendants, in their defence, after denying the existence of any nuisance, alleged that the tank was constructed by a competent engineer and approved of by the Local Government Board; they further alleged that before the action was instituted, on hearing the complaints made by the plaintiffs, they employed an engineer to inspect and report on the working of the tank, that they submitted that report to the plaintiffs and offered to carry out the suggested recommendations, but that the plaintiffs refused such offer; that after such refusal the defendants, on July 19, 1887, passed a resolution consenting to the nomination of an engineer to be approved of by the plaintiffs, and offered to carry out such recommendations as he should make as to abating any existing nuisance (except the removal of the tank) with the consent of the Local Government Board, and that such resolution was communicated to the plaintiffs, who would not accept the offer therein contained.

The plaintiffs shortly afterwards—viz., in August, 1886—instituted this action. On November 25, 1887, the plaintiffs applied under ord. 31, r. 12, for an order for discovery by the defendants of documents in their possession relating to the matters in question. The plaintiffs proposed to read in support of their application certain affidavits which had been filed upon a motion for an interim injunction before the vacation judge. This was objected to by the defendants, on the ground that proper notice had not been given, and the objection was allowed.

Chitty, J., refused the plaintiffs' application.

The plaintiffs appealed, and gave notice to read (if necessary), on the hearing of the appeal motion, the evidence filed on the motion before the vacation judge. The defendants gave notice that they would object thereto, this evidence having been disallowed in the court below.

The evidence in question consisted of about thirty affidavits, the great part of which related exclusively to the fact of nuisance, and had no reference to documents. One of the affidavits, however, related to the resolution of July 19, 1887, and two other affidavits related to correspondence between the defendants and the Local Government Board in the years 1885-6-7, showing that the latter had refused to sanction a loan for further works which would bring more sewage into the tank.

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and S. J. Fraser Macleod, for the appellants.—On an application for discovery under ord. 31, r. 12, the judge has to exercise a discretion in refusing or allowing discovery. The judge, therefore, can and ought now to receive evidence on the points with respect to which discovery is sought: Martin v. Spicer, 34 W. R. 589, 32 Ch. D. 592.

Romer, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the defendants.—[Cotton, L.J.—Do you object to make an affidavit specifying what entries the books in your possession contain as to any resolution of the board admitting that the sewage works caused a nuisance, and in particular as to the resolution of July 19, 1887; and also specifying any correspondence between the defendants and the Local Government Board containing any such admission?] We are willing to make such an affidavit, reserving, of course, our right to claim priviiege. [They were stopped.]

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., replied on the question of costs.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of Chitty, J., refusing to make the ordinary order for discovery of documents, and also declining to make any limited order. The application was made under ord. 31, r. 12, and with reference to that, the plaintiffs have given notice to read on this appeal a mass of affidavits filed on a previous interlocutory application. Now the court ought not to be required to consider a mass of affidavits on the question whether the defendant is likely to have in his possession documents to the production of which the plaintiff is entitled. The rule in question never intended to do away with the principles with regard to discovery, but only intended to give the court a discretion, to be exercised reasonably; and if the court is satisfied that no result could be obtained by the production of documents, or no good could be reasonably expected to result, the court may refuse to make any order. How is that to be ascertained? By looking at the pleadings. The pleadings show what questions have to be tried, and the nature of these questions will show whether there is good reason for coming to the conclusion that the production of documents cannot be expected to be of any use. But the court ought not to require affidavits to be made for that purpose. Where there has already been something mentioned outside the pleadings in affidavits previously made by both parties, the court may look at it to inform its mind in deciding whether it would be material for the purposes of discovery.

I think that Chitty, J., was right in considering that as the question in the action was nuisance or no nuisance, it was not probable that the plaintiffs would be assisted by any general order for production, and therefore, that he was right in refusing to make the order asked for, which would only result in scheduling a mass of documents that could not be of any use to the plaintiffs. I think the court should see what the real test between the parties really is, and, therefore, should look, not only at the pleadings, but at the whole proceedings as expanded beyond the pleadings by the affidavits, in order to see whether they suggest the existence of documents the production of which would be serviceable. But that ought not to be done without the attention of the other side being called to the affidavits relied on, and a general notice to read a mass of affidavits ought not to have been given. The plaintiff's case is that this is in fact a nuisance, and attention has been called to resolutions of the board and to correspondence with the Local Government Board which possibly may furnish evidence sufficient to establish the fact of the existence of an actionable nuisance, and may save the plaintiffs the expense of going into evidence about it. In my opinion, therefore, we should to require the defendants to make an affidavit as to documents in their possession containing any admission as to a nuisance, also as to the correspondence between the defendants and the Local Government Board in the years 1885, 1886, 1887 relating to the defendants' system of sewage; the defendants to be at liberty to raise any question of privilege as to any of the documents. As regards costs, the plaintiffs were wrong in proceeding on the idea that affidavits are to be filed on these occasions, and altogether wrong in giving a general notice to read this mass of affidavits instead of calling the attention of the defendants to the fact that the existence of documents material to the plaintiffs' case was suggested by three of the affidavits; the plaintiffs must, therefore, pay the costs occasioned by their general notice. The other costs here to be costs in the action, and we do not interfere with the order below as to costs.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that under the new practice the court ought to allow parties to file evidence in order to enable the court to decide whether there ought to be discovery. That view, in my opinion, is erroneous.

Patent—Action to restrain threats by patentee—Right to raise issue of validity of patent—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32—Amendment of pleadings—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 28, r. 1.

In an action brought under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to restrain threats, the plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged that the defendants' patent was invalid. Chitty, J., on the application of the defendants, ordered the allegation to be struck out. A subsequent application made to Kekewich, J., to whom the action had been transferred for trial, for leave to amend the statement of claim by restoring the allegation of the invalidity of the patent was refused.

(a.) Reported by W. Ivimey Cook, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (Fry, L.J., dissenting), that the leave to amend ought to be given on certain terms which would prevent the defendants suffering any loss.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a patent for an invention of "improvements in the manufacture of certain chemicals and in their purification from iron," referred to in the pleadings as "Kynaston's Invention."

The defendants were the owners of a patent known as Spence's Patent, for an invention of "improvements in the manufacture of alum and other salts of alumina."

The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs' use of the Kynaston Invention was an infringement of the defendants' patent, and threatened the plaintiffs with legal proceedings and liability in respect of such use.

The plaintiffs then commenced this action, and in the statement of claim it was stated that the Kynaston Invention was not an infringement of the defendants' patent; that the plaintiffs had never used the defendants' patent; that the defendants' patent was invalid; and that the defendants had not commenced, and refused to commence, either against the plaintiffs or any other person, any action for the infringement of the defendants' patent.

Thereupon the defendants took out a summons to strike out the statement by the plaintiffs in the statement of claim that the defendants' patent was invalid.

Chitty, J., on the 12th of August, 1886, ordered the statement to be struck out (35 W. R. 26, 33 Ch. D. 579).

In the recent case of Challender v. Royle, ante, p. 157, 36 Ch. D. 425, the court expressed an opinion that in such an action the validity of the defendants' patent could be put in issue. In consequence of this opinion the plaintiffs in the present action applied to Kekewich, J., to whom the action had meanwhile been transferred for trial, for leave to amend the statement of claim by restoring the allegation of invalidity of the patent.

Kekewich, J., thought that he was bound by the decision of his predecessor, which had not been appealed against, and refused the application.

The plaintiffs appealed from this refusal, and also applied to the court by original motion for leave to appeal from the order of Chitty, J., notwithstanding the expiration of the time limited for so doing.

Moulton, Q.C., and Lawson, for the application for leave to appeal from the order of Chitty, J.

Aston, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the defendants.

The COURT (COTTON and FRY, L.JJ.) refused the application.

The appeal from Kekewich, J., was then heard.

Moulton, Q.C., and Lawson, for the appellants.—The court has jurisdiction under rule 1 of order 28 to allow the amendment of the pleadings if they do not raise the true issue between the parties, and such an amendment has been allowed, even at the trial: Tildesley v. Harper, 27 W. R. 249, 10 Ch. D. 393. Here the question between the parties is as to the validity of the defendants' patent, and that is a question which it has recently been held may be raised: Challender v. Royle. The amendment ought, therefore, to be allowed.

Aston, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the defendants.—The effect of allowing this amendment would practically be to reverse the order of Chitty, J., which has not been appealed against, and which is not appealable by reason of the time limited for appealing having expired. The amendment ought not, therefore, to be allowed.

Moulton, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5, 1887.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a refusal of Kekewich, J., to give the plaintiffs liberty to introduce by amendment into their statement of claim words which would enable them to contest the validity of the patent claimed by the defendants. The action is brought under the 32nd section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, which enables anyone who is threatened with proceedings if he uses a certain invention to proceed by action to restrain the issue of such threats. In order to establish his claim he must show that what he is doing is not an infringement of any legal right of the defendant. Chitty, J., on the 12th of August last year, struck out from the statement of claim seven words which had been introduced by the pleader questioning the validity of the defendants' patent, and in consequence of the opinion lately expressed by this court in Challender v. Royle, the plaintiffs moved, before Kekewich, J., for liberty to amend their statement of claim by introducing an allegation that the defendants' patent is invalid. They did so, under ord. 28, r. 1, which says that "the court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, allow either party to alter or amend his indorsement or pleadings in such manner and on such terms as may be just, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions in controversy between the parties." Now I do not in any way vary or depart from the opinion I have previously expressed. The point did not come before us in such a form that we could finally decide it, but after that expression of opinion by the Court of Appeal it is certainly a real question between the plaintiffs and the defendants here to be tried in the action whether the plaintiffs can successfully impeach the patent on which the defendants are relying, and which they say the plaintiffs are infringing. I do not go at all into any of the questions introduced by Mr. Aston as to whether the threats were such threats as would come within the section, and various other matters, but I will only deal with the question whether this is one of the questions to be decided between the parties. If I thought that that point could not be raised in this action I should say that was a ground for not allowing the amendment, but assuming that it can be raised in such an action as this, what, then, is to be done? If it had not been that a year ago Chitty, J., made an order preventing the plaintiffs from raising this question, and the plaintiffs acquiesced in that order for nearly a year, I think the court, taking the view which Bowen, L.J., and I expressed, though we had not to decide it, would say that it is right, having regard to the terms of this rule, that the matter should be introduced so as to allow the question to be decided between the parties. There was an original motion before us on Wednesday for leave to appeal notwithstanding the time which had elapsed since Chitty, J.'s order of the 12th of August, 1886.

We refused that application, and I have no doubt that we were right. No reason was shown for the delay in appealing, except that the parties did not then sufficiently consider what the law was, or were afraid to try the appeal, which, of course, is not a good reason.

The case now before us is different. When by an amendment the real substantial question can be raised between the parties, ought we to refuse to allow the amendment, having regard to the rule and to the direction in the Judicature Act that, as far as possible, in any proceeding all questions between the parties shall be decided, so as to prevent multiplicity of actions. I have come to the conclusion, and Bowen, L.J., agrees with me, that it would be better (if we can do it without injustice to the defendants) to allow that amendment to be introduced rather than to leave the plaintiffs to the liberty which we gave them, on the application for leave to appeal, of having the action dismissed without prejudice to their right to bring another action. But we ought to see that the defendants do not suffer any loss or expense, and we ought also to see that they are not prejudiced in the way of trying the question of the validity of the patent. They ought, therefore, to have the same notice of the objections to be taken, and the same right of beginning and replying as they would have had if they had brought an action against the plaintiffs to restrain the violation of their patent. I do not see that the defendants can be prejudiced by our allowing this amendment if we give them the costs which have been incurred and wasted, and also give them such rights of knowing what the objections are, and of beginning and replying, as they would have if an action had been brought by them for violation of their patent. Therefore we think it the right course to give the plaintiffs liberty, on or before Tuesday next, to introduce, by way of amendment, in their statement of claim an allegation that Spence's patent is invalid, on the grounds to be mentioned in our order, the plaintiffs undertaking to allow the defendants, on the question of validity of the patent, to begin and have a reply. Then, which I think is the only way of saving the defendants from any expenses which they ought not to bear, we add this: "And order the plaintiffs, if they so amend, to pay to the defendants their costs as between solicitor and client of this application and all costs incurred by the defendants and thrown away in consequence of the amendment hereby authorized not having been made on the day after Chitty, J.'s order of the 12th of August, 1886, including the costs (if any) caused by any adjournment of the action rendered necessary by reason of the amendment being made or authorized." We do not make the order for payment of the costs as between solicitor and client as an adverse order between litigants, but we impose such payment as a term on which we give the plaintiffs the liberty to amend, so as to show that we very much discourage a party's waiting, as these plaintiffs have done, for such a length of time, before bringing to the Court of Appeal the question whether they are at liberty to introduce such an amendment. If the plaintiffs do not avail themselves of this liberty to amend, the only order will be that the appeal motion will be refused, with costs, those costs being costs to be taxed as between party and party in the ordinary way.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

FRY, L.J.—I think that my learned brethren are too indulgent to the applicants. I do not for a moment doubt, after their previous expression of opinion, that the question which is to be raised by this amendment is one which would have been proper to have been decided in the action if it had been properly raised; but it is to be borne in mind that in this case there is a subsisting order dealing with this particular point of pleading. That order was made more than a twelvemonth ago, and we have held that order not to be the subject of appeal, for, although a new view of the law may have been expressed, no new matter has arisen. Under these circumstances I do not think it competent to the court to make an amendment inconsistent with and reversing that order. I further think that it is in the interests of litigants that there should be some finality in orders of this description; and where an order has been made, and is no longer subject to appeal, dealing with the mode of conducting the case, I think that it is right that that decision should be final as between the litigants in that action, and that, therefore, we have done the utmost to which the applicants are entitled, in giving them leave to bring another action free from any prejudicial effect of their not having raised the point in this action. The fact that in this very case, we had before us in the paper two days ago two applications in the same action about the same amendment of pleadings, is an illustration of the multiplicity of applications to which this, as I think, laxity of practice is likely to lead. I think, further, although the whole policy of the Judicature Act and of the rules require the court to allow all proper amendments to be made to raise the real question between the parties, yet that it is possible for the plaintiff, by his want of care, by his delay, and by his negligence, to deprive himself of the right of further harassing the defendant by new amendments. I have one or two objection to the order, which is this. I think it is not suitable than the nature of things allows usefully to be made; and I am apprehensive that orders of such extreme complexity will only lead to further difficulties in litigation. For these reasons, I need not say so willingly, I differ from the conclusion of my learned brethren.

THOMAS v. OWEN. (a.)

Easement — Right of way—Implied grant—General words—"Appurtenances."

In the case of a formed road made over an old servient tenement to and for the apparent use of a dominant tenement, there is an implied reservation of the right of way on a demise of the soil of the servient, although the easement be neither continuous nor of necessity.

In such a case a subsequent demise of the dominant tenement, "together with the appurtenances belonging thereto," will pass the right of way.

Appeal from a divisional court (Mathew and Grantham JJ.), refusing a new trial of the action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord Esher, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.), was read by FRY, L.J.—This is an action brought for interference with a right of way; and the question is whether the plaintiff has the right of way which he claims.

The plaintiff and defendant are tenants of adjoining farms in the Island of Anglesea, under Sir Richard Bulkley, the plaintiff's farm being known as Tywian and the defendant's farm as Caeran.

A parish road, leading from Llanrhyddlad to a place on the coast known as Cemlyn Bay, passes through Caeran, the defendant's farm; the plaintiff's farm communicates with this highway by a road which, from the plans and other evidence before us, we hold to be a private road. This private road joins the parish road at a place called the Old Bar. From a point on the plaintiff's farm and on this private road about half-way between the homestead of Tywian and the Old Bar, lane, known as Lon Car Glas, runs westward, and leads from the plaintiff's farm and the private road to a spot on the parish road nearer to Cemlyn Bay than the Old Bar.

It is therefore the nearest way from Tywian to Cemlyn Bay and the parts thereabouts, and besides being nearer than the private road it is level, whilst the private road is steep and hilly. The right of way claimed by the plaintiff is along this Lon Car Glas.

This lane is, we conclude from the evidence before us, an ancient lane; it is 418 yards in length, 22 yards wide; for a short distance on one side near its eastern end the lane is bounded by the plaintiff's land, but with this slight exception it has the defendant's land on both sides; it is bounded by turf banks with hedges on the top for its whole length; it has no communication on either side with the defendant's land. The roadway is made with cobble stones, and is partly grown over with grass. The lane is a made road perfectly visible; it is a long strip between two roads intersecting the defendant's farm, separated from that farm on both sides, and only open to the defendant's access at its western end where it joins the parish road; it subserves no use for the defendant's farm, except so far as it may be grazed by his cattle, but it leads from the high road to the plaintiff's land and towards the plaintiff's farmhouse, and that is its only visible purpose and reason for existence.

Such is the present condition of the road, and such we conclude, from the evidence, has been its condition for thirty or forty years before the action was brought.

It has for many years past been used by the plaintiff as occasion required, both for himself and his family, in going to chapel and elsewhere, and by his carts in bringing coal, gravel, seaweed, and guano from Cemlyn Bay; and it has from time to time been repaired by him. These acts have been done by the plaintiff without asking or receiving permission from the defendant, and, until immediately before action, without interference on his part.

We conclude from the evidence that the user for thirty or forty years past has been in accordance with the modern user by the plaintiff as we have stated it.

The defendant had occupied his farm prior to 1873 as tenant from year to year. But in that year he accepted a lease from Sir Richard Bulkley under which he now holds. By that lease the landlord demised to the defendant, amongst other things, all those tenements usually known by the name of Caeran, containing by admeasurement 305a. 1r. 24p., described as then in the tenure or occupation of the defendant. This description was followed by general words and by reservations of timber, mines, and game. The lease is silent as to the lane in question and any user thereof, but it is admitted by the plaintiff that the lane is comprised in the 305a. 1r. 24p. of Caeran.

The plaintiff had occupied his farm as tenant from year to year to Sir Richard Bulkley down to the year 1878, when he accepted a lease from his landlord under which he now holds. By this instrument the lessor demised to the plaintiff the messuage known as Tywian, together with all the land and all houses, buildings, and appurtenances thereto belonging, subject to reservations of timber, mines, and game. This lease contains no other general words than the word appurtenances.

We think it a just inference or conclusion from the evidence before us that both in 1873 and 1878 the use of the lane in question was visibly necessary to the comfortable enjoyment of the plaintiff's farm in the manner in which it was enjoyed and had been enjoyed at and before those dates respectively.

We think further that in construing the leases of 1873 and 1878 we are bound to attend to the previous user of the plaintiff's and defendant's farms respectively: Hall v. Lund, 11 W. R. 271, 1 H. & C. 676.

The defendant interfered with the plaintiff's user of the lane, and therefore this action was brought.

It was tried before Mr. Commissioner McIntyre and a jury, who found that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way along the lane by reason of user. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff accordingly, and from that judgment this appeal is brought.

The main contention of the appellant has been that, even assuming the user as found by the jury and as we have stated it, the plaintiff cannot recover. The defendant has, in addition, raised certain contentions as to the facts, in respect of which we have already stated our conclusions. The evidence, in our opinion, amply justifies the verdict and judgment, in point of fact, if they can be justified in point of law.

The defendant has contended before us that, according to the true construction of the lease of 1873, Sir Richard Bulkley thereby purported to demise to him Lon Car Glas free from all rights of way in the plaintiff; that the lessor was estopped by this lease, and that the plaintiff, having taken a subsequent lease from Sir Richard Bulkley, is, like his lessor, estopped from denying the defendant's title to the lane free from any right of way.

The defendant further contends that, even if Sir Richard Bulkley was able to grant a right of way to the plaintiff over Lon Car Glas, he did not in fact grant it by the lease of 1878, under which the plaintiff claims, and, consequently, that the plaintiff has no title to the way claimed.

With regard to the lease of 1873, it is not necessary to consider how the matter would have stood if the lessor had himself been in possession of the plaintiff's farm at the date of this lease to the defendant, for this was not the case. On the contrary, at the date in question the material facts stood thus; the farm, now the plaintiff's, was then in his occupation as tenant from year to year under Sir Richard Bulkley; the lane in question was a made and fenced road, subsisting visibly for the convenience of the plaintiff's farm and of no use as a road to the defendant, it was, and had been, openly used by the plaintiff and his predecessors in title for many years, and had been repaired by them; the right of using this road constituted an easement of the farm occupied by the plaintiff, and no demise could be made of the soil of the lane free from that right without derogating from the grant to the plaintiff under which his then subsisting tenancy was constituted. In this state of circumstances the presumption that the demise in question of Lon Car Glas was free from any right of way is, in our opinion, rebutted by a consideration of these circumstances, just as in Doe d. Freeland v. Burt, 1 T. R. 701, the presumption that the demise of a house extended to the centre of the earth was rebutted by the existence at the time of the demise of the house of an earlier demise of a cellar by the same lessor, and the occupation of that cellar by a person claiming under that demise.

But then it is urged that, alike in implied reservations and in implied grants, a rule exists to this effect, that, whilst such an implication may arise in the case of easements of necessity and continuous easements, it cannot arise in the case of easements which are neither of necessity nor continuous, and for this proposition Polden v. Bastard, 14 W. R. 198, L. R. 1 Q. B. 156, is cited, and many other authorities might have been invoked. But on this principle, as established by such decisions, there has been engrafted by other decisions an exception in the case of a formed road made over an alleged servient tenement to, and for the apparent use of, the dominant tenement (per Bramwell, B., in Langley v. Hammond, 16 W. R. 937, L. R. 3 Ex. 161, Watts v. Kelson, 19 W. R. 338, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 166); and if the exception arises in the case of a grant, we think it ought to arise in the case of a reservation made to support an earlier grant, as in the present case.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the lease of 1873 was, according to its true construction, subject to the right of way over Lon Car Glas then existing in the plaintiff, and that consequently no question of estoppel can arise.

Then arises the question whether the lease of 1878 from Sir Richard Bulkley to the plaintiff conveyed to him the right of way in question. Under the circumstances of this case as we have found them, it appears to us to follow from the cases of Watts v. Kelson and Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 60, 23 W. R. Dig. 251, that the right of way in question would pass if the lease had contained general words descriptive of easements and rights usually enjoyed with the demised hereditaments.

But it was contended before us that the absence in the lease of 1878 of any other general words than the word appurtenances made an important difference, and distinguished this case from the earlier authorities to which we have referred.

No doubt the word appurtenances is not apt for the creation of a new right, and the word appurtenant is not apt to describe a right which had never previously existed, and therefore the mere grant of all appurtenances or of all ways appurtenant to the principal subject of the grant has been held in many cases not to create a new right of way where the right was not pre-existing at the date of the grant. But from as long ago as the 1st of Philip and Mary (Hill v. Grange, Plow. 170) the word appurtenances has easily admitted of a secondary meaning and as equivalent in that case to usually occupied.

Here at the date of the lease of 1878 Lon Car Glas was not in the occupation of the lessor, but in that of the defendant, and the defendant had, as we have held, acquired an estate in it as against which the right of way was reserved, and reserved for the benefit of the land and house of the plaintiff; and under these circumstances we think that the right of way did pass under the word appurtenances.

This conclusion is, we think, aided by sufficient authority, for which purpose it will suffice to refer to the cases of Nicholas v. Chamberlain, Cro. Jac. 121; Hall v. Lund; and Ewart v. Cochrane, 10 W. R. 3, 4 Macq. 117.

For these reasons we hold the judgment appealed from to be right, and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Dentist—Dentists' register—Qualification—Erasure of name on loss of qualification—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 32).

Where a person has been placed upon the dentists' register kept under the provisions of the Dentists Act, 1878, in respect of a qualification which has since been taken away, his name cannot be erased from the register simply upon proof of the loss of such qualification.

Hence, where a person had obtained a licence from a medical authority, and his name was placed upon the dentists' register in respect of such qualification, his name is not liable to be erased from the register simply upon proof that his licence has been cancelled by the medical authority.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a mandamus directing the General Council of Medical Education and Registration to restore the applicant's name to the register of dentists kept under the Dentists Act, 1878.

The applicant in 1878 obtained from the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland a diploma in dentistry, and as a licentiate of that body his name was, under sec. 6 of the Dentists Act, 1878, entered in the dentists' register kept under the provisions of that Act. The Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland granted the diploma on the conditions that the holder would not seek to attract business by advertising or by any practise considered by the college to be unbecoming, and that the diploma would be cancelled on its being proved to the satisfaction of president and council that he had done so.

In 1885 the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland cancelled the diploma on the ground that the applicant had advertised for business, and, upon receiving notice of the fact that the diploma had been cancelled, the General Council of Medical Education and Registration erased his name from the dentists' register.

The Divisional Court (Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ.) having made the rule for a mandamus as stated above, the general council appealed.

The Dentists Act, 1878, s. 2, provides that "medical authorities" mean the bodies and universities who choose members of the general council.

Section 3.—A person shall not be entitled to take or use the name or title of "dentist," . . . or "dental practitioner," or any name, title, addition or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is a person specially qualified to practise dentistry, unless he is registered under this Act.

Section 6.—Any person who (a) is a licentiate in dental surgery or dentistry of any of the medical authorities, or (b) is entitled, as hereinafter mentioned, to be registered as a foreign or colonial dentist, or at the passing of this Act bonâ fide engaged in the practise of dentistry or dental surgery, either separately or in conjunction with the practise of medicine, surgery or pharmacy, shall be entitled to be registered under this Act.

Section 7.—Where a person entitled to be registered under this Act produces or sends to the general registrar the document conferring or evidencing his licence or qualification, with a statement of his name, address, and the other particulars, if any, required for registration, and pays the registration fee, he shall be registered in the dentists' register.

Section 11.—(1) A register shall be kept by the general registrar to be styled the dentists' register; that register shall (a) contain in one alphabetical list United Kingdom dentists—that is to say, &c.; and (b) contain in a separate alphabetical list all such colonial dentists as are registered in pursuance of this Act; and (c) contain in a separate alphabetical list all such foreign dentists as are registered in pursuance of this Act. (2) The dentists' register shall . . . state the description and date of the qualification in respect of which the persons are registered, &c. (3) The general council shall cause a correct copy of the dentists' register to be from time to time and at least once a year printed under their direction. . . .

Section 12.—(1) The general registrar shall from time to time insert in the dentists' register any alteration which may come to his knowledge in the name or address of any person registered. (2) The general registrar shall erase from the dentists' register the name of every deceased person. (3) The general registrar may erase from the dentists' register the name of any person who has ceased to practise, but not (except as hereinafter provided) without the consent of that person. . . .

Section 13.—The general council shall cause to be [illegible] from the dentists' register any entry which [illegible] been incorrectly or fraudulently made. Where [illegible] registered in the dentists' register has, [illegible] before or after the passing of this Act, or [illegible] before or after he is so registered, been convicted [illegible] in her Majesty's dominions or elsewhere of an [illegible] which, if committed in England, would be a [illegible] or misdemeanour, or been guilty of any infamous [illegible] disgraceful conduct in a professional respect, that [illegible] shall be liable to have his name erased from the [illegible]. The general council may . . . cause in[illegible] to be made into the case of a person alleged to be [illegible] to have his name erased under this section. . . . [illegible] name erased from the register in pursuance of this [illegible] shall also be erased from the list of licentiates [illegible] dental surgery or dentistry of the medical authority [illegible] which such person is a licentiate.

Section 15.—The general council shall, for the pur[illegible] of exercising in any case the powers of erasing [illegible], and of restoring to, the dentists' register the [illegible] of a person or an entry, ascertain the facts of such [illegible] by a committee of their own body, not exceeding [illegible] in number, of whom the quorum shall be not less [illegible] three, and a report of the committee shall be con[illegible] as to the facts for the purpose of the exercise of [illegible] said power by the general council.

Kennedy, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.—Keeping a register under section 11 means keeping a correct register. There are certain cases specified in sections 12 and 13 in which the name can be erased from the register. But the council must have [illegible] power to erase the name of a person who has [illegible] qualification, the power being implied from the [illegible] to keep a correct register. The applicant, if [illegible] mandamus goes, may practise in Dublin, though [illegible] has been taken away.

[illegible], Q.C., and Lyon, for the applicant, were not [illegible] upon.

[illegible] Bowen, M.R.—In this case the applicant was, in [illegible] a licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons in [illegible], and in respect of that qualification applied to [illegible] upon the register kept under the Dentists [illegible] 1878. Since that time, in consequence of a breach [illegible] undertaking entered into by him with the Royal [illegible] of Surgeons in Ireland, that body cancelled his [illegible], and upon that being brought to the notice [illegible] general council they, for that reason alone, [illegible] his name from the dentists' register without [illegible] under the provisions of sections 13 and 15 of the [illegible] Act, 1878. The question before us is whether [illegible] were justified in so doing, and that question [illegible] upon the provisions of the Dentists Act, 1878. [illegible] 6 deals with the case of a person who is to be [illegible] on the register. "To be registered" means to be [illegible] upon the register. That seems to me to be the [illegible] meaning of that section. The provisions of [illegible] 7 seem to me to show that that is so. It [illegible] the qualified person who "pays the registra[illegible]" being entitled to be registered. That means [illegible] of one fee on registration, not payment of an [illegible], and seems to me to show that section 6 [illegible] the time of putting the name on the register. [illegible] is the true construction of the section, it gets [illegible] the meaning sought to be placed on section [illegible] The 1st sub-section of section 11 must refer to the [illegible] when the person is placed upon the register. The [illegible] sub-section refers to the description and date of the [illegible]ations of the registered persons in respect of [illegible] they are registered. The 3rd sub-section is clearly [illegible] in any view of the case, because names may be [illegible] from the register under the provisions of sections [illegible] 15, and other names may be added to it. Up to [illegible] there is no provision for dealing with the register except with regard to the original entry of names in it. Section 12, however, deals with the power of erasing from the register the names of deceased persons and persons who have ceased to practise. Section 13 deals also with erasures from the register, giving the general council power of erasing the names of registered persons in certain specified instances. The general council are to "cause inquiry to be made into the case of a person alleged to be liable to have his name erased under this section." They are to exercise that power of erasure under the provisions of section 15. The provisions of those two sections seem to me conclusive to show that the power of erasure conferred upon the general council is a judicial power, and is confined to those matters into which the council can make inquiry—namely, where the case comes within section 13. The power of erasure conferred by section 13 is different from the power conferred by section 12, which is in the nature of a ministerial power. I do not mean in any way to say that the local medical authority may not, by reason of the breach of the condition upon which they granted the licence, strike the name off their register; but I do say that the mere fact that the applicant's name has been struck off the local register by reason of such a breach does not of itself entitle the general council to strike his name off their register without due inquiry under sections 13 and 15. The Dentists Act, 1878, instituted the dentists' register, and accordingly the well-known principle of law is applicable—that when a statute institutes a new state of things, the powers of dealing with that state of things must be looked for solely within the four corners of the statute. Therefore, everything with respect to this new register must be found in the statute itself. Though I have arrived at this conclusion, I must add that if the general council think that the breach of the condition under which the licence in Ireland was obtained is disgraceful conduct in a professional respect within the meaning of section 13, and I am myself inclined to think that such may, under certain circumstances, be the case, then I think that they would have the power, after due inquiry, of erasing the name from the register. This mandamus must go, but the fact of its going does not take away from the general council their power to exercise jurisdiction under sections 13 and 15 of the Dentists Act, 1878.

Lindley, L.J.—This case is one of great importance because we have come to the conclusion that the general council have no power to remove a name from their register simply on the ground that the name has been removed from the register of the local medical authority, without exercising the powers conferred upon them by sections 13 and 15, the registered person's qualification, in respect of which he was placed upon the dentists' register, having been derived from the fact of his being on the local register. Whether it is accidental or not, this Act of 1878 differs from the Medical Act, 1858, the power of erasure being more limited in the Act of 1878, and the consequence is that the local bodies have less control over dentists than over medical men. This question turns upon the Act itself. Section 6 seems to me to refer to the original entry of the name in the register, and this view is borne out by section 7. There are certain provisions which relate to the putting of names on the register, and there are certain provisions contained in sections 12, 13, and 15 which relate to the removal of names from the register. There is no provision which enables the general council to remove a name from the register simply because the name has been removed from the local register. This applicant is entitled to have his name restored to the dentists' register without prejudice to an inquiry by the general council, if they think fit, as to whether his case comes within section 13.

Lopes, L.J.—In my opinion it is not sufficient to entitle the general council to erase the applicant's name from the dentists' register that he has lost the qualification by means of which he was placed upon the register. I am, however, clearly of opinion that it is now open to the general council to take proceedings under sections 13 and 15, and if the case is made out against the applicant under section 13 to erase his name. I will only add that, if upon due inquiry they come to the conclusion that he has wilfully and deliberately acted contrary to the condition imposed upon him when he obtained his diploma, his conduct would come within the words "disgraceful conduct in a professional respect."

In re Exchange Drapery Co. (Limited). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Distribution of surplus assets—Shares fully and partly paid up—Proviso in articles for interest on balance.

Certain shares in a company were allotted as fully paid up, and the articles of association provided that the holders of these shares should be entitled to interest upon such amount of the nominal value of these shares as should be equal to the amount for the time being not called up on the ordinary shares. The amount due on the latter shares was not called up in full. The company went into liquidation, and, after paying its debts and liabilities and repaying to the above shareholders the excess in value of their shares over the ordinary shares, there remained a surplus distributable among the shareholders.

Held, that, under the above proviso, the holders of the fully paid-up shares were entitled to interest on the amount repaid to them, to be calculated from the date of the commencement of the winding up to the date of the repayment.

Motion.

The company was incorporated in 1872 for the purpose of taking over and working a drapery establishment in Sheffield, the nominal capital being £45,000 in 4,500 shares of £10 each. The articles of association set out an agreement, made on the 1st of August, 1871, between the vendors and the promoters of the company, by which, after provisions that the promoters should form a company under the above name for purchasing the vendors' business, and that the vendors should sell to the company their business premises and goodwill, it was agreed (clause 8) that the total price to be paid by the company to the vendors should be £20,500, payable (clause 10) as to £15,000 by the issue of 1,500 fully paid-up shares, and as to the residue by a first instalment of £5,000 in cash, and the remainder by three equal instalments to be respectively secured by bills drawn by the vendors upon, and accepted by, the company, the whole of the unpaid purchase-money to carry interest at five per cent. per annum.

Clause 11 provided that the 1,500 shares to be allotted to the vendors should be called and marked as "vendors' shares," and that "the vendors or other the holders of these shares shall be entitled to dividends upon so much thereof as shall be equal to the amount which for the time being shall be paid up upon the ordinary shares of the company, and shall be entitled also to interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum upon such amount of the nominal value of the said shares called 'vendors' shares' as shall be equal to the amount for the time being not called up upon the said ordinary shares."

Clause 12 provided that the 1,500 shares should be divided between the vendors individually as they should direct, and that the "dividends" on such shares and the "interest" for the time being payable in respect thereof under clause 11 should not be payable for the first five years, "unless and until the holders of the other or ordinary shares in the company shall have received a dividend equal to £10 per cent. in each year of the said term of five years on their paid-up capital for the time being."

Article 4 of the articles of association ratified the agreement, and article 20 empowered the directors to receive from any member all or any part of the sums unpaid upon any share or shares held by him beyond the sums actually called for, and upon the money so received in advance to allow interest at such rate and times as they and the member paying in advance should agree upon.

Of the 4,500 £10 shares constituting the capital of the company, the 1,500 vendors' shares were duly allotted fully paid up pursuant to the agreement, and the remaining 3,000 shares were issued to the public, but only £7 per share was called up thereon.

In 1887 resolutions were passed for the voluntary winding up of the company, and a liquidator was appointed. The liquidator realized all the assets of the company, and, after making due provision for the debts and liabilities and the expenses of the winding up, there remained a considerable surplus for distribution among the shareholders. Out of this surplus the liquidators returned to the holders of vendors' shares the sum of £3 per share, thus reducing the amount paid upon those shares to £7 per share, the amount paid upon the ordinary shares.

Under the provisions of clause 11 of the agreement interest at five per cent. per annum up to the 13th of April, 1887, the date of the commencement of winding up, had been paid to the holders of vendors' shares in respect of the £3 paid up upon their shares beyond the amount called up upon the ordinary shares. The question then arose as to whether the owners of vendors' shares were entitled to a further payment of such interest from the commencement of the winding up to the date of the refunding to them of the £3 per share. The question was raised upon a motion by the liquidator asking "that it might be determined whether, in the distribution of the surplus assets of the company, the holders of the 1,500 vendors' shares, upon which the full sum of £10 was credited as paid, were entitled (after receiving £3 per share upon each of their shares with interest thereon to the 13th of April, 1887), before any repayment was made in respect of the other shares of the company, upon which £7 only was credited as paid, to be paid interest on the said sum of £3 at five per cent. per annum from the 13th of April, 1887, to the payment of the said sum of £3 per share, or during what and what period."

Theobald, in support of the claim, referred to Dale v. Martin, 11 L. R. Ir. 371, 32 W. R. Dig. 36, where it was held that, under a clause in the articles of a company providing that sums paid on shares in advance of calls were to carry interest, such interest was recoverable as a debt against the assets of the company.

contended that the claim involved the preference of one set of shareholders over the others.

Kay, J.—For the purpose of the present application I must treat the 11th clause of the agreement as being a binding clause, and the question is, what is the meaning of it? It is a provision that certain persons who have paid up the full £10 a share, the ordinary shares not having been paid up in full, shall receive, in respect of the amount which they have paid beyond the ordinary shareholders, interest, the interest being given in these terms—[His lordship read the 11th clause and proceeded:—] Primâ facie that means that the amount paid up on the vendors' shares beyond the amount paid on the ordinary shares shall be treated as an advance to the company, carrying interest at five per cent. What has happened is that the company has been wound up, and all the ordinary creditors have been paid. I quite agree that no shareholder could come and say "I will prove for interest in competition with and as against ordinary outside creditors." The law of partnership, which has been adopted in the winding up of companies, is against that; but then, the creditors having been paid, the duty of the court is to adjust the rights of the various contributories among themselves. Now it appears that the creditors have been paid, and that there is a surplus of assets, which surplus it is proposed to apply, first, in paying back to the advanced shareholders, as I will call them, the amount advanced beyond the sum paid on the ordinary shares. The question is whether the payment back of the £3 per share will put the advanced shareholders on an equality with the ordinary shareholders. Having regard to the contract, if the advanced shareholders receive back nothing but their capital, that will by no means put them on an equality with the ordinary shareholders. If the meaning of the agreement was to put all the shareholders on an equality, it is the duty of the court, in dealing with the surplus assets, to carry out that agreement, and as far as possible to preserve and effectuate that equality. I do not see how that can be done except by paying back to the advanced shareholders the £3 capital, and then allowing the shareholders, out of any money that remains, interest at five per cent. on the capital so paid back, from the date of the commencement of the winding up up to the date of the payment back. When that has been done all the shareholders will be on exactly the same basis. Whatever assets remain will then be distributed pari passu among all the shareholders.

Order accordingly.

Statute of Limitations—Receipt of rents by father as bailiff for infant son—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 12.

A father and his wife were entitled as tenants in common in fee to gavelkind land. The wife died in May, 1870, leaving two sons, Samuel and John. At the time of his mother's death John was an infant. He attained twenty-one in 1877, and died in May, 1884. On the mother's death her moiety descended to her two sons as her co-heirs, according to the custom of gavelkind, subject to the right of the father to a moiety of the rents so long as he remained a widower. On the death of the mother the father entered into receipt of the whole of the rents of her moiety without accounting to his sons or making any acknowledgment in writing of their title for more than twelve years. In February, 1884, the father married again. He died in November, 1884.

Held, that, as to the one-eighth of the property to which John became entitled in possession on the death of his mother, the father must be presumed to have entered into receipt of the rents as bailiff for his infant son, and that, consequently, the title of John was not barred by section 12 of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27.

But held, that, as to Samuel's own one-eighth, the same presumption did not arise, and that, as there was no evidence that the father had received the rents as agent for Samuel, or had, before the expiration of twelve years, acknowledged his title in writing or accounted to him for the rents, Samuel's title to that one-eighth was barred by the statute.

Adjourned summons.

This was an action for the administration of the estate and the execution of the trusts of the will of Samuel Hobbs, who died on the 19th of November, 1884. In answer to the inquiries directed by the judgment at the trial of the action the chief clerk found that the testator's real estate at the time of his death consisted of (inter alia) (1) an undivided moiety of about twenty-eight acres of freehold land of gavelkind tenure, called The Salts situate, at Whitstable, in Kent; (5) one-fourth part of the land comprised in item (1), which is claimed by his son, Samuel Hobbs, the younger.

The testator and his wife, Sarah Hobbs, were entitled to the land called The Salts in equal undivided moieties, as tenants in common in fee.

Sarah Hobbs died intestate on the 9th of May, 1870, leaving two sons surviving her—viz., Samuel Hobbs, the younger, and John Hobbs. At the time of her death Samuel was more than twenty-one years of age, but John was an infant. By the custom of gavelkind the moiety to which the mother was entitled descended to her two sons as tenants in common in fee, in equal undivided moieties, subject to the right of her husband to receive a moiety of the rents of her moiety so long as he should remain a widower.

On the death of his wife the testator entered into the receipt of the whole of the rents of her moiety, and remained in possession until the 24th of June, 1884, without accounting to either of his two sons.

On the 29th of February, 1884, the testator married again, whereupon his right to receive a moiety of the rents of his first wife's moiety ceased.

In 1877 the son John attained twenty-one, and in May, 1884, he died intestate, and his interest in the property descended to his brother Samuel, as the heir, according to the custom of gavelkind, of the mother.

The question (which was raised by a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate with regard to item 5) was whether the title of Samuel, the son, to the moiety of his mother's moiety, the rents of which the testator was not entitled to receive until his second marriage, or any part thereof, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, by reason of his father's receipt of the rents for more than twelve years after the death of the mother. The testator had never during that period given any acknowledgment in writing of the title of either of his sons, or accounted to either of them for his share of the rents. There was evidence that in 1879 the testator had made, to a solicitor who had been instructed by the son John to claim from his father the share of the rents to which John was entitled since the death of his mother, verbal admissions of the right of the two sons respectively to one-half of their mother's moiety of the land. There was also evidence that in 1884, before his father's death, Samuel, the son, had given notice to the tenant of the property not to pay the rent to anyone but himself, and that, in consequence of this claim, the testator's solicitor, by his directions, had accounted to his son Samuel for the rent due in June, 1884, and had paid him a sum of £1 3s. 9d. as being his one-fourth of the residue of the rent after payment of the interest on a mortgage affecting the whole property. The solicitor at the same time retained a similar sum of £1 3s. 9d., as representing the one-fourth of the rent belonging to John, in part satisfaction of a charge which he had created in favour of the solicitor.

Mulligan, for the summons.—With regard to the one-eighth to which John became entitled in possession on the death of his mother, the father must be taken to have entered into the receipt of the rents as his son's bailiff, and his character of bailiff did not cease when the son attained twenty-one: Thomas v. Thomas, 4 W. R. 135, 2 K. & J. 79, 83; Wall v. Stanwick, 35 W. R. 701, 34 Ch. D. 763. The statute did not, therefore, as regards John's one-eighth, commence to run until he attained twenty-one in 1877.

As to Samuel's own one-eighth the evidence shows that the testator was really in receipt of rents as his agent. The onus is on the other side to show that Samuel made a gift of his share of the rents to his father: Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278.

C. T. Mitchell, for the defendants.—Both in Thomas v. Thomas and Wall v. Stanwick the father, who had entered into possession, could not have taken possession in any other character than that of bailiff to the infant. He had no right of his own. These cases are, therefore, distinguishable from the present. At any rate, they do not apply to Samuel's one-eighth, and there is nothing to shew that the testator received Samuel's share of the rents as his bailiff or agent. An acknowledgment by an agent is not enough: Ley v Peter, 6 W. R. 437, 3 H. & N. 101. Payment of rent after the statutory period has expired does not prevent the statute applying: Saunders v. Saunders, 29 W. R. 413, 30 Ibid. Dig. 117, 19 Ch. D. 373.

Mulligan replied.

North, J. (after stating the facts), continued.—There is no question as to the testator's own moiety of the property. The other moiety, which belonged to his wife, descended, on her death in May, 1870, to her two sons, Samuel and John, in equal shares, subject to their father's tenancy by the curtesy of one-half of the moiety (i.e., one-fourth of the whole) so long as he should remain a widower. On his marriage again, in February, 1884, his interest by the curtesy came to an end, and that one-fourth of the property vested in possession in the two sons, and on the death of John intestate his moiety of that one-fourth descended to his brother Samuel. As to that one-fourth the title of Samuel is clear. The question which now arises is as to the other one-fourth, which descended to the two sons immediately on the death of their mother. As regards the one-eighth, which then descended to John, he was an infant at the time, and his father, having on the death of his wife entered into the receipt of the rents of the whole of the moiety, must be taken to have entered into the receipt of the one-eighth to which John was immediately entitled as bailiff for his infant son. The father continued in receipt of the rents after John had attained twenty-one, and the cases which have been cited show that, as he was in possession as John's bailiff at the time when John attained twenty-one, he must be taken to have continued in possession in the same character, unless something was done to change the character of his possession, and no such change has been proved. The brother Samuel is therefore now entitled to that one-eighth and his title to three-eighths of the whole property is clear. The only question is as to the remaining one-eighth. To that one-eighth Samuel became entitled in possession on the death of his mother, and he was the age. When his father began to receive the rents one-eighth, there was nothing in the relation of t ties to show the existence of any agency or tru or that the father was receiving the rents as th of his son. The father remained in possession t 1884, and at that time some claim was set Samuel. But it is clear that no acknowledg writing of Samuel's title had been made by the and, therefore, the father had already acquired title against Samuel by the statute, so far as a ledgment was concerned. Then it appears that ment in respect of the rent due in June, 1 made by the father to Samuel. But at that statutory period of twelve years had run, and ment of rent to Samuel could defeat the title w father had already acquired under the statute. v. Saunders is a clear authority for that. T ment of rent, therefore, cannot support the claim. It has been argued that there is evidence shows that the father was in receipt of the agent or trustee for his son Samuel, and that t vents the statute being set up a defence to his c cannot find evidence of anything of that kind du time in which the statute was running. There payment of rent to Samuel during that period said that some admissions were made by the his son's title, but there was no acknowledg writing. The result is that, as regards this one of the property, the father, having entered in re the rents in 1870, acquired a good title to it at of the statutory period of twelve years. The must be varied as to the item (5) by substitut eighth part (for one-fourth part) of the lands in item (1).

Ashworth v. Lord. (a.)

Mortgage—Redemption—Mortgagee in possession payment—Account with annual rests—Costs.

In an action by persons claiming to repre original mortgagor for redemption of the mor property (the mortgagees having been in possess many years), the judgment at the trial directed the of the ordinary accounts in a redemption action mortgagees in possession, including an account of was due to the defendants for principal and inter their taxed costs of the action; and that, on pay the plaintiffs within six months after the certi the balance (if any) which should be found due defendants, the defendants should reconvey the m property to the plaintiffs, and that, in default of ment, the action should be dismissed, with costs.

But, in case it should appear, on taking the acc that the defendants had been overpaid, the further sideration of the action was to be adjourned. The clerk found by his certificate that the mortgage debt been paid off in 1866 by means of rents which the fendants had received, and that there was a sum of due from them in respect of rents which they had received.

The defendants had, by their statement of defence denied the title of the plaintiffs to redeem, and pleaded the Statute of Limitations. They had insisted that a large balance was due to them.

At the trial of the action the plaintiffs' title to red

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-La

was not disputed, and the defence of the statute was overruled.

Held, that the account must be taken against the defendants with annual rests from the date at which the mortgage debt was fully paid.

Held, also, that the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

Further consideration.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 29th of June, 1819, John Ashworth surrendered to John Holt certain copyhold premises by way of mortgage to secure the payment of £600 and interest, and on the 18th of April, 1820, John Holt was admitted pursuant to the surrender. On the 1st of January, 1823, John Ashworth charged the property with the payment to John Holt of the further sum of £200. John Ashworth died in November, 1825. In 1827 John Holt died intestate, and on the 10th of March, 1827, administration to his estate was granted to his son, Richard Holt, who was his heir-at-law, and his heir according to the custom of the manor of which the mortgaged premises were held, and also his sole next of kin. Richard Holt died in 1840, having devised his trust and mortgage estates to trustees, whom he also appointed his executors, and to whom letters of administration de bonis non of John Holt were afterwards granted.

On the 27th of July, 1841, the trustees and executors of Richard Holt transferred the mortgage to James Pickup. In the year 1850 portions of the mortgaged property were sold, and the proceeds of sale were applied in redemption of the mortgage debts. On the 10th of April, 1856, Pickup died, having by his will appointed J. P. Lord, R. B. Dodgson, and Thos. Hart trustees and executors thereof, to whom he also devised all estates vested in him as trustee or mortgagee.

In May, 1857, the trustees of Pickup's will entered into the receipt of the rents and profits of the mortgaged property. Thomas Hart died in August, 1861, and Lord and Dodgson remained in receipt of the rents until the writ in this action was issued on the 23rd of December, 1876. By their statement of claim, delivered on the 16th of March, 1877, the plaintiffs alleged that the title of the mortgagor had been acknowledged in writing by the trustees of the will of Pickup in December, 1857, and that the defendants had received from the rents of the property more than was due to them under their mortgage. The plaintiffs claimed an account of what was due to the defendants upon the mortgage; an account of the rents and profits received by the defendants as mortgagees in possession, and that the plaintiffs might redeem the property on payment of what might appear to be due to the defendants; that, in case the annual rents received by the defendants should have exceeded the interest due upon the mortgages, annual rests might be made, and that what should be owing on account of rents and profits might be applied, first, in payment of the interest of the mortgage securities, and then in sinking the principal; and that, in case it should appear that the defendants had been overpaid their principal, interest, and costs, the defendants might be ordered to pay the balance to the plaintiffs with interest.

On the 6th of June (Lord having in the meanwhile died) Dodgson delivered a defence, by which (inter alia) he relied on the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27). He alleged that Pickup was entitled to a lien or charge on the mortgaged premises in respect of two bond debts of £100 and £200, and he denied that any balance was due to the plaintiffs, and claimed that a large balance was due to himself. At the trial, on the 5th of July, 1878, the plaintiffs' title to redeem was not disputed, and the court overruled the defence of the statute. By the judgment it was ordered that the ordinary accounts in a redemption action against mortgagees in possession should be taken, including an account of what was due to the defendant for principal and interest in respect of his mortgage securities, and for his costs of the action, to be taxed in case the parties should differ. An inquiry was also directed whether anything, and what, was due to the defendant Dodgson, and from whom, in respect of the two bond debts. And it was ordered that, on the plaintiffs paying to the defendant Dodgson the balance (if any) found due to him, within six months after the date of the certificate, the defendant should resurrender the mortgaged premises to the plaintiffs, and that in default of payment the action should be dismissed, with costs. But in case it should appear, on taking the accounts, that the defendant had been overpaid, the further consideration of the action was to be adjourned. On the 13th of June, 1882, the defendant Dodgson died, and on the 11th of November, 1882, an order of revivor was made against Jane Dodgson, his widow and sole executrix. She died on the 20th of January, 1884, and on the 19th of December, 1884, an order of revivor was made against her executors, Ainsworth and Whalley. The chief clerk made his certificate on the 28th of February, 1887, by which he found that there was not any sum due for principal and interest to the late defendant Dodgson, or to the defendants, Ainsworth and Whalley, as the legal personal representatives of the late defendant Jane Dodgson, in respect of the mortgage securities. The chief clerk also certified that all sums secured by the mortgages were repaid to Dodgson and Lord in November, 1866, and that on the 30th of November, 1866, there was a balance of £11 12s. 7d. due from them; that at the date of the issue of the writ there was due from them the sum of £325 8s. 3d., and that at the date of the certificate there was due from the defendants, Ainsworth and Whalley, the sum of £618 2s. 8d.; that Dodgson, Hart, and Lord entered into receipt of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises in the month of May, 1857, and that of the sum of £618 2s. 8d. £462 8s. 2d. was due from the defendants, Ainsworth and Whalley, as the representatives of the late defendant, R. B. Dodgson, £44 9s. 4d. as the representatives of the late defendant, Jane Dodgson, and the residue, £111 5s. 2d., from themselves.

The action now came on for further consideration.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to repayment of all over-payments, with interest calculated with annual rests from the date on which the mortgage debt was paid off: Wilson v. Metcalfe, 1 Russ. 530. We only ask for interest at the rate of £4 per cent. Inasmuch as the defendants have raised a hostile defence, they ought to pay the costs of the action: Barlow v. Gains, 23 Beav. 244; National Bank of Australasia v. United Hand in Hand and Band of Hope Co., 27 W. R. 889, 4 App. Cas. 391.

Everitt, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendants.—There was a bonâ fide question raised, and the defendants ought not to be visited with costs. In any case they ought not to be made personally liable: Boynton v. Boynton, 27 W. R. 825, 4 App. Cas. 733; Williams on Executors, 6th ed., vol. 2, p. 1828. The court is precluded by the form of the judgment—directing an account of what was due to the defendant Dodgson for his taxed costs of the action—from ordering the present defendants to pay the costs of the action: Wilson v Metcalfe. As to the claim for annual rests the plaintiffs are bound by the form of the certificate, which finds that a specified balance was due on a certain day, and the court will not go behind that finding.

Cozens-Hardy replied.

North, J. (after stating the facts, continued).—The first question that arises is as to annual rests. The plaintiffs ask for annual rests on the balances found due from the times at which those balances respectively became due. The form of the judgment shows that interest was in arrear at the time when the mortgagees (the predecessors of the present defendants) entered into possession. Therefore, annual rests have not been made in the accounts directed by the judgment. But, in my opinion, that has no bearing on the question whether annual rests ought to be made against the defendants from the subsequent date at which it has been shown that the mortgage debt was fully paid. The principle on which annual rests are not ordered as against mortgagees in possession, whose interest was in arrear at the time when they entered into possession, is that it cannot be considered that, in so doing, they elected to receive their capital by driblets. They are entitled, in the absence of any bargain to the contrary, to have their whole capital paid off at once, and the taking of possession is not evidence of such a bargain. But, after they have been paid in full, they are, as was pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in Wilson v. Metcalfe, persons who are, in receiving the rents after their debt has been fully paid, availing themselves of another man's money for their own use and benefit, and they ought to be charged with interest. In that case annual rests were directed to be made from the time at which the mortgage debt was fully paid, and that is what I have always understood to be the practice in the few cases in which the point has arisen. It seems to me that annual rests are in the present case a matter of course.

It is suggested that they ought not to be allowed since the date of judgment. I cannot see any reason for that distinction. The same state of things continued, and the same principle applies. The mortgagees remained in possession of another man's property, claiming either that it was their own or that they were retaining it in respect of their debt. That claim has failed, and I can draw no line in respect of annual rests at the date of the judgment.

With regard to the costs of the action, it was suggested that I cannot now order the mortgagees to pay costs by reason of the decision in Wilson v. Metcalfe, which is said to have been followed in numerous cases. The present case does not appear to me to correspond with that. The point whether the costs should be paid by the mortgagee seems to me to have been reserved by the judgment to be dealt with after it should have been ascertained whether his claim was well founded or not. It has turned out to be an unfounded claim, and it seems to me that, under such circumstances, the usual and proper order is, that a mortgagee who has remained in possession, claiming the mortgaged property as his own after he has been fully paid, must pay the costs of a redemption action.

The defendants' counsel endeavoured to draw a distinction between the costs before and the costs after the judgment, and at first I thought there was something in that distinction, because the costs before the judgment were incurred at the time when there was a hostile claim by the defendants setting up the Statute of Limitations. Since the judgment the Statute of Limitations has been out of the case, but the defendants have still insisted before the chief clerk that a large amount was due to them. That amount was disallowed; and again, after their accounts had been taken, a surcharge was carried in against them which has to some extent succeeded.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that no ground has been shown for relieving the defendants from the payment of any part of the costs of the action. I was disposed at one time to think that, as so long a period as ten years had been allowed to elapse between the date of the judgment and the completion of the accounts, and during that interval several changes of interest had taken place, this might have affected the co[illegible] some extent in favour of the defendants. But on lo[illegible] at the dates I find that there has been considerable [illegible] which is not chiefly, if at all, attributable to the [illegible]tiffs, and I cannot, on this ground, relieve the d[illegible]ants from any part of the costs. The order for pa[illegible] of costs by the defendants will not prejudice any [illegible] which they may have in the administration of the e[illegible] of their own testator and testatrix to have those [illegible] allowed to them, but, as between the plaintiffs a[illegible] defendants, the order must be for payment of th[illegible] by the defendants.

Minute of order.—Order that annual rests be [illegible] in the accounts of the rents and profits of the [illegible]gaged property certified to have been received [illegible] late defendants Dodgson and Lord, and the late d[illegible]ant Jane Dodgson, and the defendants Ainsw[illegible] Whalley, from the 30th of November, 1866, to th[illegible] when from the certificate it appears that Dodgson [illegible] and Pickup were overpaid their principal, inter[illegible] costs, up to the date of payment, and that [illegible] be computed on the respective balances in each [illegible] the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, and in tak[illegible] annual rests (except the first) the interest of [illegible]ceding balance is to be included in such bala[illegible] to charge the defendants with compound [illegible] thereon. And it appearing (from an affidav[illegible] the 29th of July, 1887) that the total amount d[illegible] account, when such annual rests have been ma[illegible] in, amounts to £964 7s. 4d., and that the [illegible] thereof to be paid by the defendants Ainsw[illegible] Whalley, as executors of Dodgson, for the pe[illegible] the 30th of November, 1868, to the 13th of Ju[illegible] amounts to £777 17s. 1d.; that the portion to [illegible] by those defendants, as executors of Jane Do[illegible] the period from the 13th of June, 1882, to th[illegible] January, 1884, amounts to £51 8s. 1d., and th[illegible]tion to be paid by those defendants personal[illegible] period from the 20th of January, 1884, up to [illegible] of payment amounts to £135 2s. 2d. Order [illegible] defendants, as executors of Dodgson (they ad[illegible] assets), to pay the £777 17s. 1d. to the plaintiff[illegible] as executors of Jane Dodgson (they admitting a[illegible] pay the £51 8s. 1d. to the plaintiffs; and to pa[illegible] plaintiffs the £135 2s. 2d. due from the defenda[illegible]sonally, the several payments to be made on or [illegible] the 1st of August, 1887, or subsequently with[illegible] days after service of the order on the defendants.

Blackburn, Low, & Co. v. Vigors. (a.)

Marine insurance—Principal and agent—Concealment of material facts by agent through whom policy not effected.

Underwriters instructed their agents to re-insure an overdue ship. During negotiations the agents received material information, which they did not make known to the underwriters, who re-insured the ship through these agents for £800. The underwriters afterwards re-insured the ship further for £700 through different agents. Neither the underwriters nor the last-named agents had the information which the first-named agents had. The ship was lost.

Held, that the knowledge of the first-named agents was not the knowledge of the underwriters so as to affect the second re-insurance, and that the underwriters were entitled to recover upon it.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 17 Q. B. D. 553, 34 W. R. Dig. 116) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting) reversing a decision of Day, J., who tried the case without a jury.

The following statement of the facts will be found sufficient for the purpose of this report.

The plaintiffs were underwriters and insurance brokers at Glasgow, and were underwriters of a policy on the steamship Florida. The policy had been effected by the owners of the ship through Rose, Murison, & Thompson, of Glasgow, who were the brokers for effecting insurances upon her. The ship left New York on the 11th of April, 1884, and was due at Glasgow on or about the 25th. The ship not having arrived, the plaintiffs, desiring to protect themselves from loss, endeavoured on the 30th of April to effect a re-insurance. They first attempted to do this through Roxburgh, Currie, & Co., but, the terms being too high, no insurance through them was then effected. The next day Mr. Low, one of the plaintiffs, saw Mr. Thompson, a member of the firm of Rose, Murison, & Thompson, and asked him about the ship, and requested him to telegraph to the London agents of his firm—viz., to Rose, Thompson, Young, & Co.—to effect an insurance for £1,500 at fifteen guineas; and a telegram to this effect was accordingly sent between 11 and 12 o'clock. At 12.30 on the same day a Mr. Murray gave Murison important information brought to Glasgow by another ship, calculated to excite suspicion of the loss of The Florida some days previously. The Florida had, in fact, been lost some ten days previously. The information thus obtained by Murison was never disclosed by him to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs knew nothing about the matter and concealed nothing themselves. Shortly after the above interview Rose, Thompson, Young, & Co., of London, telegraphed to Rose, Murison, & Thompson, of Glasgow: "Twenty guineas paying freely and market very stiff—likely to advance before day is out." This telegram was shown to the plaintiffs, who ultimately effected an insurance through Rose, Thompson, Young, & Co. for £800 at twenty-five guineas. This, however, is not the policy in question in this action. But on the next day, the 2nd of May, the plaintiffs, through Roxburgh, Currie, & Co., effected a further re-insurance with the defendant for £700 at thirty guineas, and this is the policy on which this action is brought.

At the trial of the action the substantial defence set up was, that the defendant was induced to subscribe the policy by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiffs and their agents of material facts known to the plaintiffs or their agents and unknown to the defendant.

Day, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Court of Appeal reversed this decision and gave judgment for the defendant.

The appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

April 28, 29.—Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Hollams, for the appellants.—The material information did not come to the ears of the plaintiffs, or of any agent of theirs employed either in connection with this contract or in such a way as to impose a duty to transmit such information to his principals. No authority goes to the length necessary to support the judgment of the Court of Appeal in this case.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and J. G. Barnes, for the respondent.—The agent had the information when the relationship of principal and agent still existed between himself and the appellants. The two policies effected, the first of which is clearly void, are on the same footing. The broker was authorized to effect insurance on the whole amount; until this was done he was bound to tell his principal all he knew, and the principal is in law presumed to have that knowledge.

They cited 2 Duer on Marine Insurance, s. 13, part 1, pp. 381, 415; 1 Phillips on Insurance, ss. 543, 549, 562, 564; 1 Arnould, 4th ed., pp. 481, 490. Wyllie v. Pollen, 11 W. R. 1081, was referred to.

Hollams replied.

Aug. 9.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In this case the plaintiffs sue upon a policy of marine insurance, and the only question arises upon the statement of defence that the defendant was induced to enter into the contract by concealment of material facts by the plaintiffs and their agents.

The facts are not in dispute. Neither the plaintiffs nor the agent through whom the policy was effected had any knowledge of the material fact, the concealment or non-disclosure of which is relied on as vitiating the policy, but an agent who did not effect the policy at an earlier period received information admitted to be material while he was acting as agent to effect an insurance for the plaintiffs which he did not communicate.

Day, J., before whom the case was decided without a jury, held that this did not affect the validity of the policy. A majority of the Court of Appeal reversed Day, J.'s judgment, and held that the non-disclosure was fatal to the plaintiffs' claim.

So far as I can understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, it is intended to lay down a principle that would not, I think, be contested; but it applies that principle to a state of facts to which I think it is inapplicable. Lindley, L.J., says (I think correctly): "It is a condition of the contract that there is no misrepresentation or concealment either by the assured or by anyone who ought, as a matter of business and fair dealing, to have stated or disclosed the facts to him or to the underwriter for him." And Lopes, L.J., after stating the principle upon which the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal, explains it to mean that the principal is to be as responsible for any knowledge of a material fact acquired by his agent employed to obtain the insurance as if he had acquired it himself. To the propositions thus stated I think no objection could be made, but it is obvious that the words in the one judgment, "agent employed to obtain the insurance," or in the other judgment the words, "the underwriter," import that the particular contract obtained was, in the language of the statement of defence, a policy which the defendant was induced to subscribe by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiffs and their agents of certain facts then known to the plaintiffs or their agents, and unknown to the defendant, which were material to the risk.

I doubt very much whether the solution of the controversy as to what is the true principle upon which the contract of insurance is avoided by concealment or misrepresentation, whether by considering it fraudulent or as an implied term of the contract, helps one very much in deciding the present case. If one were to adopt in terms the language of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in Gladstone v. King, I do not think it could justify the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. In that case a policy lost or not lost was effected on the 25th of October. On the previous 25th of July the ship had run upon a rock. On the 5th of August the captain wrote to his owners, the plaintiffs; they received his letter on the 25th of October. Whatever may be said of the logic of that case, which acquitted the captain of all ill intention, but decided upon the ground that otherwise owners might direct their captains to remain silent, and which, upon a policy lost or not lost, assumes any antecedent damage to have been an implied exception out of the policy, it does not proceed upon any such ground as the Court of Appeal appear to rely on here. Lord Ellenborough says:—"No mischief will ensue" (a somewhat strange mode of enunciating a proposition of law) "from holding in this case that the antecedent damage was an implied exception out of the policy. If the principle be new, it is consistent with justice and convenience." Unfortunately, his lordship does not state what is the principle which he apparently admits to be new. I can quite understand that, when a man comes for an insurance upon his ship, he may be expected to know both the then condition and the history of the ship he seeks to insure. If he takes means not to know, so as to be able to make contracts of insurance without the responsibility of knowledge, this is fraud. But even without fraud, such as I think this would be, the owner of the ship cannot escape the necessity of being acquainted with his ship and its history because he has committed to others—his captain, or his general agent for the management of his shipping business—the knowledge which the underwriter has a right to assume the owner possesses when he comes to insure his ship.

With respect to agency so limited, I am not disposed to differ with the proposition laid down by Cockburn, C.J., in Proudfoot v. Montefiore. A part of the proposition is "that the insurer is entitled to assume as the basis of the contract between him and the assured that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge." I think these last are the cardinal words, and contemplate such an agency as I have described above. I am unable, however, to see that the present case is governed by any such principle.

A broker is employed to effect a particular insurance—while so employed he receives material information—he does not effect the insurance and he does not communicate the information. How is it possible to suggest that the insurer could rely upon the communication to the principal of every piece of information acquired by any agent through whom the assured has unsuccessfully endeavoured to procure an assurance? I am unable to accept the criticism by the Master of the Rolls upon the proposition that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. When a person is the agent to know, his knowledge does bind the principal. But in this case I think the agency of the broker had ceased before the policy sued upon was effected. The principal himself and the broker through whom the policy sued on was effected were both admitted to be unacquainted with any material fact which was not disclosed. I cannot but think that the somewhat vague use of the word "agent" leads to confusion. Some agents so far represent the principal that in all respects their acts and intentions and their knowledge may truly be said to be the acts, intentions, and knowledge of the principal. Other agents may have so limited and narrow an authority, both in fact and in the common understanding of their form of employment, that it would be quite inaccurate to say that such an agent's knowledge or intentions are the knowledge or intentions of his principal; and whether his acts are the acts of his principal depends upon the specific authority he has received.

In Fitzherbert v. Mather the consignor and shipper of the goods insured was the agent whose knowledge was in question. In Gladstone v. King the master of the ship was the agent; and in Proudfoot v. Montefiore the agent was the accepted representative of the principal, in effect trading and acting for him, in Smyrna, the owner himself carrying on business in Manchester. And though the decision in Ruggles v. The General Insurance Co., before the Supreme Court of the United States, may not be very satisfactory in what they held under the circumstances of that case to be the relation between the captain of the ship and his owners, the principle upon which that case was decided was the supposed termination of the agency between them.

Where the employment of the agent is such that in respect of the particular matter in question he really does represent the principal, the formula that the knowledge of the agent is his knowledge is I think correct, but it is obvious that that formula can only be applied when the words "agent" and "principal" are limited in their application.

To lay down as an abstract proposition of law that every agent, no matter how limited the scope of his agency, would bind every principal even by his acts, is obviously and upon the face of it absurd; and yet it is by the fallacious use of the word "agent" that plausibility is given to reasoning which requires the assumption of some such proposition.

What, then, is the position of the broker in this case whose knowledge, though not communicated, is held to be that of the principal?

He certainly is not employed to acquire such knowledge, nor can any insurer suppose that he has knowledge in the ordinary course of employment like the captain of a ship, or the owner himself, as to the condition or history of the ship.

In this particular case the knowledge was acquired, not because he was the agent of the assured, but from the accident that he was general agent for another person. The reason why, if he had effected the insurance, his knowledge, unless he communicated it, would have been fatal to the policy, is because his agency was to effect an insurance, and the authority to make the contract drew with it all the necessary powers and responsibilities which are involved in such an employment; but he had no general agency—he had no other authority than the authority to make the particular contract, and his authority ended before the contract sued on was made. When it was made no relation between him and the shipowner existed which made or continued him an agent for whose knowledge his former principal was responsible. There was no material fact known to any agent which was not disclosed at the point of time at which the contract was made; there was no one possessed of knowledge whose duty it was to communicate such knowledge.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of Day, J., restored, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson.—This is a case of considerable nicety; but I have ultimately come to the conclusion, for the reasons already stated by the Lord Chancellor, that the appeal ought to be allowed.

It is, in my opinion, a condition precedent of every contract of marine insurance, that the insured shall make a full disclosure of all facts materially affecting the risk which are within his personal knowledge at the time when the contract is made. Where an insurance is effected through the medium of an agent, the ordinary rule of law applies, and non-disclosure of material facts, known to the agent only, will affect his principal, and give the insurer good ground for avoiding the contract.

In the case of insurance by a shipowner, it has been decided that he is affected by the knowledge of a class of agents other than those whom he employs to insure. In the ordinary course of business, the owner of a trading vessel employs a master and ship agents, whose special function it is to keep their employer duly informed of all casualties encountered by his ship, which would materially influence the judgment of an insurer. On that ground it has been ruled that the insurer must be held to have transacted the insurance in reliance upon the well-known usage of the shipping trade, and that he is, consequently, entitled to assume that every circumstance material to the risk insured has been communicated to him, which ought, in due course, to have been made known to the shipowner before the insurance was effected. Accordingly, if a master or ship agent, whether wilfully or unintentionally, fail in their duty to their employer, their suppression of a material fact will, notwithstanding his ignorance of the fact, vitiate his contract.

I do not think it necessary to notice in detail the authorities which bear upon this point. I desire to say, however, that I have difficulty in comprehending the principle upon which the court in Gladstone v. King and Bribley v. The Imperial Marine Insurance Co. held that the innocent non-communication of a material fact, by an agent who was the alter ego of the shipowner, merely created an exception from the policy. In both these cases the court appears to me to have undertaken the somewhat perilous task of settling the terms of the contract which the insurer would have made for himself if the fact had been communicated to him.

In the present case it is sought to extend the imputed knowledge of the insured to all facts which, during the period of his employment, became known to any agent, other than the agent effecting the policy in question, who was employed at any time, successfully or unsuccessfully, to insure the whole or part of the same risk with that covered by the policy. This is a case of re-insurance; but it is obvious that the principle, if admitted, would be equally applicable to the original contract.

I am of opinion that the responsibility of an innocent insured for the non-communication of facts which happen to be within the private knowledge of persons whom he merely employs to obtain an insurance upon a particular risk, ought not to be carried beyond the person who actually makes the contract on his behalf. There is no authority whatever for enlarging his responsibility beyond that limit, unless it is to be found in the decisions which relate to captains and ship agents; and these do not appear to me to have any analogy to the case of agents employed to effect a policy. There is a material difference in the relations of these two classes of agents to their employer. The one class is specially employed for the purpose of communicating to him the very facts which the law requires him to divulge to his insurer; the other is employed, not to procure or give information concerning the ship, but to effect an insurance. There is also, as the Master of the Rolls pointed out, an important difference in the positions of those two classes with respect to the insurer. He is entitled to contract, and does contract, on the basis that all material facts connected with the vessel insured known to the agent employed for that purpose have been by him communicated in due course to his principal. So, also, when an agent to insure is brought into contact with an insurer, the latter transacts on the footing that the agent has disclosed every material circumstance within his personal knowledge; but it cannot be reasonably suggested that the insurer relies, to any extent, upon the private information possessed by persons of whose existence he presumably knows nothing.

In the circumstances of this case I have come to the conclusion that, whilst it might be the moral duty of Mr. Murison to communicate to the appellants the information which he received on the forenoon of the 1st of May, 1884, he was under no legal obligation to do so. There may be circumstances which impose upon agents in the position of Mr. Murison an express or implied duty to communicate their own information to their principal, but nothing of that sort occurs here. I must, in fairness to Mr. Murison, say that I can find no warrant for the inference of fact drawn by Lindley, L.J., that he purposely omitted to impart his knowledge to the appellants in order that they might re-insure on more favourable terms. No such imputation was made at the trial, and, if it had been made, it ought to have been submitted to the jury, and their verdict taken upon it.

I concur, therefore, in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Fitzgerald.—In this very interesting case I concur in the order which will presently be proposed by the Lord Chancellor. I adopt entirely the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chancellor and by Lord Watson. The judgment delivered by Lord Esher, M.R., was one of more than usual ability—it was a considered judgment, prepared with care and upon a critical examination of the authorities; and I am prepared to adopt that judgment and substantially the reasons given by the noble and learned lord for the conclusion at which he arrived, though not every portion of those reasons.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree.

It has frequently been said by great judges that the doctrine of constructive notice ought not to be extended. It seems to me that the decision under appeal involves a great and a dangerous extension of that doctrine.

There is nothing unreasonable in imputing to a shipowner who effects an insurance on his vessel all the information with regard to his own property which the agent to whom the management of that property is committed possessed at the time, and might in the ordinary course of things have communicated to his employer. In such a case it may be said without impropriety that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. But the case is different when the agent whose knowledge it is sought to impute to the principal is not the agent to whom the principal looks for information, but an agent employed for the special purpose of effecting the insurance. It is quite true that the insurance would be vitiated by concealment on the part of such an agent just as it would be by concealment on the part of the principal. But that is not because the knowledge of the agent is to be imputed to the principal, but because the agent of the assured is bound as the principal is bound to communicate to the underwriters all material facts within his knowledge. Concealment of those facts is a breach of duty on his part to those with whom his principal has placed him in communication: Lynch v. Dunsford, 14 East. 494.

It was said that in the present case Murison was under a legal obligation to communicate to the appellants the knowledge which he acquired while employed as their agent. But the learned counsel for the respondent produced no authority for that proposition, nor did they, I think, satisfy your lordships that such a legal obligation flowed from Murison's employment. The majority of the Court of Appeal say that, whether there was a legal obligation on the part of Murison or not, there was a moral obligation on his part to communicate this information to his employers. But I apprehend that it is not the function of a court of justice to enforce or give effect to moral obligations which do not carry with them legal or equitable rights. Whatever may be thought of Murison's conduct from a moral point of view, it would, in my opinion, be a dangerous extension of the doctrine of constructive notice to hold that persons who are themselves absolutely innocent of any concealment or misrepresentation, and who have not wilfully shut their eyes or closed their ears to any means of information, are to be affected with the knowledge of matters which other persons may be morally, though not legally, bound to communicate to them.

Order appealed from reversed; judgment of Day, J., restored; respondent to pay to the appellants the costs both here and below. Case remitted to the Queen's Bench Division.

From Chan. Div. March 21.

BARTON v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Third party procedure—Third party notice—Appearance of third party to notice—Nature of relief claimed by action—Circumstances under which third party not entitled to be added as defendant.

In an action against a railway company, the relief claimed by the plaintiffs was that sums of stock of a specified amount might be transferred into the names of the plaintiffs in the company's register, the plaintiffs alleging that stock to that amount had been improperly transferred out of their names by the defendant company in consequence of a forged authority to transfer. The railway company were alone made defendants.

The defendant company obtained leave to issue a third party notice claiming indemnity against persons who were transferees of part of the stock, and that order was not appealed from. On a summons for directions by the defendant company—the third parties refusing to admit any liability to contribution or indemnity—Kay, J., made an order that the third parties should be at liberty to attend at the trial of the action and take such part therein as the judge might direct, and that they should be bound by the trial, but refused to allow them to deliver a defence.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, on appeal by the third parties, that the order was right, on the grounds (1) that, though the defendant company were willing to have the third parties added as defendants, yet, having regard to the nature of the relief claimed by the action, the plaintiffs were entitled to object to the third parties being added as defendants; and (2) that, having regard to the fact that the defendant company had, by their defence, raised every point that could be suggested by the third parties, no injustice had been done to the third parties by the refusal to allow them to deliver a defence.

Coles v. Civil Service Supply Association, 32 W. R. 407, 26 Ch. D. 529, followed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The action was brought in December, 1886, by Ann Barton and Elizabeth Ashe, the present trustees of the will of Samuel Barton, who died in 1870, the plaintiff Ann Barton being also an executrix. The railway company was the sole defendant to the action.

The plaintiffs claimed that the defendant company might be ordered "to appropriate or purchase and to transfer to and register in the names of" the plaintiffs "a sum of £11,641 consolidated stock, and a sum of £1,250 4 per cent. stock."

The plaintiffs alleged that sums of stock to that amount belonging to the estate of the testator stood in the books of the defendant company in the names of Ann Barton, the plaintiff, and Thomas Barton, the other executor and trustee under the will of the testator, and that between the years 1874 and 1885 the same was wrongfully transferred by the defendant company out of the joint names of Ann Barton and Thomas Barton by reason of the defendant company having acted on a deed or deeds authorizing the transfers, and purporting to have been executed by both Ann Barton and Thomas Barton, though, in fact, it was alleged that the signature of the plaintiff Ann Barton to the said deeds were forgeries and that the plaintiff Ann Barton had never authorized or assented to the said transfers.

In 1886, after the transfers referred to, Thomas Barton became insolvent and retired from the trusts of the will, and the plaintiff Elizabeth Ashe was, under the powers in that behalf contained in the will, appointed a trustee of the will in the place of Thomas Barton.

The defendant company, by their defence, denied the allegation that the said deeds were not assented to and not executed by the plaintiff Ann Barton, and that any signature thereto was forged, and they also, in their defence, raised the point that an authority to transfer given by one of two executors was sufficient.

On the 29th of July, 1887, the defendant company applied for and obtained leave, under ord. 16, r. 48, to issue a third party notice on D. Leahy Arthur and Sir J. Percival Radcliffe, the present holders and transferees of part of the stock referred to, and this notice was served on these transferees on the 18th of August, 1887. The transferees did not move to have this order discharged or varied.

The defendant company subsequently took out, under ord. 16, r. 52, a summons for directions, and at the hearing of this summons the third parties applied to be made defendants in the action, but, in reply to a question of Kay, J., refused to admit any liability to indemnify the defendant company. Kay, J., on the 10th of February, 1888, made an order on the summons for directions that the third parties should be at liberty to attend at the trial of the action and take such part in the proceedings as the judge should direct, and that they should be bound by the result of the trial of the action, with liberty to any party to the action to apply; but refused leave to the third parties to deliver a defence in the action.

From this order the transferees, the third parties, appealed.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—The appellants ask to be made defendants in the action, and to be at liberty to deliver a defence, and as the question whether the transfers were forgeries or not is one in which all parties are interested, the plaintiffs cannot be embarrassed or prejudiced thereby: Carshore v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 33 W. R. 420, 29 Ch. D. 344. Kay, J., in making this order followed the form of order which he himself introduced in Coles v. Civil Service Supply Association, 32 W. R. 407, 26 Ch. D. 529; but it has been subsequently held by the Court of Appeal in Eden v. Weardale Iron and Coal Co., 35 W. R. 507, 35 Ch. D. 287, that persons brought in as third parties are in the position of defendants, and may administer interrogatories. Section 24, sub-section (3), of the Judicature Act, 1873, shows what are the liabilities and rights of a person brought in under the third-party rule, and see the Annual Practice, 1887-8, p. 11. [COTTON, L.J.—You did not move to discharge or vary the order making you a third party.] The court has power to add the third parties as defendants without any application: ord. 16, r. 11. Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 9 W. R. 94, 1 J. & H. 243, shows that in an action of this kind the transferees of the stock ought to be made defendants.

Taylor v. Midland Railway Co., 8 W. R. 401, 10 W. R. 382, 28 Beav. 287, 8 H. L. Cas. 751, was also referred to.

O. L. Clare, for the defendant company, did not object to the appellants being made defendants in the action, nor to any particular form of order being made, so long as the appellants were kept in the action so as to be bound by the result of the trial.

Alfred Whitaker (Renshaw, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs by their action do not claim the specific stock now standing in the names of the appellants, the transferees, nor do they claim any specific stock. The plaintiffs have claimed nothing as against the transferees, and there is no privity between them and the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' claim is against the railway company alone as custodians of the register, for not keeping an accurate register. Taylor v. Midland Railway Co. is a case of an exactly similar claim. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Sloman v. Bank of England, 14 Sim. 475.] Any application made now to have the transferees added as defendants comes too late. The order made by Kay, J., follows Coles v. Civil Service Supply Association.

Vaughan Hawkins, in reply.—The appellants have been brought in as third parties, and the order now appealed from binds them generally by the result of the trial and not merely for contribution or indemnity. [COTTON, L.J.—Is there any case in which an order has been made giving a third party the right and liberty you now claim?] Benecke v. Frost, 24 W. R. 669, 1 Q. B. D. 419, is such a case. [COTTON, L.J.—That was a case, not under the present rules, but under the rules of 1875.] [LINDLEY, L.J.—The only case I can find where an order of this kind was made is the case of Eden v. Weardale Iron and Coal Co., where an anomalous order of this kind had been made and was not appealed.] In substance the relief claimed in this action is a re-transfer of this stock. [COTTON, L.J.—What defence do you suggest has not been raised by the defendant company?] I should like to set up a claim on contract by way of defence, and that the transfer by one executor was sufficient to give me a good title. [COTTON, L.J.—Any claim on contract you have, notwithstanding; and the other matter has been raised by the defence of the company. The order of Kay, J., also gives liberty to any parties to the action to apply in chambers as they may be advised.] I doubt whether that applies to my clients.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from Kay, J., by persons made parties to the action under what is known as the third party rule; the order giving the defendant company liberty to serve these persons has not been appealed from, and we have not now to deal with that order. The only question we have now to consider is whether any injustice has been done to the third parties by the order made upon the application for directions—whether that order for the trial of the matter in issue in their presence did not give them all that they were entitled to. To decide that we must look at the nature of the action. The plaintiffs brought their action against the railway company alone to compel the company to replace certain stock which the plaintiffs said ought to be standing in their names in the company's books. In my opinion, whatever may be the consequence as between the company and other persons, the plaintiffs are entitled to proceed against the company alone, on the ground that it is their duty to keep their books properly—not to take the stock which was registered in the plaintiffs' names out of their names without a proper authority from them to do so, and that the company are liable to replace the stock which they have without that proper authority taken out of the plaintiffs' names. It has been often held in cases against the Bank of England that if the plaintiff sought to have the identical stock which had been wrongfully transferred replaced in his name, he might have done so, but in that case he must have sued the transferees, making the company co-defendants, as being the custodians of the register. But in this case the plaintiffs did not take that course. The company did not at first suggest that the third parties ought to be made defendants, but got a third party order against these persons in order that they might be bound by the decision in this action of the question whether these transfers were forged or not. By the order now appealed from, Kay, J., gave no liberty to the present appellants to put in a defence or to intervene as parties in the action, but ordered that they should be at liberty to attend at the trial and take such part in the proceedings as the judge might direct, and should be bound by the result of the trial. Of course, the present appellants, having that liberty, might make an application to raise any defence not raised by the railway company. But it seems to me that every point which could be raised by the third parties is raised in the defence of the company. If the third parties wish to administer interrogatories, they can inform the defendant company what it is they wish to be elicited from the plaintiffs by interrogatories, and if the defendant company refuse to put the interrogatories, the third parties might apply to the judge in chambers for an order for that purpose; but when, as here, all points are fairly raised by the defence, and intended to be fought out by the defendant company, the plaintiffs ought not to be embarrassed by the third parties coming in to defend the action and interrogate as if they were defendants. Having regard to the nature of the relief which the plaintiffs seek, it is quite right that the railway company only should be made defendants, and I am unable to see that the order does not give the appellants everything which they ought to have. The court must endeavour to do justice to third parties, but at the same time it must take care not to do injustice to the plaintiffs. If there were any witnesses which the appellants may think ought to be called at the trial, they can communicate with the company's advisers, and, if they refuse to call those witnesses, the appellants can make an application to the judge, and he would no doubt allow the third parties to call those witnesses themselves.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. At first it seemed to me that the plaintiffs could not prosecute their action without these third parties being brought in as defendants, but the cases of Sloman v. Bank of England and Taylor v. Midland Railway Co. show that the plaintiffs need sue no one but the railway company. The issues to be decided in the action are, first, whether the transfers are forgeries or not; and, secondly, whether the signature of one of the registered joint holders is sufficient. The judge below gave the present appellants liberty to appear at the trial of the action and to take such steps in the proceedings as the judge might direct. It must be remembered that the railway company are bonâ fide defendants, and mean to raise and contest the points raised by the pleadings. In my opinion no injustice is done, or likely to be done, by this order, under the circumstances, to the present appellants.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs are seeking to impeach certain transfers of stock which they allege are forged transfers. But the action is brought against the railway company alone, and at first, after hearing the argument of Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, it seemed to me that the company ought not to have been the sole defendants. But Mr. Whitaker, by his able argument, rolled back the tide of war which had risen against him, and changed the view I had first taken.

The relief sought by the action is relief sought, not as against the third parties, but as against the railway company alone. Mr. Vaughan Hawkins was compelled to admit that, as the action was at first launched, the transferees were not necessary parties; but he urged that they had been made parties to the action by an order, under the third party rule, which bound them by the result of the action, and yet did not give them adequate protection under that rule.

The case of Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Co. was relied on as showing that the transferees ought to have been made defendants, but that case is not in point, as there relief was sought directly affecting the transferees. Whether in the present case these transferees were rightly or wrongly brought in as third parties I say not. They have submitted to that by not moving to discharge the third party order. A summons for directions was then taken out, as it had to be, under ord. 16, r. 52, to protect both the plaintiffs and the third parties. Now what is the way in which a third party, when brought in, is protected without embarrassing the plaintiff? The next rule, rule 53, deals with that. In the first place, the judge may permit the third party to defend the action, but not so as to embarrass the plaintiff, and the third party has no right to superadd himself as a defendant except on terms such as admitting a liability to give indemnity, &c., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins' clients refused to admit such liability to give indemnity; but the rule goes further, and provides, secondly, that a third party may appear at the trial and take such part in the proceedings at the trial as the judge may think fit; thirdly, the judge may give such directions as he thinks fit for the purpose of having the question conveniently tried, and as to the mode and extent in or to which the third party shall be bound by the judgment in the action. The railway company here are not sham defendants, or defendants who have no interest in opposing the plaintiff's claim, as in some of the cases, of which Witham v. Vane, 28 W. R. 276, 49 L. J. Ch. 242, may be cited as an example, but they are effectively defending the action, and it seems to me, therefore, that Mr. Vaughan Hawkins' clients have no right to be made defendants because they wish to dress the defence in a particular fashion, if their interests are substantially defended by the railway company. They can make an application to prevent any miscarriage of justice if, by reason of anything happening subsequently to the order, their interests would not be substantially defended. No such necessity has yet arisen.

MILLER v. HARPER. (a.)

Practice — Summons for particulars — Discovery — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 17.

In an action by the executors of a deceased married woman against her husband claiming the delivery up of certain furniture in the defendant's possession which was alleged to form part of the separate property of the deceased, the defendant took out a summons for particulars of the claim.

Held, affirming North, J., that no order ought to be made upon the summons until the defendant had given discovery as to the furniture in his possession, specifying what he claimed as his.

Appeal from North, J.

The action was brought by the executors of a deceased married woman against her husband, and the plaintiffs claimed certain furniture, then in the house of the defendant, as the separate estate of the testatrix.

The furniture in question was in part alleged to have been settled to the separate use of the testatrix by a marriage settlement, and in part to have been purchased by her during coverture out of her separate income.

After the delivery of the statement of claim, the defendant took out a summons for delivery of particulars by the plaintiffs of the nature and description of the several articles of furniture alleged to have belonged to the testatrix for her separate use, together with dates showing when and of whom the alleged purchases were made, and what articles were purchased and what price paid therefor, and for a stay of all further proceedings unless such particulars were given within seven days.

North, J., refused to make any order on this summons and ordered it to stand over until the defendant should have made an affidavit stating what articles of furniture and effects in the house the defendant claimed.

The defendant appealed.

J. G. Wood, for the appellant.—The defendant is not bound to give discovery until he has obtained the particulars from the plaintiffs; there should first be some issue knit between the parties. The plaintiffs had made no application for discovery, and, therefore, the order was wrong in form in requiring the defendant to make discovery. The plaintiffs have no doubt since applied for discovery, but had not done so when the defendant's summons was dealt with.

Swinfen Eady, for the respondent, was not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—I think the order that was made was right in substance, if not in form. The action is brought by the executors of a deceased lady. The lady herself would, of course, have known what furniture was hers and what belonged to the trustees of her settlement, but the executors cannot know that. In my opinion the learned judge was substantially right in refusing to make any order for particulars on the application of the defendant until the defendant gave discovery by making an affidavit stating what the articles of furniture in the house were that he claimed. It would not be right to require the plaintiffs, who are executors, to give particulars until the defendant had done that.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think the order was right; if the contention put forward on behalf of the defendant were adopted, I do not see how the plaintiffs would be able to carry on the action at all.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In such cases it is a good practice, and one in conformity with the rules of procedure, to adjourn a summons for particulars till such discovery be given.

Appeal dismissed.

GAS LIGHT AND COKE CO. v. SOUTH METROPOLITAN GAS CO. (a.)

Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), s. 6 —District—Supply of gas for sale—Supply for consumption beyond district—Point of supply.

The Nine Elms Station of the London and South-Western Railway Co. lies partly in the district of the plaintiff company and partly in that of the defendant company. The defendant company placed meters within their own district, from which gas was passed through pipes to that portion of the Nine Elms Station lying within the plaintiff company's district. Section 6 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (which applied to both companies), after defining the limits of each company's district, enacted that "No other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned . . . shall supply gas for sale within the said limits, unless authorized by Parliament so to do."

Held, that the decision in the case of Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. West London Junction Gas Co. (Journal of Gas Lighting, Jan. 7, 1868, p. 14, 56 L. J. N. S. Ch. 862 note) governed the present case, and therefore that the point of supply within the meaning of the section is the meter through which the gas passes into the pipes for consumption by the customer, and that it is not a transgression of the statutory provision to supply gas for sale at a meter within the district of the supplying company, although it is intended for consumption and is in fact consumed within the district of another company.

Per Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., that if not bound by the decision referred to they should have held that "supply" of gas was a process continuing from the place where the gas is made to where it is burnt.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 119), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., reported ante, p. 119, where the facts of the case and the arguments are fully stated.

The facts were shortly as follows:—

The plaintiff company was formed by the amalgamation of several gas companies, and had an exclusive right of supplying gas over the district formerly supplied by its constituent companies, such supply being governed by the provisions of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860. The defendant company in like manner was formed by the amalgamation of several gas companies, and had an exclusive right of supplying gas over a district adjoining the district of the plaintiff company, such supply being also governed by the provisions of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860.

By that Act (section 6) the limits of the companies are defined, and it is enacted that "no other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned or shall hereafter be assigned, shall supply gas for sale within the said limits unless authorized by Parliament so to do."

The premises of the London and South-Western Railway Co. at Nine Elms, consisting of extensive locomotive and other works, are situated partly within the plaintiff company's district and partly within the defendant company's district. By an agreement with the London and South-Western Railway Co. the gas for the supply of the whole of the railway company's premises at Nine Elms was furnished by the defendant company through three meters within the defendant company's district, but the gas was admittedly used outside the defendant company's district.

The plaintiff company, by their action, to which the railway company were not parties, claimed an injunction and damages against the defendant company.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the action, with costs.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., R. S. Wright, Danckwertz, and Haldane, for the appellants.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Michael, Q.C., and Prior, for the respondents.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., dismissing the plaintiffs' action. If the objection had been seriously pressed that the railway company ought to be parties, I am of opinion that that objection ought to prevail; but under the circumstances it is our duty to decide the question before us on its merits, and notwithstanding the absence of the railway company. [After stating the facts, his lordship proceeded:—] The question which we have to consider is, What is the true interpretation of the words "supply gas for sale within the said limits" in section 6 of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860? Now, whatever view we might have taken of those words if the matter had come before us unhampered by authority, we cannot, in my opinion, decide in favour of the plaintiffs, having regard to the case which has been cited to us of The Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. West London Junction Gas Co., reported in Journal of Gas Lighting, 7th January, 1868, p. 14; 56 L. J. N. S. Ch. 862, note. That case is not reported in the authorized reports, but its substantial accuracy has not been disputed on either side; and we must assume it to be correct. It is true that the circumstances of that case were widely different from the present; but the principles there laid down by Cairns, L.J., and Rolt, L.J., exactly apply to the case before us.

Lord Cairns said: "There is no controversy that the two meters—both the meter of the Wormwood Scrubs Co., by which they check the delivery of their gas, and the meter of the Great Western Railway Co., by which, for their own satisfaction, they check the receipt of the gas—are both out of the district of the Imperial Gas Co., and close to the Wormwood Scrubs Works. In my opinion, therefore, this is a question which does not admit of any serious doubt, because, although gas is a very intangible article to our apprehension, still gas is a manufactured article, which is sold and delivered like any other manufactured article, and the question is to determine when and at what part this manufactured article is sold and delivered. Certainly, as I understand it, with regard to gas, wherever the point is that the meter of the company is fixed, and the gas leaves the meter and is delivered to the consumer, that is, the point where the risk of the company ends and the risk of the consumer begins. In a dwelling-house the pipe on both sides of the meter may or may not belong to the company, but where the meter which tells what gas has passed through and been delivered on the premises is, that is the place where the risk of the company ends and the risk of the consumer begins; and so I say, in my opinion, the gas company in this case delivering gas through these two meters, which are altogether out of the district of the Imperial Co., the gas is there sold and delivered to the Great Western Railway Co., and if there be a supply for sale within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, that supply for sale is not, in my opinion, within the limits of the Imperial Co. but in a wholly different district." And Rolt, L.J., expresses himself to the same effect.

That is a clear decision as to the proper construction of the Act, and it is a decision, acted on for many years, which this court is, I think, bound to follow. The decision of Kekewich, J., must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this action is as to the meaning of the words "supply gas for sale." My own opinion is that the process of supply is continued from where the gas leaves the gasometer to where it is burnt. I cannot, however, in this case put upon the words the construction which I think right, having regard to the construction placed upon it by Lord Cairns and Rolt, L J., in the case to which the Lord Justice has referred.

BOWEN, L.J.—My own impression has been that this is a case in which one ought to have the courage of one's opinions, and in which, holding the view which we do hold as to the construction of the word "supply," we ought to decide accordingly. For my part, I cannot agree with the construction laid down by Lord Cairns and Rolt, L.J. In my opinion to supply does not mean to sell and deliver; a meter is not a reservoir, or the point at which the supply is made; but the operation of supply continues till the gas reaches the burner. However, I concur with my learned brothers in yielding to the expressed opinion of the court in the case to which reference has been made and which has been acted upon by this court for many years. The appeal will accordingly be dismissed.

PROCTOR v. BENNIS. (a.)

Patent—Specification—Description—Combination producing new result — Infringement by mechanical equivalents.

Where a patent has been obtained for an invention consisting of a combination of mechanical appliances, where the invention is new it is not necessary—on the question of validity of the patent—that the particular portions of the combination should or should not have been claimed as novel in the specification; but, on the question of infringement, where the infringement alleged is not the taking of the combination, but the taking of a subsidiary portion of the combination, then it is necessary that the novelty of such portion should have been claimed.

Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co., 1 App. Cas. 574, 25 W. R. H. L. Dig. 174, followed.

Where the invention claimed by a patentee is one merely for improvements in a combination of the mechanical means already used in old machines, producing a result already well known, there the patentee will be held strictly to the description given in his specification of the particular means by which his invention is carried into effect, and the doctrine that mere mechanical equivalents constitute an infringement does not apply. But where the invention claimed is one not merely for improvements in the combination of mechanical means employed, but also in the application of those means to produce a result that is novel, then the user by another person of mere mechanical equivalents for the purpose of producing the same result constitutes an infringement of the patent.

Clark v. Adie, 26 W. R. 45, 2 App. Cas. 315, explained.

The defendant in an action for infringement of a patent, in order to successfully plead—at the hearing of the action as distinguished from an interlocutory application—"acquiescence" as a bar to the plaintiff's rights, must prove (1) that the defendant was ignorant of the plaintiff's rights; and (2) that the plaintiff knew that the defendant was ignorant of the plaintiff's rights, and stood by and allowed the defendant to expend money in ignorance of the plaintiff's rights.

Appeal from Bristowe, Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of Lancaster.

The action was to restrain the infringement of a patent obtained by the plaintiff in June, 1875. The defendant Bennis was the maker of machines alleged to be infringements, and the other defendants, Crosses & Winkworth and Greenhalgh & Shaw, were persons who were using the machines made by Bennis.

The plaintiff's patent was for an invention having for its object improved and self-acting mechanism for the supply and distribution of fuel at intervals over the surface of fire in furnaces.

The plaintiff, in his specification, described the construction and action of his apparatus as follows:—"I employ an ordinary feed-hopper applied to the front of the boiler, which, by means of spiked rollers, will give a supply of fuel: the fuel is received upon an inclined door or flap . . . . the door or flap is secured to cross-shafts, to which, by means of levers or tappets, a partial turn or rotary motion is given, drawing back the door or flap until the tappet shall have passed its throw, whereon the partial rotation of the shaft is suddenly reversed by means of a coiled spring or weight applied thereto. By such reversing action the door or flap attached to the shaft receives a rapid forward movement in the direction of the furnace bars, throwing and distributing the fuel over a portion of the fire. The tappet is provided with two or more varying throws, so that the spring will be coiled more or less as the fuel is to be alternately thrown on to the surface fire at the front, midway, or back of the fire surface. The tappet shaft receives motion from a worm and worm-wheel."

The plaintiff, in his specification, then went on to describe the same in detail and with reference to various figures thereunto annexed, and continued as follows:—"I would have it to be understood that I lay no claim to the hopper, nor to the spiked rollers, nor to the shafts and worms for operating the same; but what I do claim is the employment of the tappets and shafts and springs when applied to and in connection with the doors as and for the purpose herein fully described and illustrated."

The defendant Bennis had, in April, 1875—prior to the date of the plaintiff's patent—taken out a patent for improvements in the mechanism of furnace-feeding machines, but in that patent of Bennis' the coal was thrown upon the fire by a longitudinal thrust, the pusher being worked by an arm. It appeared that Bennis, before taking out this patent, had tried radial action, but abandoned it, and adopted the longitudinal action in his patent. Bennis' patent, however, was not a success, and never came into practical use.

Some years subsequent to the date of the plaintiff's patent Bennis began to manufacture the machines which the plaintiff alleged constituted infringements of the plaintiff's patent. These machines of Bennis', though different in general appearance to those of the plaintiff, worked like the machines of the plaintiff, with an intermittent radial motion, and the radius was moved in one direction by tappets, and in the opposite direction by a spring, as in the plaintiff's machine. In Bennis' machine, however, the radius was not attached to a shaft, but worked on a pin, and was itself impelled by the tappets and the spring, whereas in the plaintiff's machine the radius was attached to a shaft, and the shaft was impelled by the tappets and the spring.

Bennis exhibited these machines of his at Manchester in 1882, and at Oldham in 1883, and the other defendants bought and used them. The plaintiff saw Bennis' machines at both exhibitions, but did not then complain of them as infringements. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff, in 1882, knew that the other defendants had purchased some of Bennis' machines, and that the plaintiff had on several occasions asked the other defendants to try the plaintiff's machine instead of Bennis', as it was better than that of Bennis, but had never intimated to those defendants that Bennis' machine was an infringement of the plaintiff's patent.

In 1887 the action was tried before the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, who held that the machine made by Bennis was an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, and gave judgment accordingly against Bennis, but dismissed the action as against the other defendants on the ground that the plaintiff had lost his right of action against them by acquiescence.

The plaintiff appealed from so much of the judgment as dismissed the action against the defendants other than Bennis; and the defendant Bennis appealed from the judgment against him. The appeals came on for hearing together.

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the judgments.

Aston, Q.C., and Bousfield, for the defendant Bennis' appeal.

Rigby, Q.C., and Bather, for the respondents Crosses & Winkworth.

O. L. Clare, for the respondents Greenhalgh & Shaw.

Aug. 4.—COTTON, L.J. [after stating the nature of the appeal, continued:—] The first question we have to consider is, what is it the plaintiff claims by his specification? For the present it is sufficient to state that his claim is for a combination forming a machine to distribute coal on fires or furnaces, and it is a combination and nothing else that he claims. It was not contested that it was useful, and it was not seriously contended that it had been anticipated, but it was contended before us that the plaintiff's specification was not good, because it did not point out what he admitted to be old and what he considered to be new. It was argued that the infringement complained of was an infringement, not of the combination, but of some subsidiary combination or some particular portion in the plaintiff's machine. That argument is erroneous, because the case made by the plaintiff is that the defendants have infringed the combination which was patented, but it is desirable to deal with the objection to the specification.

Counsel for Bennis relied on the opinion expressed by Lord Westbury in Foxwell v. Bostock, 12 W. R. 753, 4 De G. J. & S. 298, but that must be read with the light thrown upon it by Lord Cairns in Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co., 1 App. Cas. 574, 25 W. R. H. L. Dig. 174. [The Lord Justice here read the passage in the judgment of Lord Cairns referring to Foxwell v. Bostock, and continued:—] In my opinion, it is of necessity, apart from this expression of Lord Cairns, that where a combination is claimed to be an invention, then, if that invention be new, it is immaterial, on the question of validity of the specification and the goodness of the patent, whether the patentee has pointed out how far he does or does not claim particular portions.

Of course, if the alleged infringement had been the taking a subsidiary portion of this combination—particular parts of the machinery which formed the combination—it would have been material; but here the plaintiff in his claim cuts himself down entirely to the combination, pointing out that he simply claims the combination of four parts—the combination of the tappets, shafts, and springs with his flaps or doors.

It was further contended by Mr. Aston that all the differences between the machine which Bennis is making and selling and the machine specified in Bennis' patent of April, 1875—which was prior to that of the plaintiff—were mere alterations which any workman could introduce as a variation of that machine without any invention whatever, and that as Bennis had got a patent which should cover all such additions or variations as could be made by an ordinary workman without invention from his specification, it was impossible that the later grant to the plaintiff should prevent Bennis from using that which was really described in his own patent. In my opinion, looking at the machinery, one would come to the conclusion that the difference between Bennis' machine as described in his specification and the machines which he is now making is not of the character so urged. It is remarkable that the only witness supporting that contention of Bennis is his principal scientific witness—of the very highest attainments as a scientific witness—but not a practical man employed in making these machines. No workman was called to say that these variations would have occurred to him, or were such as he would have introduced without any invention. [The Lord Justice here mentioned a particular variation with respect to the action of the door or flap, and continued:—] It would be singular that this variation, which has made a machine effectual, while the patented machine of Bennis' seems never to have come into practical use, should be considered a mere obvious variation not requiring any invention.

We then come to this point—is there an infringement? The contention of the plaintiff is, not that parts of his machinery have been taken, for which he has a right to protection, but that his combination has been taken. It is obvious that Bennis has not taken absolutely and exactly the combination which the plaintiff has patented; but the question is, Has the combination in substance been taken? Has Bennis, though not exactly taking the whole combination which has been patented, taken, by slight variations or by mechanical equivalents, the substance of it, so as to produce the same result by practically the same means? [The Lord Justice here referred in detail to the specification of the plaintiff, and said:—] Now the ingenuity of counsel produced the argument that this does not claim a combination. I agree that it does not contain the word "combination," but what is here claimed is, to my mind, essentially a combination, and nothing else. A combination is the use of certain things in connection with others to produce a machine, and that is what is here claimed. [The Lord Justice then entered into an examination of the machine made and sold by Bennis with reference to the differences between it and the plaintiff's machines, and continued :—] In my opinion, although Bennis has not got the exact combination of the plaintiff, yet he has got it in substance and result by putting mere mechanical equivalents for elements of the plaintiff's combination, which is protected by his patent.

Then it is said, on behalf of Bennis, that there are certain omissions in the machine which he is making and selling of parts which there are in the plaintiff's combination; that there are certain things in Bennis' machine not found in the plaintiff's, and producing a result which is not obtained in the plaintiff's machine; and that that would prevent what has been done by Bennis being considered as an infringement of the plaintiff's machine. But if Bennis has, by any additions, made an improvement which would be a subject for letters patent, that will not enable him to take the plaintiff's combination and apply his improvements to it. Omissions or additions may be very material in considering whether, in fact, the machine of Bennis is an infringement of the combination which the plaintiff claims; but, if Bennis really has taken the substance and essence of the plaintiff's combination, the mere fact that certain parts are omitted or certain parts are added cannot prevent his machine from being an infringement of the plaintiff's combination.

Then it was said we are bound by what was laid down by the judges in Curtis v. Platt, 3 Ch. D. 135n, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 59. The principle alleged to have been laid down there was that where an invention is claimed for improvements in machinery consisting only in a combination, there the patentee must be held to the description which he gives of the particular means by which his invention is to be carried into effect, and that the doctrine of mechanical equivalents cannot apply. In my opinion that case does not apply to the present, because the observations there made were applied to a case where the patent was for an improvement in a machine which had been long in use for producing a certain result. There was no novelty in the results to be produced, and the only novelty which could be claimed was the application and use of certain mechanical means in order to produce in a known machine the same result which in that known machine had been produced by other mechanical means. That, to my mind, distinguishes that case from the present. [The Lord Justice then referred in detail to the nature of the invention claimed by the patentee in Curtis v. Platt, and continued :—] In applying the words used by the judges in that case, we must consider the nature of the case before them, and I come to the conclusion that what they meant was—that where there is no novelty in the result, and where the machine is not a new one, but the claim is only for improvements in a known machine for producing a known result, the patentee must be tied down strictly to the invention which he claims, and the mode which he points out of effecting the improvement. But here, although there had previously been imperfect machines for feeding furnaces automatically, yet there had not, previously to this machine, been any machine by which that had been done by any intermittent radial action of a flap or door, as is done here by the plaintiff. In my judgment, therefore, we must come to the conclusion that the defendant Bennis, and also the other defendants, have infringed the plaintiff's patent, and that, so far as this goes, the appeal of Bennis must be dismissed.

Then we come to the question whether anything has been done by the plaintiff which will bar his right of relief as against the defendants? Now we must bear in mind that this is not a question as to an interlocutory injunction. If the plaintiff, after what had taken place, had come here for an interlocutory injunction, it would have been difficult for him to answer some of the arguments which on this part of the case were urged against him, because the court does not interfere on interlocutory injunction unless the plaintiff has been prompt in making his claim. But here we are at the hearing, and what we have to consider is, has the right of the plaintiff been barred by what has been done by the plaintiff? [The Lord Justice, after here referring to the evidence on this point, came to the conclusion that the proper construction of the evidence was, not that the plaintiff gave permission to the defendants other than Bennis to use the machines made by Bennis, if on a trial those machines were found to be better than the machines of the plaintiff, but that the plaintiff merely requested those defendants to try the plaintiff's machine, and if they did, that they would find it a better machine than that of Bennis'; and continued :—] Then it is said that, independently of that, there had been a lying by on the part of the plaintiff which would in a court of equity prevent him from obtaining relief. In my opinion there has not. The right of the patentee does not depend on the defendant having notice that what he is doing is an infringement. If what the defendant is doing is, in fact, an infringement, his having acted bonâ fide and honestly will not protect him from an injunction. It does not depend on notice. The right of monopoly has been granted to the patentee, and what it is necessary for the defendant to show in order to raise an equity against the plaintiff, is expressed by Lord Cranworth in Ramsden v. Dyson, 14 W. R. 926, L. R. 1 H. L. 129, as follows: "If a stranger begins to build on my land, supposing it to be his own, and I, perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a court of equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land on which he had expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. It considers that when I saw the mistake into which he had fallen, it was my duty to be active to state my adverse title, and that it would be dishonest in me to remain wilfully passive on such an occasion in order afterwards to profit by the mistake which I might have prevented." That lays down the principle that it is necessary that the person who alleges this lying by should have been acting in ignorance of the title of the other man, and that the other man should have known that ignorance, and not mentioned his own title. Here none of the defendants state that they never knew anything about the plaintiff's patent. In my opinion it must be taken that they did know it, but, if they did not, I cannot find anything from which we ought to draw the conclusion that the plaintiff had reason to suppose that they did not; why should he not suppose that they were acting on the view for which they are now contending, that what they were doing was no infringement?

In my opinion the facts of this case do not require or enable us to hold that the plaintiff lay by, so as by his silence, with knowledge that the defendants were acting in ignorance of his title, to deprive himself of any title to relief which he otherwise would have had.

Then, is there anything like a representation that the machines of Bennis were no infringement? It is true that the plaintiff never said they were, although he knew it. But, in my opinion, mere silence, merely not giving notice to the defendants that what they were doing was an infringement, cannot reasonably be taken as any representation that what they were doing was not an infringement. It would be going much too far to hold that the omission of the patentee to say, "You are infringing my patent," amounted to a representation by him that what the parties were doing was not an infringement. There is no evidence to lead us to the conclusion that there was any estoppel against the plaintiff by a representation made by him to the effect relied on by the defendants. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal of the plaintiff succeeds and the appeal of Bennis fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the defendants other than Bennis, the Vice-Chancellor decided that the plaintiff had lost against them whatever rights he originally possessed owing to conduct or inaction on his part which amounted either to estoppel or to acquiescence within the meaning attached to that word by the well-known practice and principles of the courts of equity. As to estoppel, it seems to me that there is a very short, and I think conclusive, answer to the respondent's argument. There certainly was no representation made by the plaintiff to the effect that he would not enforce his rights or that he had got no rights as against these defendants, nor was there, in my opinion, any conduct which amounted to such a representation. I think the only plausible ground which Mr. Rigby could take was that there had been acquiescence. But in order to make out acquiescence it is necessary for them to establish that the plaintiff stood by and knowingly allowed the defendants to proceed and to expend money in ignorance of the fact that the plaintiff had rights and meant to assert such rights. If they made out that case, then a court of equity would not afterwards allow the plaintiff to interfere with them except upon the terms of placing them in the same position and compensating them for the loss which they had sustained owing to a mistake which he favoured. It seems to me impossible to apply this doctrine to the facts before us. It seems to me that the true inference of fact to be drawn here is that these defendants, other than Bennis, were acting at their own peril throughout, and knew throughout that they were so acting. Although they reckoned on security, and although for a long time the plaintiff did not interfere, there was nothing on the part of the plaintiff to lull them into security.

I will now state the conclusion at which I have arrived on the question of Bennis' patent. Mr. Aston said, first, that there was no infringement, and then, that, if there were any, it was only in respect of the radial action of the door, and that this radial action was not put forward in the plaintiff's patent as a substantial element of claim, and that if it had been so put forward it would not have been a good subject-matter for a patent. The answer is this, that the plaintiff's claim is for a combination and nothing more, and that when a combination and nothing more is claimed, the combination being a novelty, it is immaterial that the patentee should point out how far he claims novelty for particular portions which go to make up the combination. Those portions are not his claim, but it is putting them together and combining them that constitutes his claim. That seems to me to be the true law as laid down in Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co., without a reference to which case Foxwell v. Bostock is liable to be misunderstood. Then, again, it was said that there was no difference between the plaintiff's patent and the prior patent of Bennis except variations which a mechanic of ordinary competency could easily achieve, and that Bennis was entitled to stand on his prior grant. To my mind the answer to that is, that there is no evidence upon which I could rely to support that view, and that Bennis for five years did not make those variations.

I pass now to the question whether there has been any infringement. Has the combination been taken, or a substantial part of it? All has not been taken. Has Bennis, then, taken so much as to produce the same result by the same means or by mere mechanical equivalents for the same means? [The Lord Justice here entered into an examination of the nature of the plaintiff's invention, and continued:—] Now I think it goes to the root of this case to remember that this is, as was described by one of the counsel, a pioneer invention, and it is by the light of that, as it seems to me, that we ought to consider the question whether there have been variations or omissions and additions which prevent the machine which is complained of from being an infringement of the plaintiff's. With regard to the variations, I take precisely the same view that Cotton, L.J., has taken. With regard to the additions and omissions, it is obvious that additions may be an improvement, and that omissions may be an improvement, but the mere fact that there is either an addition or an omission does not enable the defendant to take the substance of the plaintiff's patent. The question is, not whether the addition or omission is material, but whether what has been taken is the substance and essence of the invention. That seems to me to be the true test as propounded by the House of Lords in Clark v. Adie, 26 W. R. 45, 2 App. Cas. 315. Now in Curtis v. Platt it has been said that, where the patentee has claimed a particular mechanical device for effecting the object in view, he must be held strictly to that device. But when you are considering an absolutely new invention with a novel result, you cannot apply that rule without recollecting that the result effected is new as well as the combination, and that when there is really an ingenious novelty in the idea that the combination will produce a new result, that novelty in the idea is part of the merit of the very combination. I do not feel, after the reflection we have given the case, much doubt that there has been an infringement, and I think that the appeal of Bennis ought to fail.

FRY, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. I will first consider the point which has been raised by the appeal of those defendants against whom an injunction was sought on the ground of their user of the machine. Their case, which was successful before the Vice-Chancellor, may be stated in one or other of two ways. It may be placed on the equitable doctrine of acquiescence, or it may be placed on the legal doctrine of estoppel by conduct. In the present case there is no evidence of the knowledge on the plaintiff's part of any mistake by the defendants of their legal rights; and, further, I think that there is no evidence of any representation, made either by conduct or by words to the defendants by the plaintiff, of the character which was relied upon, and which would be necessary to support either the legal or the equitable defence. I think, therefore, that the defence of those defendants who used the machine, whether it be treated as a legal defence of estoppel or as an equitable defence of acquiescence, entirely fails. The ingredients necessary to each of these defences are wanting. Now with regard to the question of the patent and the infringement of it. The pith and substance of the plaintiff's invention is, in my judgment, putting coals upon a fire by an intermittent radial action. Was there any prior publication of an invention which was substantially the same as the plaintiff's? [The Lord Justice here considered the patents of Stanley and Church, and came to the conclusion that their machines were different in their action from the plaintiff's, and continued:—] Then, as to Bennis' invention and patent, it appears to me also to be plain that a longitudinal thrust was the essence of that invention and patent, and I have come to the conclusion that it is not a mere matter of ordinary practice which any ordinary workman could have given effect to, to pass from the longitudinal thrust of Bennis' machine to the radial action of the plaintiff's machine.

Then as to the question of infringement. [The Lord Justice then described the nature of the invention claimed by the plaintiff, and continued:—] The main inquiry we have to answer before determining the true construction of that claim is, Was this combination for an old object, or was it a combination for a new object?

It appears to me that the cases and the reason of the case draw a broad distinction between combinations which are old as regards their elements and old as regards the object to be attained, and combinations which, though old as regards the elements, are new as regards the mode of putting them together, and new as regards the object to be attained.

I think that a comparison of what was said in Curtis v. Platt, where a broad distinction was drawn by Lord Hatherley between old and new objects, with what was said by Lord Cairns in Clark v. Adie in indicating the second mode in which the combination might be infringed in that case, and with what was said by the present Master of the Rolls in Nordenfelt v. Gardner, 1 Rep. Pat. Cas. 65, goes to show that there is a broad line of distinction to be drawn between the cases of combination for an old object and cases of combination for a new object, and, as I have already said, reason goes along with those authorities. Was, then, the object in the present case an old one, or was it a new one? Putting fuel on a fire is, of course, an act as old as can be. But is that the real object of the patent? I think the real object of the patent is this, the automatic placing of coal on a fire by intermittent radial action. That object is new. I think, therefore, we are bound to construe this combination as a combination to effect a new and useful object. That being so, what was stated by Lord Cairns in Clark v. Adie distinctly applies. He said:—"The second mode"—that is, second mode in which a combination might be infringed—"would be one which might occasion more difficulty. The infringer might not take the whole of the instrument described, but he might take a certain number of parts of it; he might make an instrument which, in many respects, would resemble the patented instrument, but would not resemble it in all its parts. Then the question would be, either for a jury or for any tribunal which was judging of the facts of the case, whether that which was done by the alleged infringer amounted to a colourable departure from the instrument patented, and whether in what he had done he had not really taken and adopted the substance of the instrument patented." That appears to me to be the inquiry here. In the present case we have these broad features of likeness, that in both machines the motion is a radial motion, in both machines it is an intermittent action, in both machines it is, of course, produced by means of a radius, in both machines that radius is moved in one direction by tappets, and the same radius is moved in the opposite direction by a spring. All those broad features of the machines are common, but there is this difference, that in the plaintiff's machine a shaft is impelled by the tappets and by the spring, whereas in Bennis' machine the radius itself is impelled by the tappets and the spring. It follows that the radius in the plaintiff's machine is attached to the shaft, whereas the radius in Bennis' works on a pin. That is the broad distinction between them. The result, however, seems to me to be substantially the same—by substituting the pin for the shaft as the centre on which the radius acts, and by impelling the radius itself instead of impelling the shaft fixed to the radius, you have produced, in substance, precisely the same radial action by the same means. I think, therefore, that we have here, in the plaintiff's machine, a new combination for a new object, and that the gist of that combination has been taken by Bennis, and that consequently there is an infringement.

For these reasons I agree with the conclusion arrived at by my learned brethren.

PALMER v. MALLET. (a.)

Agreement — Construction—Joint and several—Agreement in restraint of trade entered into with partners —Dissolution of partnership—Subsequent breach as to one partner.

A. was engaged as assistant to B. & C., who carried on the business or profession of surgeons in partnership at N. Upon entering such service, A. gave to B. & C. a bond, which contained the recital of an agreement that A. would not at any time thereafter "set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon." The partnership between A. and B. was subsequently dissolved, and A. was engaged by B. as his assistant. Upon an application by C. to restrain A. from so acting,

Held, that the agreement entered into by A. with B. & C. was both joint and several, and that C. was therefore entitled to sue alone for a breach of it.

Held, also, that A. had committed a breach of it by acting as assistant to B., and that an injunction ought, therefore, to be granted.

Allen v. Taylor, 19 W. R. 556, distinguished.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

In October, 1885, the defendant Mallet entered into the employment of Hall & Palmer, who were then carrying on in partnership at Newtown, in Montgomeryshire, the business of general medical practitioners, as their salaried assistant.

On the 4th of December, 1885, the defendant gave Hall & Palmer a bond, by which he became bound to pay them, their executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of £1,000. The bond contained the following recitals:—"Whereas the said T. C. Mallet has lately been taken into the employment of the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer as an assistant in their said business of practice of surgeons, accoucheurs, and apothecaries, carried on by them in Newtown aforesaid, and its surroundings: And whereas one of the terms upon which the said T. C. Mallet was taken into the employment of the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer, as aforesaid, was that he should not at any time set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon, accoucheur, apothecary, or physician in the said town of Newtown or within ten miles thereof, and that he should enter into and execute these presents." The condition of the bond was, "That, if the said T. C. Mallet shall not at any time hereafter, directly or indirectly, and either alone or in partnership with or as assistant of any other person or persons, or otherwise howsoever, set up or carry on the profession or business of a surgeon, accoucheur, apothecary, or physician, or any branch thereof, or any professional business connected therewith within the said town of Newtown, or within ten miles thereof, without the consent in writing of the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer, their executors, administrators, or assigns being first obtained for that purpose: And if the said T. C. Mallet shall not, either by himself or by any other person or persons, either on behalf of himself or any other person or persons, any time hereafter solicit the custom or support of the persons who are now, or may hereafter from time to time be, the customers or patients of the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer, their executors, administrators, or assigns, or either of them, in or in connection with such profession or business as aforesaid, or solicit any of such persons to discontinue his or her employing the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer, their executors, administrators, or assigns, or either of them: But so that nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect the right of the said E. Hall and H. L. Palmer, their executors, administrators, or assigns, to restrain by injunction any breach on the part of the said T. C. Mallet of the agreement hereinbefore recited, and to recover damages against him, his executors or administrators, for any antecedent breach thereof in lieu of taking proceedings against him or them under the above-written bond, then the above-written bond or obligation shall be void."

On the 2nd of May, 1887, the partnership was dissolved by the judgment of the court in an action for dissolution, and thenceforth Hall and Palmer each carried on business separately in Newtown, and the defendant entered into the employment of Hall as a salaried assistant.

On the 6th of May, Palmer brought this action to restrain the defendant from so acting, on the ground that he was thereby committing a breach of the above agreement.

The only evidence of the agreement was the recital of it contained in the bond.

On the 24th of June, Chitty, J., granted an injunction.

The defendant appealed.

Aston, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the appellant.—The agreement recited in the bond is only a joint one—not joint and several—and was intended for the protection of the joint business only, and that business now being at an end the plaintiff alone cannot sue upon it. Assuming, however, that the plaintiff alone can sue, we contend that acting as an assistant to another person was not a breach of an agreement not to "set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon," &c. The words "assistant of any other person or persons" in the condition of the bond mean any person or persons other than the parties to the agreement, and do not apply to the acting as an assistant to one of those persons.

They referred to Allen v. Taylor, 19 W. R. 35; Lake v. South Kensington Hotel Co., 27 W. R. 514, 11 Ch. D. 121; Corporation of Bristol v. Westcott, 27 W. R. 841, 12 Ch. D. 461.

Romer, Q.C., and Alan Stewart, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Cotton, L.J.—I cannot say that we have not had some difficulty in dealing with this case. We are asked to give effect to and enforce a contract when nothing is known of its terms but from a recital in a bond. The action is not on the bond, but one of the two partners in whose favour that bond was executed relies on an agreement recited in it, and asks the court to grant an injunction to restrain Mr. Mallet from breaking the alleged agreement. We cannot now finally decide the question between the parties, but, unless there is some further evidence as to the terms of the agreement beyond the recital in the bond, I do not see how the parties can usefully go on with this litigation.

Now was Chitty, J., right? I think he was. He granted an injunction, in the terms of the agreement recited, to restrain the defendant, Mr. Mallet, from carrying on the business or profession of a surgeon in Newtown or within ten miles thereof. At the time when this bond was entered into Mr. Palmer and Mr. Hall, as appears in the bond, were carrying on business in partnership together at Newtown as surgeons, accoucheurs, and apothecaries. The bond recites—[his lordship read the recital as above set forth, and continued:—] Now that recital deals with two things—the execution of the bond and the contract on which Chitty, J., has relied.

I do not refer to the terms of the condition of the bond, because what we have to deal with is the agreement appearing on that recital. We must look at the position of the parties with whom that agreement was entered into. They were carrying on business as partners. Although they were partners for life that partnership might be put an end to, and in fact it has been put an end to, so that they had a joint interest as partners in the business which they carried on as surgeons, accoucheurs, and apothecaries, and they had several interests in it in the event of a dissolution. That being so, the proper construction of this imperfectly-recited agreement is that it is an agreement entered into by the appellant with the partners jointly and severally. I think that in this I am only following the rule laid down by Parke, B., in Sorsbie v. Park, 12 M. & W. 146, 158: "The rule is, that a covenant will be construed to be joint or several according to the interest of the parties appearing upon the face of the deed, if the words are capable of that construction; not that it will be construed to be several by reason of several interests if it be expressly joint. Suppose there were a covenant with A. and B. jointly that a certain thing should be done by the covenantor; both of those persons must sue. But where it appears upon the face of the deed that A. and B. have several interests, they must sue separately." Then in Sheppard's Touchstone (at p. 166) it is said: "But the implication or construction of law, when the words are ambiguous, or are left to the interpretation of law, will be that the words have an import corresponding to the interest, so as to be joint when the interest is joint, and several when the interest is several; notwithstanding language which, under different circumstances, would give to the covenant a different effect." Now when all we have is this recital, which both parties agree we must treat as the only evidence of a contract, I think, having regard to what I mentioned as being the position of these gentlemen, Hall and Parker, as regards, not the partnership business, but as regards the business which was being carried on by them as partners, we ought to consider this an agreement both joint and several. That gets rid of one, and, to my mind, the principal, difficulty in the plaintiff's case.

Then there is another question. It is said that, assuming Mr. Palmer to be entitled to sue, yet the defendant has not committed any breach of his contract that he should not at any time set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon, and it is said that the defendant is not doing so where he is simply acting as assistant at a salary for another man who is carrying on the business for his own benefit. I do not think that the question whether the appellant is carrying on the business or profession can depend on whether he is paid by salary or by a certain share of the profits. It is true that in Allen v. Taylor, where there was a contract not to carry on the trade of a rag dealer, it was held that merely acting as clerk or assistant to a person carrying on that trade was not a breach of the covenant. But an agreement not to carry on a trade is a very different thing from an agreement not to carry on a business or profession. "Carrying on a trade" implies, to my mind, that the person engaged in it is engaged in it quâ trade—that is to say, as a trade producing profit or loss which is to be shared by him, and that is not the case if he is merely a salaried assistant. I cannot come to the conclusion that a man is less carrying on the profession of a surgeon because he is doing so as assistant to someone else. "Profession" is different from trade, and it is much more emphatic, to my mind, than if "business" alone were here. When, as here, the words "carry on the business or profession of a surgeon" are merely used to denote what is done by a man acting as a surgeon, a man, in my opinion, acts as surgeon and carries on the business of a surgeon none the less because he is not the principal, or engaged in the business as a partner, but is merely carrying it on as assistant to somebody else. In my opinion, therefore, on both points the appeal fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is how to construe this argument, or rather, perhaps, how to treat the short recital of it contained in the bond, and to see whether we are to draw the inference from that recital that the contract between Hall and Palmer on the one side, and Mallet on the other, was a joint contract or a joint and several contract. The rule has been expressed by Cotton, L.J., that, where the words are capable of either construction, you must look at the general tenour and context to see whether the contract was joint or joint and several. The whole of the cases connected with that point will be found, I think, collected in Wms. Saunders (vol. 1, p. 162), in the recent edition, and Sorsbie v. Park and Bradburne v. Botfield, 14 M. & W. 559, are leading authorities upon it. That being so, we must look at this bond as a business document, and see if we can extract from it anything that throws light on the terms upon which Mallet was taken into the employment of the firm. It seems to me, when you look at the whole of it, you see that Hall and Palmer were carrying on business in partnership. Nothing is said, it is true, about the way in which the partnership was to come to an end, nor was it necessary to do so. It is obvious that a partnership cannot last for ever. There is no certainty that it will not be determined, either on notice or otherwise, even during the lifetime of both partners. Now unless, after such determination, each partner was to have a several interest in the performance of this contract by Mallet, he would be at liberty to set up practice at Newtown, with the experience gained in their service, and to the injury either of Mr. Hall or Mr. Palmer, or both, according as either or both remained in Newtown. That shows, in fact, that there must have been separate interests, as well as a joint interest, in these two persons; and, though the interest in the bond would be joint so long as they continued in partnership, nevertheless, there was the possibility that it might be severed, and we should expect to find the protection to be commensurate with the interests which were reasonably to be inferred from the description of their business. Therefore, I think the true construction of this agreement is that either Mr. Palmer or Mr. Hall might enforce it for his own benefit during his lifetime, in the event of the partnership having come to an end.

The next question is, Has there been a breach? That seems also a rather difficult question. To answer it we must inquire what is the meaning of "set up or carry on the business or profession of a surgeon." We have in the bond a clause which throws a great deal of light on it. I do not say that it is an interpretation clause, because I do not think that the language of the original agreement is strictly to be construed by what you find in the condition; but if the condition shows that the persons who drew the bond included in their own minds under the words "setting up and carrying on the business or profession of a surgeon," the setting up in business as the assistant of somebody, that, I think, is an indication that in the original agreement carrying on the business or profession of a surgeon was intended to include acting as an assistant to a surgeon. That, I think, is the answer to Mr. Yate-Lee's argument founded on the word "other." It does not follow that because the words "assistant to any other person or persons or otherwise howsoever" in the condition would not cover any particular case, therefore that case would not fall within the original agreement. I think that, according to the true construction of the earlier clause, a person is not the less carrying on a profession because he acts as an assistant of someone carrying it on. For these reasons I agree with what Cotton, L.J., has said, and, although I express my own opinion, I do not in any way dissent from anything he has said.

FRY, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as my learned brethren, and I will add very little. The grounds of my conclusion are the same as theirs, with possibly a slight exception. I am rather more inclined to think that there is only one agreement to be found in the whole of this document—that is to say, I incline to think that the agreement which is implied in the condition is the same as that which is referred to in the recital, and that, therefore, the recited agreement is to be treated as that which is written out more fully in the condition. This difference of opinion is immaterial, and probably the view taken by the Lords Justices is the more accurate one.

Will — Construction — Absolute interest — Restricting devise—Repugnant condition—Gift over on bankruptcy.

Testatrix devised and appointed real and personal estate upon trust for J. B., his heirs and assigns, and directed that, in the event of his doing or suffering any thing whereby he should be deprived of the beneficial enjoyment thereof, then the trust for his benefit should determine, and the property should go and be held in trust for his wife.

Held, that the events upon which the executory devise was to take effect were (1) alienation, (2) bankruptcy, judgment and execution; that the first was void, and therefore void; that the second was an attempt to avoid the operation of the bankruptcy laws, and was void; and that J. B. was absolutely entitled.

Adjourned summons.

By the will of Elizabeth Dugdale, dated in 1868, she disposed of certain real and personal property by devising and appointing it "upon trust for my son, James Boardman, his heirs and assigns, but if the said son, James Boardman, should do, execute, commit or suffer any act, deed, or thing whatsoever, whereby or by reason, or in consequence whereof, or in the operation of law he would be deprived of the personal beneficial enjoyment of the said premises in his lifetime, then and in such case the trust herein contained for the benefit of my said son, James Boardman, shall absolutely cease and determine, and the estates, hereditaments, money, and premises hereby before limited in trust for him, and also any and every other share of property, real and personal, which may survive or accrue to him under the trusts of this will will, and whereof by reason or in consequence of any act, deed, or thing as aforesaid, or by operation of law, he would be deprived in his lifetime of the personal beneficial enjoyment shall go and be held in trust for" his wife, or, if no wife then living, for his children equally, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and if there should not be any wife or child living, then during so much of his life as there should be a want of any such wife or child, the rents and income should be accumulated for the benefit of any future wife or children, and so much as could not legally be accumulated should be paid to the persons who under the trust thereinafter declared would be entitled thereto if James Boardman was not living, "And if he shall die without leaving any issue of his body him surviving, the estates . . . shall go and be held in trust for" such of the testatrix's other issue as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default in trust for her other children equally, their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns; and she declared that each of her sons should, during the continuance of the trust thereinbefore contained, for his benefit respectively, have the letting and full management of the hereditaments limited in trust for him without the intervention of the trustees.

The will had previously contained similar provisions for two other sons, Thomas and Adam.

James Boardman Dugdale was unmarried, and he claimed this property absolutely upon the ground that the executory devise was repugnant and void.

Farwell, for the summons.—The restraint on alienation is void, and the gift over, with all the subsequent limitations, fails. It is impossible to sever the different portions of the clause, and together they cover every form of alienation: Bradley v. Peixoto, 3 Ves. 324, Tud. L. C. Conv., 3rd ed., p. 972; In re Machu, 30 W. R. 887, 21 Ch. D. 838; In re Ross, Hicks v. Ross, 32 Solicitors' Journal, 289; Holmes v. Godson, 4 W. R. 415, 8 De G. A. J. Chitty, for the respondents.—The restraint on alienation is only partial—during his lifetime—and it is not void: In re Macleay, 23 W. R. 718, L. R. 20 Eq. 186; In re Rosher, 32 W. R. 821, 26 Ch. D. 801.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Kay, J., stated the facts as above, and continued:—There is no doubt that a condition against alienation is void: Co. Litt. 223*a*.

The difference between a condition properly so called and a conditional limitation or an executory devise is, that in the case of a condition the estate is to revert to the grantor or his heirs; in the other cases it is limited over to other persons. But even in the case of a condition the power of alienation may be restricted, though it cannot be entirely taken away. For example, a condition not to alien "to such a one, naming his name, or to any of his heirs, or of the issues of such a one, &c., or the like, which conditions do not take away all power of alienation from the feoffee, &c., then such condition is void": Litt. s. 361.

It has been said that a total restriction of alienation for a limited time may be good. During the argument in Churchill v. Marks an eminent conveyancer, in answer to a question put to him by the court, stated his opinion to be that a gift to A. in fee, with a proviso that if A. aliens in B.'s lifetime the estate shall shift to B., is valid.

Such a limitation might not deprive A. altogether of the power of alienation, because he might outlive B., and after B.'s death his power of alienation would not be interfered with. But it is to be observed that there is no decision to this effect, and the late Mr. Waley, in a note, p. 111 of the 3rd volume of Davidson's Conveyancing, 3rd ed., to which my attention has been called, states his opinion that this doctrine is doubtful.

In In re Macleay there was a devise of real estate to one in fee, "on the condition that he never sells it out of the family." This was held to be a good condition by Jessel, M.R., it being a limited restriction on alienation.

The decision was dissented from by the late Mr. Justice Pearson in Rosher v. Rosher, where the devise was to the testator's son in fee, with a proviso that if the son, his heirs or devisees, should desire to sell the same or any part thereof in the lifetime of the testator's wife, she should have the option to purchase at £3,000 for the whole and a proportionate price for any part. £3,000 was much less than the value of the estate, and this, although restricted to the life of the testator's widow, was held to be void.

It is clearly settled that a gift over upon an attempt to alien an absolute interest previously given is as void as a condition. This is shown by the cases of Bradley v. Peixoto; Ross v. Ross, 1 Jac. & W. 154; Holmes v. Godson, in which Turner, L.J., stated that the law is the same both as to gifts of real and personal estate; and Shaw v. Ford, 26 W. R. 235, 7 Ch. D. 669.

In Fearne's Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., pp. 12, 15, the difference between a conditional limitation or executory devise and a contingent remainder is discussed, the illustrations given being that a limitation to the use of A. and his heirs till C. returns from Rome, and after the return of C. to the use of B. in fee, is in a deed a conditional limitation, in a will an executory devise. But a limitation to the use of A. until C. returns from Rome, and after the return of C. to the use of B. in fee, is a contingent remainder to B., the whole fee not being limited to the use of A., as in the former case, but only a particular estate to endure till the return of C., which, being an uncertain period, such particular estate is a freehold, and consequently the limitation to B. and his heirs is a contingent remainder.

At p. 15 of Fearne's Contingent Remainders it is said that limitations defeating a portion of an estate previously given "are properly termed conditional limitations to distinguish them, on the one hand, from conditions of which only the grantor or his heirs can take advantage, and, on the other, from remainders in the strict and proper sense of the word as above defined, and though these conditional limitations are not valid in conveyances and common law, yet within certain limits they are good in wills and conveyances to uses."

In accordance with the doctrine as thus stated by Fearne, there are a series of decisions, of which Brandon v. Robinson; Webb v. Grace, 2 Ph. 701; Rochford v. Hackman; and Joel v. Mills are examples, which decide that, if real or personal estate be given to A. for life with remainder to B. absolutely, with a proviso that if A. should attempt to assign his life estate should cease, such a proviso is read as a limitation to A. during his life, or until he should attempt to assign, and upon that event, or after his death, over, and such a limitation is held to be valid.

The result is that a limitation by way of use or in a will to A. until he attempt to alien, and on that event to B. and his heirs, is valid, A. taking an estate of freehold which only endures by the terms of the limitation until the attempted alienation, and B. taking a contingent remainder. But a limitation to A. "and his heirs," but if he attempt to alien to B. in fee, is an invalid gift over; so also where the limitation is to A. "and his heirs" until he attempts to alien, and thereupon to B. and his heirs. This is as clearly a conditional limitation as the other, because a fee simple endures for ever, and any attempt to cut it down must be a defeasance.

The general law is, that a defeasance either by condition or by conditional limitation or executory devise cannot be well limited to take effect in derogation, not merely of the right of alienation, but of any of the natural incidents of the estate which it is intended to divest. Instances of this are given in Sir Anthony Mildmay's case, 6 Co. Rep. 40a, where the law is stated thus: "If a man makes gift in tail on conditions that the donee shall not commit waste, or that his wife shall not be endowed, or that the husband of a woman tenant in tail after issue shall not be tenant by the curtesy, or that tenant in tail shall not suffer a common recovery—these conditions are repugnant and against law, because by the gift in tail he tacitly enables him to commit waste, that his wife shall be endowed, and to suffer a common recovery, and therefore it is repugnant to restrain him by condition, for that would be to give a power and to restrain the same power in one and the same deed." As I have shown, a conditional limitation or executory devise is subject to the same rule.

The events upon which the executory devise in this case is to take effect seem to be—(1) alienation; (2) bankruptcy or judgment and execution. The alienation contemplated is any alienation whatever by the devisee not limited in any way. This is clearly invalid. With respect to the other event, bankruptcy or judgment and execution effect an involuntary alienation. Can a fee simple estate be divested by an executory devise on that event? The liability of the estate to be attached by creditors on a bankruptcy or judgment is an incident of the estate, and no attempt to deprive it of that incident by direct prohibition would be valid. If a testator, after giving an estate in fee simple to A., were to declare that such estate should not be subject to the bankruptcy laws, that would clearly be inoperative. I apprehend that this is the test. An incident of the estate given which cannot be directly taken away or prevented by the donor cannot be taken away indirectly by a condition which would cause the estate to revert to the donor or by a conditional limitation or executory devise which would cause it to shift to another person. This agrees with the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Machu. The words "conditional limitation" seemed to be used in that case, not in the sense in which Fearne and Butler employ them, but rather to describe an estate upon which a contingent remainder might be limited. According to the illustration which I have given from the definition by Fearne, the limitation in In re Machu would be in a deed a conditional limitation defeating a fee simple and in a will an executory devise.

I am of opinion, for the foregoing reasons, that the executory devise in this case is invalid as repugnant.

It was attempted to distinguish one portion of it—namely, that which begins with the words, "and if he shall die without leaving issue of his body him surviving," and it was argued that this gift over must be valid. But I am of opinion that this is only a portion of the limitations which are intended to take effect upon the forfeiture by alienation or bankruptcy, &c., and not otherwise.

The original devise is in trust for the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns. The intention to defeat this must be as clearly expressed as the gift, and if the last point were more doubtful than I think it, the plaintiff ought to have the benefit of the doubt.

It is consistent with the practice of the court as recognized in Lady Langdale v. Briggs, 4 W. R. 144, 703, 8 De G. M. & G. 391, that the plaintiff should have a declaration as to the nature of his interest and the validity of the gift over.

I must declare that he is entitled to an equitable estate in fee simple in the real property, and an absolute interest in the personalty given to him, and that the attempted executory gift over is void.

Topham v. Greenside Glazed Fire Brick Co. (a.)

Bill of sale—Registration—Fixtures—Trade machinery—Personal chattels—Debenture—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, ss. 4, 5, 8—Bills of Sale Act, 1882, s. 17.

The effect of section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, is to prevent the articles which by it are excluded from the definition of "trade machinery" from being "personal chattels" for any of the purposes of the Act. Consequently a mortgage of them does not require registration.

A coal and brickmaking company deposited their title deeds to certain beds of coal and fireclay with their bankers, together with a memorandum, which stated that the deposit was made to secure to the bankers "payment of all sums of money which we are now, or at any time hereafter may be, indebted to you, whether on current account for principal, interest, commission, and charges, or on any other account whatsoever." The memorandum contained an agreement to execute a legal mortgage of the property when required, but it did not contain any acknowledgment of a debt, or any covenant or agreement by the company for payment.

Semble, that the memorandum was not a "debenture" within the meaning of section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Interpleader summons.

This was an interpleader summons by the sheriff of Yorkshire to determine whether the plaintiffs, who were judgment creditors of the defendant company, were entitled to some trade machinery of the defendants which the sheriff had seized under a fi. fa. issued by the plaintiffs upon their judgment. The machinery was claimed by the Yorkshire Banking Co. by virtue of an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds from the defendant company.

By an agreement dated the 30th of June, 1882, Joseph Illingworth, the then lord of the manor of Pudsey, in the county of York, agreed to sell to W. R. Tattersall all the coal and fireclay in the manor belonging to him, with the right to work the same, and it was provided that Tattersall should and would in the working and getting of the coal and fireclay observe and perform all and every the provisions contained in the Pudsey Inclosure Act (51 Geo. 3, c. 128), and which on the part of the lord of the manor were to be observed and performed and keep Illingworth indemnified therefrom. By an agreement dated the 1st of August, 1883, Tattersall agreed to sell his interest in the coal and fireclay to James Gray and Henry Horne. By an agreement dated the 15th of October, 1884, Gray and Horne agreed to sell their interest in the coal and fireclay to the defendant company.

The defendant company was incorporated in November, 1884, one of its objects set forth in the memorandum of association being "to acquire and continue the business of brick-makers, colliery proprietors, and dealers in coal, ironstone, clay, and other minerals carried on by Gray and Horne." The surface of the land under which the coal and fireclay lay belonged to one

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thornton, the company having the right to use it for the purpose of working the coal and fireclay. The coal and fireclay were situate at some depth below the surface, so that between them and the surface there was interposed a stratum of earth which did not belong to the company. Shortly after its incorporation the company took possession of portions of the surface, and erected thereon for the purposes of their business a fixed steam-engine, with main shafting and gearing, a fixed boiler with mountings, a fixed donkey-engine, with fixed pump and well cover, a fixed weighing-machine, and certain steam piping with the fittings thereof in the drying shed. All these articles were fixed to the surface of the land. After these articles had been erected the defendant company deposited their title deeds to the coal and fireclay—viz., a copy of the Pudsey Inclosure Act, and copies of the agreements of June and August, 1883, and October, 1884, with their bankers, the Yorkshire Banking Co. The deposit was accompanied by a memorandum addressed to the banking company, dated the 3rd of December, 1885, whereby it was stated that the deeds were deposited "for the purpose of securing to you payment of all sums of money in which we are now, or at any time hereafter may be, indebted to you, whether on current account for principal, interest, and commission, and charges, or on any other account whatsoever. And in consideration of the advances now made to us, and of our account being continued, we hereby undertake to execute, when thereunto requested, a proper mortgage, with immediate power of sale, or such further security as may be necessary for the purpose of effectually transferring to any person or persons whom you may designate for that purpose the legal estate in the property to which this security relates." This memorandum did not contain any acknowledgment of a debt, or any covenant or agreement by the company to pay, except so far as the agreement to give a legal mortgage implied such a covenant. It was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

On the 16th of August, 1887, the plaintiffs obtained judgment against the defendant company for £329 3s. 4d. and costs, and they issued execution thereon. Under this execution the sheriff seized the above-mentioned machinery.

The banking company claimed the machinery under their equitable mortgage, there being a considerable sum due to them under it.

Geo. Henderson, for the sheriff.

Ashton Cross, for the bank.—By virtue of their equitable mortgage, the bank are entitled to the machinery: Meux v. Jacobs, 23 W. R. 526, L. R. 7 H. L. 481. The question is whether there is anything in the Bills of Sale Acts to interfere with their rights. The articles in question are clearly within that class of machinery which by section 5 of the Act of 1878 is excluded from the definition of "trade machinery" in that section; they are not, therefore, "personal chattels" within the meaning of the Act, and, consequently, a mortgage of them does not require registration. Another question that arises is whether the equitable mortgage is not really "a debenture" within the meaning of section 17 of the Act of 1882, and, therefore, excepted from the Act of 1878. I submit that it is. It contains an admission of indebtedness by the company to the bank, and gives the bank a charge on the company's property: Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215; Levy v. Walker, Morris Slate and Slab Co., ante, p. 411, 37 Ch. D. 26.

Tindal Atkinson, for the execution creditors.—The machinery in question is within the definition of "personal chattels" contained in section 4 of the Act of 1878; and a mortgage of it, therefore, requires registration. A "fixture" is something affixed to the soil, and which passes with the freehold. These articles are mere "personal chattels" like loose tools, and the owner of land would be entitled to have them removed if the company were to cease working the clay: Wake v. Hall, 31 W. R. 585, 8 App. Cas. 195. The memorandum of deposit was not intended to be a "debenture." It contained no agreement or undertaking to pay any money. In Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. there was a covenant to pay on a day certain, and also a charge on the property.

Ashton Cross replied.

Dec. 12.—North, J.—In this case the real questions to be decided turn upon the construction of some of the sections of the Bills of Sale Acts of 1878 and 1882. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:—] The machinery in question was erected by the company on the surface of the land, and it is admitted that the coal and fireclay, which was sold to the company, lie at some distance below the surface, and therefore they are separated, by other minerals belonging either to the lord or to someone else, from the surface, which belongs to Thornton. As I read section 35 of the Inclosure Act, the right to use the surface and the right to raise the minerals are totally different things, and there is nothing in the Act which limits the lord's power of using the surface lying immediately over the mines and minerals which are being worked. If fireclay or coal cropped up on the side of a hill it might be more convenient for the purpose of working it to make a shaft or level horizontally or to sink it at an angle perpendicularly. Section 35 would, I think, enable the lord to use the surface even though it did not lie immediately over the mine and minerals which were being got. But in the present case the part of the surface which is used is that of land belonging to Thornton, lying at some distance above, but immediately above, the coal or fireclay which is being got.

The bank claim the machinery in question as having been put up on their land, and their claim is rested upon the case of Meux v. Jacobs. I should have thought that it was deserving of fuller argument whether and how far the case applies to fixtures which are not annexed to the land worked, but are upon another tenement not belonging to the same owner, and not even abutting on the mortgaged land. But Mr. Atkinson directed his argument to the point that the security of the bank is void by reason of the Bills of Sale Acts. Paragraph 4 of the admissions agreed upon by the parties, after referring to the memorandum of deposit, states that, "The bank claims that by virtue of the deposit of the documents mentioned in the schedule thereto, it was thenceforward entitled in equity to all the property of the company, including the fixtures hereinbefore mentioned, and could demand a legal assurance thereof at any time, but the execution creditors contend that the memorandum, even if binding on the company, which is not admitted, confers no title on the bank as against the execution creditors, and, further, that such fixtures and machinery are removable and liable to execution as chattels." It is admitted that the equitable security of the bank has not been registered under the Bills of Sale Acts. But the bank say that registration of their security is not necessary, and the argument was put on two different grounds. I will deal first with the contention that this memorandum is a debenture, and is, therefore, excepted from the operation of the Bills of Sale Act. That depends upon section 17 of the Act of 1882.

And the question arises, what is a debenture? It was held by Chitty, J., in Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. that a memorandum of agreement which contained a covenant by a company to pay to each of nine persons who were mentioned in the agreement as lenders the sum of money set opposite his name, and to pay them pari passu, and which charged all the property of the company as security for the payment thereof, was a debenture. I feel some little difficulty in following that decision entirely for this reason, it has been held by Field, J., in chambers in Brocklehurst v. Railway Printing and Publishing Co., W. N. (1884), p. 70, and by the Court of Appeal in Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43, that the covering deed which usually accompanies the giving of debentures when due is not a "debenture" within section 17, and requires registration under the Bills of Sale Acts if it deals with personal chattels, and is void if not registered. I feel a difficulty in seeing how, if a covering deed is not a debenture, an agreement which contains substantially the material parts of a covering deed—viz., the agreement to pay the several persons named pari passu—and the charging of the debts upon the property of the company, can be a debenture. Another difficulty arises in this way. In Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co. it was treated by the Court of Appeal as at least an open question whether an instrument which charged specific property of the company as distinguished from a general charge on all its property could be a debenture. In the present case, the property charged is very specific; it consists of the company's interests in certain lands, and the agreement does not charge any chattels at all, except so far as the mortgage of the lands affects the chattels which are affixed to it. I feel this further difficulty as regards section 17. That section says that "nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company." Why are "mortgage" and "loan" companies mentioned. It is difficult to see why these companies should be mentioned specifically if the words "other incorporated companies" are meant to include every company whatsoever and if the debentures of every company were to be free from the restrictions of the Act. It was thrown out by Grove, J., in Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., 35 W. R. 834, 19 Q. B. D. 568, that the words "other incorporated company" would mean any incorporated company ejusdem generis with mortgage and loan companies. I have great difficulty in conceiving of a company ejusdem generis with mortgage and loan companies. By a loan company I understand a company whose personal business, or one of whose chief businesses, is to lend money on loan, and I suppose a mortgage company is a company whose business is to lend money on mortgage, but what other companies are companies ejusdem generis with companies which lend money on mortgage or otherwise I do not know, nor can I see upon what ground a company which lends money should have a greater immunity as regards its powers of borrowing money and giving security for the money borrowed than any other incorporated company. Moreover, according to the views expressed by Chitty, J., in Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., the word "debenture" has no precise legal definition, but it always imports an acknowledgment of a debt, and generally, if not always, a covenant or an agreement to pay.

In the present case I do not find that the memorandum contains any acknowledgment of a debt. It is quite true that the memorandum was given for the purpose of securing the then present advance of the bank to the company and any other sums which might become due from the company to the bank, but there is no reference to any specific sum. One does not know what was the exact amount due to the bank at the moment at which the document was executed, and from that time forward the sum secured would no doubt vary from day to day, for it is a security for the balance of the current account to a limited amount, having regard to the stamp placed upon the document. Nor do I find in the document any agreement by the company to pay. It is quite true that there is an agreement to give a legal mortgage when requested, and a legal mortgage would no doubt contain a covenant by the company to pay the debt, but that is very indirect, and I do not find that the document itself contains any other agreement whatever to pay the debt. Its object was not to give a security by way of any agreement or covenant to pay, but to give a charge upon certain property of the company.

Having regard to all these considerations, I feel it impossible at present to hold that a mere memorandum in writing by a coal and fireclay and brick-making company of a deposit with their bankers of all the documents of title relating to certain beds of coal and fireclay as a security for the balance which they might then or thereafter owe to their bankers on their current account, but which does not admit any specific debt or contain any agreement to pay otherwise than by an agreement to execute a legal mortgage, comes within the exception contained in section 17 of the Act.

The next question is whether this memorandum required registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, and that depends upon whether it is a bill of sale of "personal chattels" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1878. Looking at the definition contained in that section, this memorandum is, beyond all question, a bill of sale if it relates to personal chattels as defined by the section. The definition may be said to divide fixtures roughly into fixtures separately assigned (and what a "separate assignment" means is shown by section 7 of the Act), and fixtures which are not separately assigned. That is not a complete division, because, curiously enough, "fixtures" are only excepted from the expression "personal chattels" when assigned together with a freehold or leasehold interest in any land or building to which they are affixed, and there might be fixtures assigned together with an interest in a copyhold land. But, leaving that out of consideration, I think one may treat the definition as roughly dividing fixtures into two classes—those separately assigned and those assigned together with the land or building to which they are affixed. In the former case they are "personal chattels," in the latter they are not. But then there is a further exception, because the proviso is that personal chattels shall not include fixtures when assigned together with a freehold or leasehold interest in land except trade machinery as hereinafter defined.

Then we must turn to section 5 to see what is meant by trade machinery. That section begins by saying "trade machinery shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be personal chattels." Therefore, looking at those words alone, all trade machinery is mentioned in the expression "personal chattels." Then section 5 goes on: "For the purposes of the Act trade machinery means the machinery used in or attached to any factory or workshop"; and it is clear, from the subsequent definition of the words "factory and workshop," that the machinery which the sheriff has seized is machinery of that kind. It is used in a place where bricks are made and incidentally to the making of bricks and adapted to the clay for sale. But then follows this exception—"exclusive of"—to put it shortly—"fixed motive powers," "fixed power machinery," and "steam, gas and water pipes." It is admitted that all the articles about which the present question arises come within the description of trade machinery which is excluded from the operation of the section which makes all "trade machinery" "personal chattels." But it is agreed that the "trade machinery" thus excluded is merely "trade machinery" as, but for the exclusion, would come within the description contained in section 4 of "fixtures not separately assigned," and, therefore, it has no application to a case where, as here, the machinery is not affixed to the freehold interest, and does not come within the description of fixtures assigned together with a freehold interest in land to which they are mind. There are, however, some other words in section 5, which I have not yet read, which seem to me conclusive upon the point. I mean these words: "The machinery or effects excluded by this section from the definition of trade machinery shall not be deemed to be personal chattels within the meaning of this Act." Those words seem to me to be clear and definite, and I must hold that the articles in question, being all machinery or effects excluded by the section from the definition of "trade machinery," are not "personal chattels" within the meaning of the Act for any purpose whatever, and, therefore, any document, whatever it may be, which assigns them is not an assurance of "personal chattels" within the meaning of the Act. I hold, therefore, that this memorandum of deposit, not being an assurance of "personal chattels" within the meaning of the Act, did not require registration.

The result is that the claim of the bank succeeds, and the execution creditors cannot have these articles.

Firth v. North-Eastern Railway Co. (a.)

Railway company — Carrier — Passengers' luggage— Delivery to passenger—Termination of company's risk —Loss of luggage—Measure of a "reasonable time."

It is the duty of a railway company, with regard to the luggage of a passenger which travels by the same train with him, but not under his control, when it has reached its destination, to have it ready for delivery upon the platform at the usual place of delivery until the owner, in the exercise of due diligence, can receive it; but the liability of the company as carriers will cease after a reasonable time has been allowed to the owner to do so.

Appeal, by motion, that the judgment of the county court judge of Yorkshire, delivered at a court holden at Leeds, be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff was travelling by the North-Eastern Railway from Hull to Leeds, and saw his portmanteau placed in the van of the train at the former station. On arrival at Leeds he could not get a railway porter. He saw a portmanteau on the platform which he thought was his own. He placed it in a carriage, and drove with it about a mile to his house. On arrival he found that it was not his portmanteau. He immediately drove back to the station. The portmanteau was not there, and has not since been found. A label was tied to its handle, but there were a number of foreign labels on its sides. The portmanteau which the plaintiff took away in mistake for his own also had a label tied to the handle, with the name of a Mr. Marsland on it.

This gentleman alighted at Leeds also. He missed his own portmanteau, but saw another of similar size to it and very like it. He saw this portmanteau about four or five minutes after the arrival of the train, and after the vans had been cleared, it was then close to the cloak luggage office. The train had stopped four times between Hull and Leeds, but it would not have been possible to get luggage out of the van before reaching Leeds.

The county court judge found a verdict for plaintiff for £12, and gave leave to the defendants to appeal. The plaintiff then offered to give up the verdict and costs rather than contest an appeal.

The defendants appealed.

Mesey-Thompson, for the defendants, cited Patscheider v. Great Western Railway, 26 W. R. 268, 3 Ex. D. 153, and Bunch v. Great Western Railway, 34 W. R. 574, 17 Q. B. D. 215.

Morten, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge was of opinion that the portmanteau of the plaintiff was stolen before the expiration of a reasonable time for the plaintiff to claim his property. The ticket of the plaintiff was issued under the conditions contained in the time tables of the defendants, that unclaimed luggage would be deposited in the lost luggage office until claimed [A. L. Smith, J.—What if a wrong person claim it?] The portmanteau of the plaintiff was probably stolen before he took away the wrong one. There is no evidence that the unclaimed portmanteau seen by Mr. Marsland was the portmanteau of the plaintiff. We must consider what is "reasonable time" within which a passenger should claim his luggage.

He cited Chapman v. London and North-Western Railway, 28 W. R. 566, 5 Q. B. D. 278.

Mesey-Thompson, in reply.

Mathew, J.—This appeal must be allowed, on the ground that there was no evidence upon which the learned county court judge could have held that the portmanteau was stolen before the expiration of a reasonable time within which the plaintiff should have applied for its delivery.

The question here is whether the common law liability of the defendants was still in existence at the time when this portmanteau was stolen. That obligation is to deliver the property to the real owner, within a reasonable time after the arrival of the property at its destination. When that reasonable time has expired they may, if the property be still in their possession, be liable as warehousemen, but they are no longer liable as common carriers. What is the measure of "a reasonable time"? If we measure a reasonable time here, with reference to the conduct of the plaintiff himself, that time has expired, because he had gone away and had come back again and claimed what he thought was his portmanteau. If we measure the time by the time which Mr. Marsland took to take delivery, the reasonable time had expired, because when Mr. Marsland had gone I do not see what evidence there is to show that Mr. Firth's portmanteau was not lying there ready to be delivered to him. Mr. Marsland puts the time at three or four minutes afterwards when he saw the portmanteau ready, lying there to be delivered to Mr. Firth.

What is the strong presumption under these circumstances? Why, that probably somebody who saw Mr. Marsland come forward and disclaim this portmanteau as not being his, came forward, claimed it, and made off with it. It would be most unreasonable, under those circumstances, to put the loss on the company. It was the fault of the owner himself in leaving his property as he did, and exposing it to the very risk which happened to it.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned county court judge was wrong, and that judgment must be entered for the company.

A. L. Smith, J.—I think so too. Mr. Firth sues the company under their common law obligation as common carriers. He does not sue them as warehousemen, and for a very good reason—viz., there is no evidence of omission by them to do that which was reasonable in that capacity. He sues, therefore, upon the common carriers' liability—that is, to safely carry, convey, and deliver to the true owner within a reasonable time.

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker, Barrister-at-Law.

I cannot do better, upon this part of the case, than read, as Cleasby, B., did in the case of Patscheider v. Great Western Railway Co., the extract from the American work, Redfield on Carriers:—"It is the duty of a railway company, in regard to the baggage of a passenger which has reached its destination, to have the baggage ready for delivery upon the platform at the usual place of delivery until the owner, in the exercise of due diligence, can call and receive it, and it is the owner's duty to call for and remove it within a reasonable time." Cleasby, B., reads that passage with approval; I do the same. It is entirely consonant with what I think to be the law, and I apply that as the law here. The learned county court judge has found for Mr. Firth, because he came to the conclusion, upon the evidence, that the portmanteau was stolen before a reasonable time had elapsed; that, in other words, to put it in the terms of his own judgment, the portmanteau of Mr. Firth was stolen before he took away the wrong one. Now, if there had been any evidence of that, we could not have held that we ought to set aside the judgment of the learned judge, for this reason, that he would have held, and properly have held, that before the transit had come to an end—not only with regard to the carrying, but as regards the delivery, during which period the company were undoubtedly common carriers—the portmanteau was missing for some reason or other, and therefore they had not fulfilled their obligation as common carriers to deliver. But how is that? How does the evidence stand upon the question of the owner coming with due diligence to call for his property within a reasonable time? First of all, Mr. Firth, after first going away, returns and removes his own portmanteau and another which he thinks to be his. That would be, per se, some evidence of what Mr. Firth himself must consider to have been a reasonable time to get his portmanteau. But, assuming that he had as long a time as Mr. Marsland took, who was apparently not such an expeditious passenger, and that he had come for it five minutes afterwards. What then? The sole evidence which is given in this case is that Mr. Firth's portmanteau was there when Mr. Marsland came and was looking for his, which had been taken away. The evidence is all one way upon this, being that when Mr. Marsland was looking for his portmanteau and could not find it (for the best of all reasons, because Mr. Firth had taken it away and was in the cab with it), he sees Mr. Firth's portmanteau upon the platform; and that is five minutes after the first delivery.

The evidence is that Mr. Firth's portmanteau was then upon the platform ready for delivery.

Under those circumstances, that being the evidence, how can it be said that the duty of the railway company as common carriers extended at any rate longer than when Mr. Marsland could have got the luggage, if that had been what he wanted? It seems to me it did not. And the learned county court judge himself finds really that Mr. Firth did not apply for his own portmanteau within a reasonable time. It seems to me there is no evidence at all that that portmanteau was stolen or removed from the platform by anybody within the reasonable time which Mr. Firth had to take delivery of it; I think, therefore, that the judgment which is founded upon that presumption is wrong, and that the judgment ought to be entered for the defendants.

MATHEW, J.—As the plaintiff offered to yield to the defendants the verdict and costs which he had gained in the county court rather than contest this appeal, we think that there ought to be no costs against him now.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN GIFFORD AND THE BURY TOWN COUNCIL. (a.)

Arbitration—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 180—Invalid appointment of arbitrator—Award—Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 62, r. 15.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 180, requires that arbitrator appointed by the local authority to be under their common seal and the arbitrator appointed by the other party to be under his hand. The latter party to an arbitration under this statute having appointed his arbitrator, but not under his hand,

Held, that the appointment of the arbitrators, and the appointment of an umpire made by them, and the award of the umpire, were invalid, and neither the submission nor the award could be made a rule of court.

This was a motion to make a submission to arbitration, under the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 180, a rule of court, and also to make an award resulting from the arbitration a rule of court.

Horace Browne, for the applicant, cited Re Ralph, 26 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 165; In re Dawdy, 15 Q. B. D. 426, 34 W. R. Dig. 8; and Russell on Arbitration, 6th ed., p. 563.

Poyser, for the corporation.

The arguments of counsel and the facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

A. L. SMITH, J.—It appears that the corporation entered and laid drain pipes in the land of the applicant, who, being injuriously affected thereby, submitted his claims against the corporation to arbitration, under the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55). The statute enacts (section 180): "With respect to arbitrations under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed—that is to say, (1) Every appointment of an arbitrator under this Act, when made on behalf of the local authority, shall be under their common seal, and on behalf of any other party, under his hand." This means that, when a corporation appoints an arbitrator, they shall appoint by seal, and not otherwise; and that when the opposite party appoints an arbitrator, such party shall appoint under his hand, and not otherwise. I think that this provision is mandatory. Then it proceeds:—"(2) Every such appointment shall be delivered to the arbitrators, and shall be deemed a submission to arbitration by the parties making the same." Therefore, every appointment by a corporation is to be under seal, and every appointment by the other party is to be under his hand. In this case the corporation duly appointed their arbitrator, but the applicant, although he appointed an arbitrator also, did not do so under his hand. The arbitrators appointed an umpire, and, on failing to agree in the arbitration, referred the matter to him. He has awarded in favour of the applicant, who now asks that make the award a rule of court. But have the requirements of the above statute been complied with, and, in their absence, can a submission be made under the statute? I think not.

Again, by sub-section 7 of this section, "Where there is more than one arbitrator, the arbitrators shall, before they enter on the reference, appoint by writing under their hands an umpire." This cannot mean other than that where there is more than one arbitrator, the arbitrators—those appointed under the above sub-sections, under seal and under hand—shall, before they enter on the reference, appoint by writing under their hands an umpire.

In this case it is evident that there never was an appointment of two arbitrators pursuant to the statute; and if the two arbitrators are not appointed, how can they appoint an umpire in their turn under the statute? This is not an arbitration by consent, but one pursuant to the statute. One arbitrator has been lawfully appointed, and the other arbitrator has been unlawfully appointed, and they cannot appoint an umpire. The appointment of the umpire by them was not legal, because the provisions of the statute must be complied with as the basis of the appointment. Neither the original submission, nor the appointment of the umpire, which has been relied on as being a submission, can be made a rule of court. I should further point out that before the arbitrator enters on his duties he should make a statutory declaration, and the arbitrator appointed by the claimant did not do so. Again, sub-section 2 of this section shows what the submission is to be, and by sub-section 14 any submission "under the provisions of this Act" may be made a rule of court—that is, a joint appointment in full pursuance of this Act shall be made a rule of court. The application must be refused.

One word as to the award. It has been argued on behalf of the applicant that under ord. 61, r. 15, an award should be made a rule of court.

It is certainly possible within the wording of that order to make an award a rule of court, but in my experience I have never known an award made a rule of court, but only a submission. I find however that it was the old practice in Chancery to make an award a rule of court. In Jones v. Jones, 29 W. R. 65, 14 Ch. D. 593, at pp. 594-5, Jessel, M.R., said: "In cases of submission to arbitration it was very usual in the Court of Chancery to make the award an order of court. Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., p. 403, Consol. Ord. 23, r. 23. But as it is important that under the Judicature Acts the practice of all the courts should be as far as possible uniform, I have ruled in my court that the proper course is to make the submission a rule of court, according to the practice of the common law divisions." This course has always been adopted from that time, and if I am right in my opinion that the statute is binding on the arbitrators the award cannot be enforced, and it would be of no use to make it a rule of court in the present case.

Set-off—Action by agents—Counter-claim against principals—Set-off—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-section 3—Ord. 19, r. 3.

In an action of trover and for goods sold and delivered defendant cannot set off a claim for unliquidated damages which he has against a third party on another transaction, although the third party happens to be the plaintiff's principal.

This was an action brought to recover £821 0*s.* 5*d.*, the value of a cargo of timber.

The defendants, having received the bill of lading, promised to accept a bill for the price. Instead of accepting to the full amount they claimed to deduct a sum of £91 for damages due to them from one Jacobson, the plaintiffs' principal, on account of delay in the delivery of another cargo, and they offered the plaintiffs the sum of £729, which was refused, as the plaintiffs did not consider themselves entitled to bind their principal by a consent to the deduction upon a previous transaction. The plaintiffs then sued for the full amount, and the defendants counter-claimed for £91. Upon a summons before Pollock, B., at chambers, an order was made affirming the decision of the master to strike out the counter-claim.

The defendants appealed.

Lawson Walton, for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled to set off their claim for £91, although it is in the nature of a counter-claim. In Gathercole v. Smith, 29 W. R. 577, Bramwell, L.J., says:—"Looking at the language of section 24, sub-section 7, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the Legislature has made no distinction between a counter-claim and set-off. In ord. 19, r. 3, it is said that a defendant may 'set off' or 'set up' any right or claim; the words 'set up' and 'set off' are equivalent expressions." If the plaintiff were the trustee of a third person we could counter-claim against his cestui que trust, and the position here is the same. The counter-claim need not be in regard to the same transaction: Winterfield v. Bradnum, 26 W. R. 472. Brett, L.J., says:—"It seems to me that the counter-claim, as it at present exists, is of three kinds. Very often it is a set-off merely. Sometimes it is not, but it is a claim of some sort arising out of the same transaction. But there may now be a counter-claim in respect of a wholly different transaction." The only authority for the right to counter-claim against a cestui que trust when sued by a trustee is to be found in Macdonald v. Bode, W. N., 1876, p. 23. Lindley, L.J., there says: "Section 24, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1873 gives a wider power than that under ord. 16, rr. 17, 18," and so he gave the defendant leave to set up a counter-claim against the cestui que trust, who was alleged to be the real plaintiff. In Young v. Kitchin, 26 W. R. 403, 3 Ex. D. 12, it was held that the defendant, who was sued by the assignee of a debt, was entitled, by way of set-off or deduction from the plaintiff's claim, to the damages sustained by non-performance of contract by the plaintiffs' assignor. In Peat v. Jones & Co., 30 W. R. 433, 8 Q. B. D. 147, the defendants were allowed to set-off a claim for unliquidated damages against a trustee in bankruptcy. The defendant may not be entitled to judgment upon his counter-claim, but he is entitled to set it up as an answer to the action and to prevent the plaintiffs getting judgment. It is a matter to be considered in reference to the plaintiffs' claim, and the defendant need not have judgment at all, the decision of the master, therefore, was wrong.

Vaughan Williams, for the plaintiffs.—The authorities cited do not assist the defendant. They do not show that in an action of trover a counter-claim for damages could be allowed against a third person. All the cases cited lend themselves to a set-off. There is no ground for saying that in equity a counter-claim would be allowed under the circumstances. The debt, which but for the intervention of a trustee could be claimed by the defendant as a legal debt, is allowed to be pleaded as an equitable set-off: Cochrane v. Green, 9 W. R. 124, 9 C. B. N. S. 448.

Walton, in reply.—This is not really a case of trover, and there is nothing to take this out of the general rule. The substantial question is what judgment should be pronounced in the action? A set-off need not arise out of the same matter, for it is allowed in a case of specific performance.

Huddleston, B.—This is an appeal from a master in chambers, and has been referred by Pollock, B., to the court. The circumstances are these. The plaintiffs, who are timber merchants, send shipping documents to the defendants, and require payment for the goods. The defendants retain the documents, and counter-claim for £91 5s. damages in respect of a contract made in May with Jacobson, the plaintiffs' principal, which was admittedly another transaction. They deny the conditions on which they are alleged to have received the documents, and rely upon the previous transaction by way of defence. Such a defence is a novelty of a startling character. All the cases referred to are cases between the same parties on the same transactions. The case of Macdonald v. Bode, reported in the Weekly Notes, I cannot accept as an authority; but I am quite satisfied that in that case the counter-claim was on the same matter, and that Macdonald was a mere naked trustee—that is, a mere nominee; therefore, it is said the defendant ought to be allowed to have his set-off against the real plaintiff. To hold the contrary leads to absurdity. Suppose an action for specific performance against a sub-tenant, and the sub-tenant sets up a claim against the superior landlord for fraud. In this case judgment might be a return of the documents or 1s. damages, and then what could be the judgment on counter-claim? The counter-claim cannot be allowed. There is no authority for such a course.

MANISTY, J.—This is another attempt to mix up set-off and counter-claim. They are essentially distinct. This has been clearly shown in the case of Stooke v. Taylor, 29 W. R. 49, 5 Q. B. D. 569. Cockburn, C.J., says, on page 575: "Set-off and counter-claim may be, and commonly are, essentially different." Counter-claim is a counter-action, and is not a set-off at all. We are asked in this case to say that the defendants are to try an action against the principals of the plaintiffs upon a separate transaction in the absence of Jacobson & Co., the principals in question. Could anything be more unjust than that such should be done? The plaintiffs have nothing at all to do with it. It is perfectly clear that the plaintiffs are not suing as trustees for Jacobson. They are recovering what they have paid or covenanted to pay to their principals. Apart from that, this is the first attempt in an action of trover to treat a counter-claim against third parties as a set-off, and it cannot succeed. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Husband and wife—Agreement for separation—Action for arrears of maintenance by wife—Jurisdiction of county court—Parol agreement—Statute of Frauds, s. 4.

An action for arrears of maintenance payable under a parol agreement for separation made between husband and wife, in compromise of cross-summonses for assault, was brought by the wife in a county court. The county court judge gave judgment in favour of the claim.

Held, that the agreement had been made for good consideration; that, the consideration being executed, the Statute of Frauds did not apply; and that the county court judge had jurisdiction.

(a). Reported by A. H. TODD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from Judge Holt, county court judge of Northumberland.

The action was brought by a wife against her husband to recover £6, being arrears of maintenance payable by the husband under a parol agreement for a separation.

The county court judge held the agreement to be valid and gave judgment for the wife.

The husband appealed.

Walton, for the appellant.—A wife cannot enter into such a contract with her husband, certainly not apart from the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75). There is no consideration in the promise to live apart for the husband's promise to maintain. Thus a separation deed without trustees is void: Story's Equity, p. 1428; In re Shakespear, Deakin v. Lee, 33 W. R. 744, 30 Ch. D. 169; Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519. Again, the agreement is merely parol. The county court judge held that it was not within the Statute of Frauds, because it might have been performed within the year. But it is submitted that this agreement contemplates a continuance during life, and that brings it within the Statute of Frauds: Eley v. Positive Government Life Assurance Co., 25 W. R. 338, 1 Ex. D. 88; Davey v. Shannon, 17 W. R. 599, 4 Ex. D. 81. [STEPHEN, J.—Would this agreement be an answer to an action for the restitution of conjugal rights? McClymont, amicus curiæ, referred to Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. 605, 27 W. R. Dig. 91.] This was not an action for specific performance, but a proceeding on the common law side of the county court.

He also referred to Baker v. Baker, 11 W. R. 893; Butler v. Butler, 34 W. R. 132.

Sim, for the respondent.—In Palliser v. Gurney the action was against a married woman, and it was necessary to prove separate estate. In this case there was some evidence of the existence of separate estate. The wife had supported herself and children. The court in Besant v. Wood shows that a contract to live separately is good, and that trustees are not necessary. Manby v. Harris, 32 W. R. 941, 27 Ch. D. 166, shows that husband and wife are separate persons. As to the Statute of Frauds, Souch v. Strawbridge, 2 C. B. 815, is in his favour.

Walton, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

A. L. SMITH, J., on January 24, read the following judgment of the court:—

This is an action brought in the county court of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to recover £6, being arrears of maintenance contracted to be paid by a husband to his wife under the following circumstances:—The plaintiff and the defendant, before and at the time of the contract hereafter referred to, were and still are husband and wife. On several occasions prior to the month of June, 1886, the defendant's ill usage had compelled the plaintiff to apply to the police for protection against the defendant, her husband, and in the month of June, 1886, she was counselled to take out a summons against him for assault. The defendant, thereupon, took out a cross summons against the plaintiff on the 1st of July, 1886. When the summonses were about to come on for hearing at the police court, negotiations took place between the respective solicitors, and it was eventually agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant "that they should live separate and apart, that the defendant should pay the plaintiff £1 per week, and that she should therewith maintain herself and three children, that she should indemnify the husband against all debts contracted by her, and, further, that the summonses should be withdrawn." The above are the findings of the county court judge. He also found that nothing had occurred to rescind or affect the agreement, and, as we understand, that the plaintiff had done all things her part to entitle her to have it carried out and performed by the defendant. So matters stood when the present action was brought. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed. It was contended by Mr. Walton on his behalf that, notwithstanding the contract existing, as found by the judge, no action was maintainable by the wife against the husband thereupon, and, at any rate, in an ordinary action in the county court upon the agreement no relief could be given to the wife. It was argued as follows: It was said that, the husband and wife being one, no contract could be entered into between them, and consequently that the one could not sue the other upon an alleged breach of what could not exist. That it was impossible for parties, standing in the relation of husband and wife, to contract without the intervention of a trustee; that even if he was wrong in the above, the Statute of Frauds was an answer to the case, the contract being one not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof. The county court judge came to the conclusion that, by reason of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), the plaintiff was entitled to contract as she did with the defendant. It should be pointed out that he came to this conclusion before the case of Palliser v. Gurney was reported. We are unable to agree with the county court judge in holding that the Married Women's Property Act gave power to the wife to contract with her husband as she did in this case. It seems to us to be now too late to argue as it was argued before us—that a husband and wife, in consideration of not taking proceedings the one against the other for matrimonial offences, cannot contract to live separate or apart, and that the courts will not grant relief when such a contract is in fact made. In our judgment the law is that, when circumstances exist between husband and wife which would or which might give rise to proceedings by way of suit for matrimonial offences, it is competent, in consideration of the one not taking such proceedings against the other, for the two to agree to live separate and apart, and that the courts will enforce such a stipulation when made. In the case of Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, the House of Lords decided that a deed of separation between husband and wife was not against public policy, whatever might have been argued upon this point prior to that decision.

In Hunt v. Hunt, 10 W. R. 215, 4 De G. F. & J. 233, Lord Westbury, it would seem, thought that a husband and wife under the circumstances above mentioned could contract, and that such contract ought to be enforced. The President of the Probate Division (Sir J. Hannen) in Marshall v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 399, so held, and so also the late Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Besant v. Wood. It seems to us that the power of the husband and the wife to contract under the circumstances existing in the present case is settled by judicial authority, and the reasons for so holding are so cogently pointed out by Sir G. Jessel, in Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D., pp. 621, 622, that we do not extract or recapitulate them, but adopt hem in this judgment. It follows from the above that the point taken, that there is no trustee with whom the husband and wife may respectively contract, will not avail the defendant, and that the passage from Story's Equity Jurisprudence, p. 1428, and the decision of Lord Eldon in Legard v. Johnson, 3 Ves. 352, are not applicable to cases like the present. We wish also to point out that in Rowley v. Rowley, 35 L. J. P. & M. 110, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6, there was merely, as it appears, an agreement between husband and wife, who were then parties to divorce proceedings, to compromise the suit upon terms. The House of Lords held that this was a valid, binding agreement between the parties, and gave effect to its provisions. There was no trustee or anything of the sort in the case. If, then, an agreement between husband and wife to compromise a suit is valid and binding, why, we would ask, is not an agreement to live separate and apart, without bringing the suit, to be valid and binding, the consideration being the existence of facts which would give jurisdiction to the court? In our judgment it is. Such consideration existed in the present case—viz., a claim of cruelty against the husband.

As to the point taken, that this was an ordinary county court action and not a proceeding upon the equity side of the court, it should be noticed that the effect of sections 24 and 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and sections 89, 90, and 91 of the same Act are such as to give power to the county court to grant relief, even though the action in force is a common law action for debt, in as ample a manner as if it were an action in the superior court. Now as to the Statute of Frauds, various cases were cited in argument upon the one side and the other as to whether this agreement was or was not within the statute as being an agreement "which is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof," the county court judge held it to be not within the statute. But be this as it may, it seems to us that inasmuch as this is an action to recover six weeks' arrears of maintenance, the plaintiff is entitled to recover as money paid at defendant's request, the consideration being executed, and that this point was expressly decided in the plaintiff's favour in the case of Knowlman v. Bluett, 22 W. R. 77, 758, L. R. 9 Ex. 307, in the Exchequer Chamber, and is really indistinguishable from the present case.

For these reasons we give judgment for the respondent, with costs.

Halgate v. Brett. (a.)

Poor law—Audit of accounts—Neglect to attend—Liability for disobedience—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 96; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 33.

Mere neglect by overseers to attend an audit of parish accounts which has been duly notified by the auditor does not of itself constitute the offence of wilful disobedience under 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 96.

This was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application of the appellants.

At a court of summary jurisdiction held at Chelmsford on the 5th day of August, 1887, the appellants were charged by the respondent with "unlawfully and wilfully disobeying a certain order of the Local Government Board, dated the 14th of January, 1887, by not attending at the time and place appointed by the respondent, the auditor, for the audit of their accounts and the submission to such auditor of their books, vouchers, and other papers necessary for the passing of the accounts.

The appellants were churchwardens of the parish of Springfield and overseers of the poor. It was proved that notice of the audit was sent by post to the assistant overseer, who was also a defendant in the case, and that he received it. Public notice had also been given in the Essex Weekly News, the county paper circulating in the district. The appellants (the churchwardens) did not receive any notice, and were not aware of the intended audit.

It was contended before the magistrates that, a paid assistant overseer having been appointed to do the duties, the appellants were not overseers within the meaning of the poor law statutes, and that, not having actually received notice, they were not liable to conviction.

The magistrates held that the auditor had done all that was necessary on his part; that the overseers had not relieved themselves of responsibility by appointing a paid assistant, and were as strictly overseers of the poor as any others in the position; and that notice to their assistant was notice to them.

They therefore convicted the appellants and fined them 1s. each, and fined the assistant overseer, who did not appear, £2 and costs.

If the magistrates were right, the conviction was to stand; if they were wrong, the conviction was to be quashed.

Channell, Q.C. (Wightman Wood with him), for the appellants.—It is necessary to prove wilful disobedience to maintain this conviction. Without notice brought home to the defendants, no wilful disobedience can be proved. In a criminal case notice to one person cannot be made notice to another.

Alexander Glen, for the respondent.—The appellants are liable to be convicted under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 33, for neglect of notice given under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 7. It was not necessary to give all the overseers notice, as a notice by them may be valid without the signatures of all: Rex v. Beeston, 3 T. R. 592; R. v. Yorkshire (North Riding) Justices, 6 A. & E. 863. Service upon an assistant overseer is service upon the overseers: Points v. Attwood, 6 C. B. 38; Caunter v. Adams, 12 W. R. 1105, 15 C. B. N. S. 512. The assistant overseer has all the rights and duties of an overseer: Baker v. Locke, 13 W. R. 258, 18 C. B. N. S. 52. By article 59 of General Order for Accounts, 1867, the word "overseers" shall be taken to mean overseers of the poor and churchwardens. It was their duty to discover the time and place of audit and attend. Their duties as to the keeping of accounts are defined in article 1 of the same order. Where churchwardens are overseers, the accounts are to be left in a certain place for them to sign.

Wightman Wood, in reply.—The appellants are not "persons having the collection, receipt, or distribution of moneys" within 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 47. The Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 33, does not repeal, but merely extends, the original Act. The notice read has no statutory authority, and it is not provided in the statute that notice to the assistant overseer is to be good against overseers. It is admitted that they did not receive notices, and in quasi-criminal matters notice to an agent cannot be notice to a principal unless specially provided for, whatever it might be in civil matters.

MATHEW, J.—This conviction cannot be upheld. I cannot come to the conclusion that there was wilful disobedience within the meaning of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 96. That section exacts a penalty in case anyone shall wilfully neglect or disobey any of the rules, and was intended to punish contumacious contempt of the authorities as a criminal offence. The magistrates have not found the appellants guilty of contumacious disrespect, or of a disposition to repudiate their obligations as overseers. Although the notice might be taken as brought home to the appellants, I do not think, on the face of it, that their neglect to appear would constitute wilful disobedience. There is a significant memorandum at the end of the notice to the assistant overseer—namely, "personally attend." I do not think it contemplates having churchwardens and overseers there. The appellants are churchwardens of an ecclesiastical parish, and take no part in the poor law administration. Auditors had audited the parish accounts many times before without them, and there was nothing to indicate that they knew of or interfered with the business. They would reasonably conclude from the words in the notice that the attendance required was that of the assistant overseer, who had actual knowledge of the accounts for poor law purposes.

The conviction must be quashed.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Having had my attention called to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 33, and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, I think there was primâ facie evidence of disobedience, but it could be rebutted. In this case it has been.

The conviction must be set aside. No costs.

County court—Interpleader—Appeal—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 68—30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 13.

In an interpleader issue where neither the money claimed nor the value of the goods or the proceeds of them exceed £20, no appeal will lie from the county court either with or without leave. Section 13 of the County Courts Act, 1867, enacting that, "with the leave of the judge, an appeal shall be allowed in actions in which an appeal does not now lie," only applies to actions, and not to interpleader issues.

Appeal by Claridge in interpleader proceedings from the judgment of his Honour Judge Eddis at the Clerkenwell County Court.

Neither the money claimed nor the value of the goods exceeded £20, but the county court judge had given leave to appeal.

Hollenstein, for the respondent Collis, took the preliminary objection that there was no appeal in interpleader proceedings before 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, and that section 68 of that Act limited such appeals to issues where the "money claimed or the value of the goods or the proceeds exceed £20": Beswick v. Boffey, 2 W. 156, 9 Ex. 325; Mason v. Wirral Highway Board, W. Beaumont Morice, for the appellant.—By section 13 of the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), "with the leave of the judge an appeal shall be allowed in actions in which an appeal is not now allowed."

WILLS, J.—The cases seem to decide quite clearly what I always thought to be the law, that there is no appeal in interpleader proceedings except that expressly allowed by section 68 of the County Courts Act of 1856. The provisions of the later Act of 1867 only apply to actions. Here the value of the goods claimed is under the limit laid down by the Act of 1856 and no appeal can lie even with leave.

Ipswich Union, Appellants.
West Ham Union, Respondents. (a.)

Poor law—Irremoveability—Lunatic—Break of residence—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1—28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8

A pauper is irremoveable if the periods during which he resided in the union and did not receive parochial relief, on being added together, constitute one year's residence, for the year's residence need not be continuous.

Case stated.

This was an appeal from an order of the Essex Quarter Sessions confirming an order of justices for the payment by the appellant union to the respondent union of a sum of money for the maintenance of a pauper lunatic, an inmate of the Essex County Lunatic Asylum.

The facts, as set out in the case, were as follows:—

The pauper, Sarah Anne Warne, was the wife of Thomas Warne. The pauper resided with her husband in the parish of St. Clement, Ipswich, in the appellant union, where he was legally settled, till September 23, 1883, when they went to reside at Leyton, in Essex, in the respondent union.

The pauper's husband resided at Leyton continuously from September 23, 1883, to March 1, 1886, when application was made for her removal to the Essex County Lunatic Asylum.

Between these dates the pauper was confined three times in the Essex County Lunatic Asylum, where she was at the date of the order, and once in Ipswich Lunatic Asylum, as a pauper lunatic. She resided with her husband at Leyton in the respondent union during her lucid intervals. In the whole period from September 23, 1883, to March 1, 1886, these amounted to 390 days. Between March 1, 1885, and March 1, 1886, she had a lucid interval of 276 days. Except as regards his wife's maintenance as a pauper lunatic, the husband of the pauper never, between September 23, 1883, and March 1, 1886, received parochial relief.

The costs of maintenance of irremoveable pauper lunatics are borne by the place from which they cannot be removed (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 102).

J. C. Earle (Poland with him), for the appellants.—The husband of the pauper was irremoveable at the date of the application to remove his wife. At that date he was within the scope of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8, and had resided in the respondent union for 390 days. This computation omits, as breaks of residence, all times during which he had received parochial relief on behalf of his wife—i.e., for her maintenance as a pauper lunatic. If the husband is irremoveable, the wife is so: Reg. v. Christchurch, 18 L. J. (M. C.) 28; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111.

Philbrick, Q.C. (Woollett with him), for the respondents.—The husband is removeable, and therefore his wife also. A qualifying year cannot be made up of parts of years, but must be without any break of residence.

Pollock, B.—It is admitted that the pauper is irremoveable by statute if her husband has acquired a status of irremoveability. Is the husband irremoveable from the respondent's union or not? This depends upon whether his year of residence can be made up out of portions of years during which he has not been, as during other portions of such years he has been, in receipt of parish relief owing to his wife having been maintained as a pauper lunatic. A similar point was raised in Reg. v. Christchurch.

The qualifying period then was five years. It was there decided that the proper way was, first, to eliminate any time during which there had been a statutory disability, and, next, to see whether five years of residence remained. But here the pauper's husband has resided for more than one year in the respondent union under no statutory disability. In my opinion he is irremoveable, and, because he is irremoveable, his wife (the pauper) is irremoveable by statute.

*Licensed house—Consumption of intoxicating liquors after hour of closing—*Bonâ fide guests of lodger—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), ss. 9, 10.

It is not an offence against section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, for a publican to allow intoxicating liquors ordered by a lodger to be consumed by bonâ fide guests of the lodger after the hour of closing.

Case stated by justices of Tonbridge under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

A summons was issued against the appellant under section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, on an information preferred by the respondent, which alleged that the appellant, being a person licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, on the 4th of July, 1887, unlawfully did allow intoxicating liquors to be consumed on his licensed premises during the time that the same were required to be closed by and in pursuance of the Licensing Act, 1874.

Section 9 enacts that "any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in the premises" shall be liable to a penalty.

Section 10 says that nothing in the Act shall preclude a licensed person from selling intoxicating liquor at any time to persons lodging in his house.

On the hearing of the summons it appeared that on the day in question a Mr. Le May had taken rooms at the appellant's hotel—viz., a sitting room and a bed room, and in the evening he gave a dinner in the sitting room to a number of his friends, and after ten o'clock, the hour of closing, they remained in the room drinking wine and other intoxicating liquors. All the liquor was supplied on the order of Mr. Le May, having been ordered by him before the hour of closing, and was paid for by him.

The justices found that the persons who were so drinking with Mr. Le May were his bonâ fide guests. They thought, however, that if they dismissed the summons they would be opening a door to an evasion of the

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act. They therefore convicted the appellant and fined him one shilling.

H. F. Dickens, for the appellant.—Here there was no contravention of the Act in the sale of the liquor. And section 9 deals entirely with cases of liquor sold in contravention of the Act. Otherwise, as section 10 only permits the sale of liquor to a lodger, and says nothing about when it may be drunk, it would be an offence for a publican to allow any intoxicating liquor to be drunk at all after the hour of closing.

The respondent did not appear.

Pollock, B.—It is clear that this conviction must be quashed. The magistrates thought they ought to prevent an evasion of the Act. But if a thing does not come within an Act it is useless to talk about evasion. This gentleman was a lodger at the inn, and he invited some friends to dinner and gave them wine, some of which was drunk after the hour of closing. That is not an offence against the Act. The magistrates find that they were bonâ fide guests; if there had been any pretence about the matter the case would be different.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Act allows a publican to sell liquor to a lodger at any time. And there can be nothing to prevent a lodger who has bought liquor from allowing a bonâ fide guest to drink it with him after the hour of closing.

Conviction quashed.

Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue. (a.)

Stamp—Promissory note—Agreement—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 49.

The appellants executed an instrument which was called a policy of assurance, and by which they guaranteed to the assured the payment of £100 on the 18th of May, 1967, provided that, if the assured should be desirous at any time of surrendering the policy, the appellants would allow to the assured the surrender value thereof on the 18th of May next before the notice of surrender, such value to be fixed according to the appellants' tables for the time being in force with reference to surrenders.

Held, that the instrument was not chargeable with stamp duty as a promissory note, but was chargeable as an agreement only.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870.

The instrument in question was a policy of assurance granted by the Mortgage Insurance Corporation, and was to the following effect:—The corporation, in consideration of a single premium of £9 17s. 4d., paid at the time when the policy was issued, guaranteed to the assured the payment of £100 on the 18th of May, 1967; provided that, if the assured should be desirous at any time of surrendering the policy, the corporation would allow to the assured the surrender value thereof on the 18th of May next before the notice of surrender, such value to be fixed according to the tables of the corporation for the time being in force with reference to surrenders.

The commissioners were required by the corporation, pursuant to section 18 of the Stamp Act, 1870, to [illegible] press their opinion as to the amount of stamp d[illegible] with which the said instrument was chargeable. [illegible] commissioners being of opinion that the instrument [illegible] chargeable as a promissory note, assessed the d[illegible] thereon at one shilling. The corporation appealed.

The question was whether the instrument was [illegible] chargeable as a promissory note, or whether it [illegible] chargeable with a sixpenny stamp only, as an ag[illegible] ment.

Sir H. James, Q.C. (Moulton, Q.C., and Regi[illegible] Brown, with him), for the appellants.—This is n[illegible] promissory note in the ordinary sense; and even if [illegible] a promissory note within section 49 of the Stamp A[illegible] it is a promissory note and something more: Br[illegible] India Steam Navigation Co. v. Commissioners of Inl[illegible] Revenue, 29 W. R. 610, 7 Q. B. D. 165, where a d[illegible] ment, which was a promissory note within the word[illegible] the section, was held to be a debenture, and charge[illegible] as such. The test seems to be this—in order th[illegible] document may be a promissory note within the sect[illegible] and nothing more, there must not be any words [illegible] agreement beyond the mere promise to pay. Here [illegible] corporation do more than merely promise to pay a certa[illegible] sum on a certain date, they agree to do in the meanti[illegible] a certain thing of great benefit to the other party—[illegible] to pay him at any time the surrender value of the pol[illegible] as shown by the tables of the corporation, which [illegible] volves a promise on their part to keep such tab[illegible] This is clearly something more than a promis[illegible] note; it is an agreement, and ought to be charge[illegible] as such with a sixpenny stamp only. In Yeo v. Du[illegible] 33 W. R. 739, the majority of the Court of Ap[illegible] thought that the instrument there in question, the[illegible] it contained a promise to pay, was not a promis[illegible] note at all; and even the judgment of Bowen, L.J., who dissented, is in favour of this document not bei[illegible] chargeable as a promissory note.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G. (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., [illegible] Dicey, with him), for the respondents.—This is a p[illegible] missory note within section 49 of the Stamp Act, 1[illegible] which is as follows:—(1) "The term promissory [illegible] means and includes any document or writing (exc[illegible] bank note) containing a promise to pay any su[illegible] money." (2) "A note promising the payment of [illegible] sum of money out of any particular fund which m[illegible] may not be available, or upon any condition or co[illegible] gency which may or may not be performed or ha[illegible] is to be deemed for the purposes of this Act a prom[illegible] note for the said sum of money." The words are [illegible] wide, and a more comprehensive meaning is gi[illegible] the term promissory note than it had under th[illegible] vious Stamp Act: see 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, schedule. [illegible] is a promise to pay money and nothing more, [illegible] promise to pay £100 on a fixed day, and there is [illegible] an alternative promise to pay otherwise. The B[illegible] India Steam Navigation case is in favour of the resp[illegible] ents. Grove, J., treated the instrument in that ca[illegible] a promissory note, though he held that it was also [illegible] thing more; and Lindley, J., said that if it were [illegible] debenture, it would be a promissory note. The o[illegible] expressed by the Master of the Rolls in Yeo v. [illegible] would not apply to this instrument. And the judg[illegible] of Bowen, L.J., in that case makes section 49 [illegible] enough to include the present case.

Sir H. James, Q.C., replied.

Dec. 15.—Pollock, B.—The question is whe[illegible] this instrument, which is called a policy of assurance, [illegible] to be stamped as a promissory note, or whether a si[illegible] penny agreement stamp is sufficient. This depends [illegible] the true construction of section 49 of the Stamp Ac[illegible] 1870. It must be observed that we are not considerin[illegible] whether any duty is payable at all on this instrume[illegible] whether it is a promissory note or nothing; but we are considering whether it is a promissory note or an agreement.

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now the words of the section, if taken alone, are clear, including any document containing a promise so pay. And the Solicitor-General reasonably argued that this Act intended to include under the term "promissory note" some instruments not within the earlier statutes. There seems to be necessarily included in the section everything which is clearly and absolutely a promise to pay. But then the question arises, What are we to say where we have a document, which is not merely a promise to pay, but contains other terms, terms of agreement. I think that we cannot hold it to be partly a promissory note and partly something else. I think we must ask ourselves the question, What is the dominant character, what is the substantial effect, of the document? Is it more like a promissory note? or more like an agreement? Some assistance is to be derived from the cases which have been cited, British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue and Yeo v. Dawe. The courts seem to have said that in dealing with such a document you must inquire what was the intention of the parties, and what is the common understanding of men of business who have to deal with such documents. This document, which is called a policy, guarantees the payment of a fixed sum on a fixed date, and then proceeds to provide for the surrender of the policy to the assured at a certain value to be calculated in a certain way. The assured, if he desires to surrender the policy, is to give notice to the corporation, who will then be able by reference to their tables to ascertain the surrender value of it. This involves an agreement on the part of the corporation that they shall have and keep proper tables. It makes the document something more than a promise to pay money; it shows an intention on the part of the parties to make an agreement on the terms expressed therein; and I think it would be regarded by men of business as an agreement. I am of opinion that such a transaction was not within the contemplation of those who drew section 49, and it is not within the words, "upon any condition or contingency which may or may not be performed or happen"; but is something more than that. Therefore, I am of opinion that this instrument is not chargeable as a promissory note, but as an agreement.

Hawkins, J.—If this document had consisted merely of the agreement to pay £100 on the 18th of May, 1967, and the proviso had been omitted, I should have thought it was a promissory note, though it was called a policy of assurance. But the proviso shows that the preceding words do not express the whole intention of the parties. Suppose the payee required early payment of the commuted sum. He would have to base his claim on the words of the proviso. It would then be necessary for him that the document should bear an agreement stamp. This is cogent proof that the two parts of the document must be read together, in order that we may determine what is its substantial effect. I do not forget sub-section 2 of section 49. But this is not a promise to pay on a contingency, but to pay a substituted sum. We ought not to look on this document as if no action could be brought on it till 1967. I think that, substantially, this is an agreement, and that it ought to be stamped as such with a sixpenny stamp, and that the judgment of the commissioners ought to be reversed.

Reg. v. County Court Judge of Lambeth and Jonas. (a.)

County courts—Practice—Order for committal—Writ of attachment—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 113—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 89.

An order was made in an action in a county court upon one Harris, as acting manager of a certain partnership fund, to pay into court within fourteen days the sum of £65 odd, and to deliver up certain documents. Harris did deliver up the documents, but failed to pay in the money, whereupon an order of committal was made out by the county court judge, on the ground that Harris, in his fiduciary position, had been guilty of contempt of court by neglecting to obey the previous order. The committal order merely recited the terms of the original order, and did not specify any particular breach.

Held, that it was immaterial whether the process of committal was by an order of committal or a writ of attachment, since the distinction no longer existed in chancery practice, according to Harvey v. Harvey, 33 W. R. 76, 26 Ch. D. 644; but that the above order was bad for uncertainty, since it did not specify in what particular Harris was guilty of contempt, so as to enable him to purge such contempt.

Application adjourned by Field, J., from chambers to grant a writ of prohibition.

In an action before the county court between Jonas and Harris, the present applicant, in a matter of partnership accounts in a cricket club, an order had been made on May 10, 1887, appointing a receiver, and ordering Harris, as acting manager of the club, to pay into court within fourteen days the sum of £65 odd, and to deliver to the receiver certain documents, vouchers, &c., belonging to the partnership concern. On August 2 the following order, now complained of, was made, which, after reciting the previous order for the payment of the money and the delivery of the documents, &c., went on to say that, "the court being of opinion that the said Richard Harris in his fiduciary position has been guilty of contempt of court by neglecting to obey the said order," it was ordered that he be committed to Wandsworth Prison. Harris applied for a writ of prohibition to Field, J., at chambers, who adjourned the matter to the court.

Richmond, for the applicant Harris.—The committal order does not specify in what respect Harris has disobeyed the original order, it merely says "in his fiduciary capacity," and he cannot purge his contempt without knowing in what way he is to obey. He has sworn that he has delivered up all documents in his possession. The non-payment of the money is alone admitted: Reg. Hemsworth, 3 Q. B. 745. This is a committal order for an unlimited time. No such order was ever made. If it is for offences under the Debtors Act, 1869 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, there should have been a writ of attachment and not an order for committal, which only applies to offences committed before the county court itself, under section 113 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. The powers conferred by section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, on county courts are similar to those possessed by the High Court, and for these orders the practice of the Chancery Court must be followed, which distinguished the two processes of orders for committal and writs of attachment: Reg. v. Lefroy, 21 W. R. 332, L. R. 8 Q. B. 134; Ex parte Hooson, 21 W. R. 152, L. R. 8 Ch. 231; Buist v. Bridge, 29 W. R. 117; Harvey v.

Johnson Watson, for the respondent.—A writ of attachment is a High Court writ only. An order for committal is the proper order upon interlocutory applications: Richards v. Cullerne, 7 Q. B. D. 623, 30 W. R. Dig. 103; Martin v. Bannister, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Q. B. D. 491; ord. 51, r. 26, County Court Rules, 1886. The order of May 10 directed the payment of money by the defendant as well as the delivery of books. It was not necessary for the committal order to specify the default in the payment of money, since the committal of Harris as a person "acting in a fiduciary capacity" implied the non-payment of trust money.

Wills, J.—This appeal must be allowed. The committal order of the county court judge is bad on the face of it. It is alleged that it is bad in substance as well as in form. As to that there may have been evidence of justification for the defendant's failure to comply with the original order, but we cannot now go into that. One objection, however, to the order is only partially substantiated. It is said that the appropriate remedy for disobedience to the original order of the county court was by a writ of attachment instead of an order for committal. In my opinion that is a distinction without a difference. When the Judicature Act of 1873 provided, by section 89, that inferior courts should have the same powers as the superior courts over all causes within their jurisdiction, it was not necessarily intended that they should call all the remedies so given by the same names. In proceedings in the High Court obedience may be enforced (1) by writ of attachment; (2) by an order for committal. We can put aside cases where a writ of attachment for some such offence as failure to comply with answers to interrogatories or cases where such a writ is made bailable only in the High Court as having no application to the present case, because the order of committal here was not for any such purpose, but to enforce obedience to an order which was final. An order of this kind cannot be bailable. We need not, therefore, consider the cases cited where a writ of attachment properly became bailable. The question for us is, whether an order of committal or a writ of attachment is the proper form to enforce obedience to an order which is final? In my opinion it matters little by what name such a form is called in that case. Chitty, J., in Harvey v. Harvey, 26 Ch. D., at p. 654, appears to consider that there was now no practical difference between them. One was enforced by the tipstaff of the court and the other by the sheriff. That is all the distinction, and it comes to little, if anything. But when there was disobedience to any order for payment of money for which power of imprisonment was granted under section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, then a writ of attachment seems to have been the proper form of proceeding. If there was any substantial difference between such proceedings in the county courts, then undoubtedly such difference ought to be respected, and that court could not be allowed to administer harsher remedies than were allowed to the High Court. But I can see no real difference between the two processes. The county court acts through its bailiff instead of through the sheriff, by whom the warrant of committal is executed; there being no officer like the tipstaff of the High Court in the county court, the two forms are carried out by the same machinery in the latter court, and it therefore comes to a mere question of words. I think, therefore, that there is no objection to the committal order complained of on the ground that it was an order for committal instead of one for a writ of attachment.

As to the order itself, however, I consider it as bad as bad could be. The original order recites that the defendant should do a number of things—(1) to pay money; (2) to deliver up books, and so on. The order for committal recites that the county court judge had come to the conclusion that the defendant had disobeyed the said order, namely that "in his fiduciary position he had neglected to obey the said order." That is so expressed in order to make section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869, applicable. But the order is not necessarily confined to that. The county court judge from all that appears on the order for committal, may have ordered the committal on the ground that the defendant was a person in a fiduciary capacity, or that the defendant had disobeyed the portion of the original order requiring the payment of money or the delivery of books. It is quite uncertain. The order for the defendant's committal is no worse because he was a person acting in a fiduciary capacity than in the other cases. It cannot be read as embracing both charges, for if so it may, for aught one can tell, embrace a third or any more charges. Inasmuch as it can only be discharged by the person committed purging his contempt, no man ought to be imprisoned except for some act which ought to be clearly stated. I think, therefore, that this objection to the committal order is a good and valid one—namely, that this order does not clearly and distinctly specify in what respect or respects the disobedience to the original order has been incurred.

Reg. v. Newport (Salop) County Court Judge. Ashley v. Norris. (a.)

County court — Execution — Judgment of one county court to be executed in different county court district — Neglect of bailiff of "foreign" court to levy — 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, ss. 104, 115 — Order by judge of one court to bailiff of another — Prohibition — Acquiescence — Submission to court without jurisdiction.

The county court judge of one court has no power to order the bailiff of a court in a different district who has not levied execution in pursuance of the warrant of the first court to pay compensation under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 115, or otherwise, to the party injured.

Where the bailiff of S. appeared before the county court judge of N. to justify his conduct in not making a levy, but was nevertheless ordered by the judge of N. to pay compensation,

Held, not to be such an acquiescence in the jurisdiction of the court of N. as would estop the bailiff from obtaining a prohibition against the order of the judge of N.

This was an application to set aside a writ of prohibition directed to the judge of the county court of Shropshire holden at Newport and to one William Ashley, under the following circumstances:—

Ashley, who resided within the district of the Newport County Court, obtained a judgment in that court against Emery for £1 1s. 5d. and 6s. costs. The judgment being unsatisfied, Ashley issued execution against Emery, who resided in the district of the Stone County Court. The warrant of execution was sent by the registrar of the Newport County Court to John Buckley Norris, the registrar of the Stone County Court, requiring execution of the same. No return to this warrant was made to the registrar of Newport, and, after a lapse of over four months, the plaintiff applied to the county court judge of Newport, who, on hearing that the warrant had been sent in the usual way by post to Norris, the registrar of Stone (who was also the high bailiff of Stone), and that he had been written to several times since then, and that no answer had been received from him, ordered Norris, quâ high bailiff, to pay the sum of £1 10s. 5d. to Ashley as compensation for neglect to levy execution against the goods of Emery. Norris subsequently appeared before the judge and stated that he had not received the letters in question, and that he did not levy execution because the goods of Emery would not pay the costs of the same, but the judge refused to set aside the order. Thereupon Norris obtained ex parte a writ of prohibition on the ground that the alleged cause of action or complaint against him was for neglect, as high bailiff of the Stone County Court, to levy execution on goods within the district of the Stone County Court, and that no part of such alleged cause of action or complaint arose within the district or jurisdiction of the Newport County Court.

Corrie Grant, for the application to set aside the prohibition.—The county court judge was right. By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 115, in case any bailiff who shall be employed to levy execution neglects to do so, and the fact is proved to the satisfaction of the judge, the judge shall order the bailiff to pay such damages as it shall appear that the plaintiff has sustained. Then, by section 104 of the same Act, a warrant of execution against the goods of a party out of the jurisdiction of a county court is to be sent to the registrar of that court in whose jurisdiction the defendant is, and the high bailiff of that court "shall be authorized and required" to act as if the warrant was issued by his own court. The words "authorized and required" show that a foreign bailiff is affected by the order of the judge from whose court the warrant issues, and therefore he may be punished by that judge. [Pollock, B.—It would be very inconvenient if a high bailiff were punishable by anyone but by his own judge. [Hawkins, J.—A bailiff should only be tried by his own judge.] The question of jurisdiction was not raised by the high bailiff before the county court judge of Newport. The bailiff then submitted to the jurisdiction of the court by appearing before it. [Pollock, B.—I think that point is settled by Roberts v. Humby, 3 M. & W. 120, and by Mayor of London v. Cox, L. R. 2 H. L. 239, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 10.] Chichester v. Donegal, 6 Madd. 395, and Jones v. James, 19 L. J. Q. B. 257, are in support of my contention.

Woodgate, in support of the prohibition, was not called on.

Pollock, B.—In this case the prohibition, when applied for ex parte at chambers, was granted at once on account of the urgency of the proceedings, and now we have this application to set it aside. [His lordship briefly recited the facts of the case.] There was primâ facie negligence in the bailiff of the Stone district, and the judge of the Newport district made an order on him to pay compensation to the orginal plaintiff. If a warrant be issued from a home court, is the bailiff of the foreign court amenable to the judge of the home court? By section 31 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 there shall be a bailiff for every court, whom the judge may appoint and remove. Surely this must be the judge of the home court. Then, by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 14, s. 13, no person shall be appointed bailiff of more than one court. By section 33 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 the bailiff shall attend every sitting of the court, and by section 115 of the same Act, if the bailiff should neglect to levy execution, he may be punished for his neglect by being made to pay compensation. Who is to be the judge of this? It must be the judge of that court to which the bailiff belongs. It has, indeed, been argued that this section is modified by section 104, by which a bailiff is "authorized and required" by a judge of another court. But I think it clear from the whole purview of the statute that this does not affect the general principle that each judge is to keep his own bailiff in order. Then on the ground of convenience, there can be no doubt that it would be most inconvenient for a county court judge at York to be able to sit in judgment on a bailiff of the county court of Exeter.

It has been argued that the bailiff submitted to the jurisdiction of the Newport Court by appearing before the judge of that court, but I do not think that it was sufficient to debar him from claiming a prohibition afterwards. It is a different thing from a man being summoned by mistake to the wrong court where two counties join, and submitting voluntarily to the jurisdiction. Here it appears, on the face of the proceedings, that the court below had no jurisdiction—that is, was coram non judice, and there was no voluntary acquiescence in the jurisdiction to debar the bailiff from seeking a prohibition.

Reg. v. Westmoreland County Court Judge.
Ingleton & Co. v. Maudsley. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Suit for specific performance—County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 9—Practice—Prohibition—Separable claims.

The county court has no jurisdiction, under the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 9, to entertain a suit for specific performance of a parol agreement to grant a right of way.

Where a plaint contains two claims, one of which is within and the other without the jurisdiction of the county court, a prohibition may be granted as to one only.

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiffs in the county court action of Ingleton & Co. v. Maudsley to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to restrain them and the judge of the county court of Westmoreland from prosecuting the plaint in the case. It appeared that the defendant had entered into a parol agreement with the plaintiffs whereby he undertook to give them the sole use of a footpath at a certain rent, but he had subsequently turned the plaintiffs out of possession and allowed other persons to use the footpath. The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action under the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 9, for specific performance of the above agreement, and also claimed damages for breach of contract. The defendant obtained a rule nisi to prevent the plaint being heard, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction, and the question now came on for hearing.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., showed cause against the rule. The verbal agreement to use the footpath is taken out of the Statute of Frauds by part performance, and amounts either to an agreement for a lease or a sale of the use of the footpath, and in either view can be enforced in an action for specific performance in the county court under section 9 of the County Courts Act, 1867. If the plaintiffs are not entitled to specific performance of this agreement in the county court, they are at any rate entitled to damages for breach of the second part of the agreement. And although a prohibition may be obtained for one part of the plaint, yet the other part is good, and should not be interfered with; Walsh v. Ionides, 1 E. & B. 383.

Cock, Q.C. (Waddy, Q.C., with him).—The plaint shows, on the face of it, that the county court has no jurisdiction, therefore the whole plaint is the subject of prohibition. This is a suit for specific performance, therefore the question is whether the court has jurisdiction to entertain the suit at all. Now in this case the agreement does not amount to an agreement either for sale or a lease of any property, but is an agreement for an incorporeal hereditament, and, as a grant of an incorporeal heritament must be by deed, this agreement is not the subject of specific performance. That part of the plaint is therefore bad, and, part being bad, the whole plaint fails. Ex parte Walsh is distinguishable, for in that case there was no want of jurisdiction on the face of the plaint.

Pollock, B.—The real question raised in this case is whether, upon the plaint, the court had jurisdiction. It is clear that the facts are set forth in the plaint with a twofold object. In the first place, the plaintiffs endeavour to obtain specific performance of an agreement to grant a licence. In the second place, the plaint contains a separate claim for damages for breach of contract. The first of these claims is obviously founded on the jurisdiction given by section 9 of the County Courts Act, 1867. Looking at the limited language used by that Act, we conclude that, if that was the only claim, then the court would have no jurisdiction. But that is not all. The plaintiffs set out, not merely that the defendant did not allow the plaintiffs to use the footpath, but that he also broke an agreement not to allow others to use the way, and they claim £50 damages for that breach. How are those damages claimed? If they are claimed for something which appears in the statement of claim to be such as the court has jurisdiction to entertain, it would never do for us to prohibit the county court from entertaining the action, because it appears to be a hopeless one.

The remaining question comes to this, if, on the facts set forth, there be two claims made, one of which is within and the other without the jurisdiction, can one be prohibited and the other allowed to stand? After looking into the old books, and the law on the subject collected in Bacon's Abridgment, tit. Prohibition, I come to the conclusion that the claims are separable, and that is what this court decided in the recent case of Godfrey v. Lazarus, 4 Times Law Reports, 101. Therefore, it seems to me that the motion for a prohibition fails.

Hawkins, J.—I entirely agree. Assuming the claim set forth to be one which, ordinarily, the High Court has power to deal with, it is one for the specific performance of which the county court has no power to act. I think, therefore, all that is said in regard to the claim for specific performance may be rejected as immaterial. If, on the other hand, it is a nonsensical claim, and one of which no court could entertain jurisdiction, it is an additional reason for rejecting it, and is, therefore, a ground for a prohibition. Has the county court jurisdiction in anything that remains? There is a claim for breach of an agreement over which the county court can exercise jurisdiction. We may, therefore, grant a prohibition of the equitable plaint of the claim, leaving the parties to proceed on the common law plaint. The motion, therefore, as to the second part of the plaint fails.

Medway Union (Guardians of) v. Bedminster Union (Guardians of). (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Three years' residence—A woman and widow—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 35—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 8; Union Chargeability Act, 1865, s. 8.

A woman who has resided in a parish continuously for three years, partly with her husband and partly as a widow, thereby acquires a settlement as "a person who has resided for the term of three years" under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

Case stated by the Recorder of Bristol.

An order of justices was made for the removal of Caroline Baker, widow, and her three children, aged respectively five, three, and two years, from the Bedminster Union to the Medway Union, as the place of their last legal settlement, under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34. The recorder affirmed the order on appeal to quarter sessions, subject to a case.

The guardians of the Medway Union appealed.

The pauper and her husband had lived together and resided continuously in the parish of Gillingham, in the appellants' union, for two years and nine months immediately before the death of the husband, which occurred in March, 1886, and for upwards of three months after that she resided continuously in the same parish as a widow. The same rule would apply to the children as to her.

It was contended for the appellants that section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act did not apply, because the pauper could not be acquiring a settlement for herself as a feme sole at the same time as her husband was acquiring one for her which would be derivative, and that section 35 did not apply, because a widow could not be treated as a wife within the meaning of that section.

For the respondents it was contended that the two periods of residence as wife and widow coalesced so as to make up the three years' continuous residence required by law.

Kinglake (D. Metcalfe with him), for the appellants. The pauper has not acquired a settlement under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, because she must then have been sui juris for three years, whereas she was under coverture for most of the time. "A person" is a legal person other than married women and infants or others under disability. The husband's residence might give her a derivative settlement, but a break in his residence is a break in hers: St. Giles, Reading, v. Eversley, 1 Str. 580; Reg. v. Manchester Overseers, 8 Q. B. D. 50. The time, therefore, of her widowhood must be distinct, and cannot be added to a derivative settlement. As to section 35, the pauper, being a widow, cannot claim a derivative settlement under this section: Reg. v. Bridgnorth, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 314; Reg. v. Edmonton, 15 Q. B. D. 339; Maidstone Union v. Holborn Union, 17 Q. B. D. 817, 35 W. R. Dig. 148.

Poole (J. C. Wall with him), for the respondents.—The pauper has acquired a settlement by residence in the appellant union under section 34 because the words "any person" are general, and she has resided in the parish for three years "in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would render her irremoveable" in accordance with 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, which deals with removals, and in accordance with the Union Chargeability Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 79), s. 8. She must therefore be "deemed to be settled in the parish." It was held in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Glossop, 12 Q. B. 117, that where a pauper resided for five years, first as a wife and then as a widow, the two periods coalesced so as to render her irremoveable under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1. And in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, 18 W. R. 787, L. R. 5 Q. B. 364, where a woman resided for one year, first as a feme sole and then as a married woman, she was held to be irremoveable under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and the Union Chargeability Act, 1865. It is not contended that any settlement was acquired under section 35.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that the order appealed from should be confirmed. We have to say whether the pauper is, within the meaning of section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, "a person who has resided for the term of three years" in the parish of Gillingham in the appellants' union "in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render her irremoveable." If she has resided for three years in the appellant union under these conditions of irremoveability, she has gained a settlement in the appellant union. The statutes in question are statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, a statute amending the law relating to the removal of paupers and the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, s. 8. The joint effect of these statutes is as follows:—No person is liable, after a year's unbroken residence in a parish, to be removed therefrom as a pauper. The year is to be computed from the application for the warrant of removal, and no period is to be computed as part of the year during which the pauper has been in receipt of parochial relief, or has come under any or certain other exceptions which are stated in statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1. Here it is not denied that the pauper did reside in the appellant union for each of the three years necessary for gaining a settlement under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, "in such manner as would in accordance with" statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, and the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, s. 8, "render her irremoveable." She, in fact, resided for three years. There was not, in any of the three years, any legal break in her residence. None of the exceptions come into operation to prevent the time running in her favour. Section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, takes no account of different kinds of irremoveability. It says nothing as to the suggested distinction between personal and vicarious residence. It does not say "irremoveable in his or her own right," but merely "irremoveable." As events would have it, the pauper has been "irremoveable" as a wife for two years and nine months, and "irremoveable" as a widow for upwards of three months, but she has, in fact, resided in a parish in the appellant union in an irremoveable condition for three years. And, having done so, she has, in my opinion, acquired a settlement by residence in the appellant union.

The cases of Reg. v. Glossop and Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East were, it is true, decided before the passing of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, but they are decisions on the parts of the previous Acts which are incorporated with the 34th section of that Act, and they constitute a clear authority for the proposition that periods of residence passed by a woman in a parish partly in a single, partly in a married, condition, may be joined together for the purpose of creating a status of irremoveability. The status of irremoveability thus created gives rise, when it has endured long enough, to a settlement by residence. For the purposes of this appeal it is not necessary to reconcile the 35th with the 34th section of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

HAWKINS, J.—I also think that the order appealed from should be confirmed. It is an order which adjudges that the settlement of the pauper is in the appellant union. The correctness of this order depends on whether, when it was made, the pauper had acquired by residence a settlement in the appellant union under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. Under this section a person acquires a settlement by residence for three years in a condition of irremoveability, as defined by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, and the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, s. 8. In this case no doubt, as long as the marriage continued, either the irremoveability of the wife was the irremoveability of the husband, or, if she could acquire irremoveability on her own account, such irremoveability could always be interfered with by her husband's conduct. Whether personal to herself or derived from him, it was always liable to be interrupted by his becoming chargeable to the parish or otherwise forfeiting his own irremoveability. But nothing of the kind occurred, and she continued irremoveable, whether in her own or in her husband's right does not appear to me to matter, for two years and nine months. After this it is admitted that she resided in a condition of irremoveability on her own account for three months. I think that no authority is necessary to show that these periods of residence can be combined; but, if authority be necessary, it is supplied by Reg. v. Glossop.

VINEY v. BIGNOLD. (a.)

Fire insurance—Arbitration clauses—Condition precedent.

By a condition in a fire policy it was provided that, if any difference should arise in the adjustment of a loss, the amount to be paid should be submitted to arbitration, and the party insured should not be entitled to commence or maintain any action upon the policy until the amount of the loss should have been referred and determined as therein provided, and then only for the amount so awarded.

Held, that the determination of the loss by arbitration was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover in an action on the policy.

Action upon a fire insurance policy against the defendants, the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, represented by their public officer.

The case came before the court upon an order to set down for hearing points of law raised by the pleadings. By a condition indorsed upon the policy it was provided that, "If any difference shall arise in the adjustment of a loss, the amount (if any) to be paid by the society shall, whether the right to recover on the policy be disputed or not, and independently of all other questions, be submitted to the arbitration of some person to be chosen by both parties or of two independent persons, one to be chosen by the party insured and the other by the directors, and in case either party shall refuse or neglect to appoint an arbitrator within twenty-eight days after notice the other party shall appoint both arbitrators, and in case of the arbitrators differing, then the amount shall be submitted to the arbitration of an umpire to be chosen by the arbitrators before they proceed to act, and the award of the arbitrators or umpire (as the case may be) shall be conclusive evidence of the amount of the loss, and the party insured shall not be entitled to commence or maintain any action at law or suit in equity upon his policy until the amount of the loss shall have been referred and determined as hereinbefore provided, and then only for the amount so awarded."

(a.) Reported by A. H. TODD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By another condition indorsed upon the policy, the company reserved to themselves the right of reinstating the property injured.

The point to be decided by the court was whether a reference to arbitration was a condition precedent to the bringing of an action to recover the amount insured under the policy where differences had arisen between the parties as to the amount payable by the defendants.

R. Vaughan Williams and Hansell, for the plaintiff.—The covenant to refer to arbitration only amounts to a covenant not to sue, for the condition as to reinstatement implies a liability on the part of the company, who have, under the arbitration clause, provided for a method of ascertaining the amount. The agreement for arbitration is merely collateral: Collins v. Locke, 28 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 674. This agreement is not in the form in Scott v. Avery, 4 W. R. 746, 5 H. L. Cas. 811.

They also cited Roper v. Lendon, 7 W. R. 441, 1 El. & El. 825; Elliott v. Royal Exchange Insurance Co., 15 W. R. 907, L. R. 2 Ex. 237; Dawson v. Lord Fitzgerald, 24 W. R. 773, 1 Ex. D. 257.

Finlay, Q.C., and W. Graham, for the defendant, were not called upon.

Wills, J.—The principles applicable to this case are clear. If the parties have covenanted that the liability of the insurance company is to arise only after there has been a reference to arbitration, then we must hold that their liability is to arise only after the award. The policy here says that the society will only be liable subject to the terms and conditions thereupon indorsed. Of those conditions that as to arbitration is the only one that is material. In my judgment that condition provides that unless there has been such a reference and determination no liability is to fall upon the insurance company. The authorities cited do not seem to force us to give a construction different to the plain meaning of the words. Collins v. Locke is the only one that resembles this case. There were there two clauses relating to arbitration in the contract, one in general terms and the other to the effect that "the award of the arbitrators shall be conclusive, and that none of the parties shall be entitled to commence or maintain any action at law or suit in equity in respect of the matters so submitted as aforesaid, except for the amount or amounts by the said award determined to be paid by one or more of the parties," &c. In the judgment of the court the words "in respect of the matters so submitted as aforesaid" were held to apply only to the questions specifically submitted to arbitration. The two cases are, therefore, clearly distinguishable. In the present case I am of opinion that no action can be brought on the policy before us until the amount of the loss has been determined by arbitration. The expression "entitled" used in the condition seems to me to make it clear that there is no liability on the part of the society until that has been done. Our judgment, therefore, must be for the defendant.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion, and entirely agree that the case of Collins v. Locke is really an authority much against the plaintiff. Elliott v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co. is in point, and there the majority of the court took the view that we have adopted in this case. In Dawson v. Lord Fitzgerald there were two distinct covenants, one that the lessee should keep only such a number of hares and rabbits as would do no injury to the crops, and the other that in case he should keep such a number as should injure the crops, he would pay a fair and reasonable compensation. The arbitration was to be as to the amount of the compensation only. That is entirely different from the present case, and the covenant was undoubtedly merely collateral.

Crane v. Lewis. (a.)

Partnership—Bill of exchange—Compromise of action—Liability of retired partner.

The defendant was a partner in the firm of G. & Co. from January 1 to June 30, 1885, and no notice was ever given to the plaintiff of his retirement. Between those dates the plaintiff discounted an acceptance indorsed by G. & Co., which was dishonoured. The plaintiff sued G. & Co. for the amount, and G. & Co. brought a cross-action against the plaintiff for recovery of the bill. Both actions were stayed by order of court on G. & Co. giving to the plaintiff a second acceptance for the amount of the first and £10 for costs, and the plaintiff giving up certain securities for the debt which were in his possession. The second acceptance was dishonoured, and the plaintiff sued the defendant upon it as a member of the firm of G. & Co.

Held, that the defendant was not liable, as the bill of exchange was given in settlement of legal proceedings which involved a give-and-take between the parties, and was made without his knowledge or consent.

This was an action tried before Denman, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff sued upon a bill of exchange for £183 17s., indorsed by the firm of Goldsmith & Co. amongst others.

The defendant Lewis had joined the firm of Goldsmith & Co. as a partner on January 1, 1885, and in June 1885, the plaintiff discounted a bill drawn by the firm of Goldsmith & Co. for £173 17s. 10d., and special notice was given to him at the time that the defendant was a member of the firm. On June 30, 1885, the defendant retired from the firm, but no notice was given to the plaintiff of the fact, and he was not aware of it until after this action was brought. The bill for £173 17s. 10d. was dishonoured, and the plaintiff sued the parties to it, including the firm of Goldsmith & Co. for the amount. Goldsmith & Co., on the other hand alleged that they had been defrauded of the bill with the knowledge of the plaintiff, and they sued him for the recovery of it. These actions proceeded until July 7, 1886, when they were stayed by order of court upon the terms that Goldsmith & Co. should indorse a bill for £183 17s. 10d., to be given to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should give up to the party paying the bill certain securities which he had received from the person at whose request he discounted the original bill. Upon presentation this bill was also dishonoured, and the plaintiff sued the defendant Lewis upon it as a member of the firm of Goldsmith & Co.

Cecil Chapman, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable upon the bill because he has not taken the proper steps to divest himself of liability. The plaintiff was in the position of an old customer and entitled to special notice. This was not an ordinary business transaction, but it was a continuation of an old transaction, and partners have an implied authority to do all that is necessary to wind up any matters not settled at the time when a partner retires. This bill was really a bill for the old debt, for which the defendant was undoubtedly liable. The fact that it was given after action brought can make no difference. It was a reasonable act done by the firm which they could hardly avoid, and which must, therefore, bind absent partners.

He cited Lewis v. Reilly, 12 B. 349; Spenceley v. Greenwood, 1 F. & F. 297; Ex parte Williams, 11 Ves. 5.

Pillar, for the defendant.—This bill of exchange is given in settlement of an action. One partner cannot bind another by a submission to arbitration: Stead v. Salt, 3 Bing. 101; and such a compromise as occurred in this case cannot be said to be part of the ordinary or necessary business of the firm: Adams v. Bankart, 1 Cr. M. & R. 681.

He referred also to Hatton v. Boyle, 3 H. & N. 500, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 5

Denman, J.—This action is brought on a bill of exchange drawn by Jones & Co., and indorsed by Goldsmith & Co., for the sum of £183 17s. 10d. The only question raised before me is whether S. G. Lewis, who was formerly a partner in the firm of Goldsmith & Co., is liable in respect of the bill.

It is contended that Lewis is liable, as the original debt was one for which he was liable, and no notice of his departure from the firm had been given to the plaintiff.

It appears that in May, 1885, Crane discounted a bill for £173 17s. 10d. drawn by Goldsmith & Co. at three months, and accepted by Jones & Co. Crane did so knowing that Lewis was a member of Goldsmith's firm. In July Lewis retired from the firm, but no notice was given to Crane of that fact. In August, 1885, Goldsmith & Co. brought an action against Crane to recover back the bill, and after the bill became due Crane pleaded its indorsement and dishonour, and counter-claimed against Goldsmith & Co. for the amount. In July, 1886, an order was made staying the actions upon terms, one of which was the giving by Goldsmith & Co. to Crane of the bill now sued upon. And it is now sought to make Lewis liable on this substituted bill, but no authority for this length has been cited to me. It was not a simple exchange of one bill for another, because there was give-and-take about it, for by the other terms of the order Crane gave up certain shares to Goldsmith & Co. It is impossible to say that this was a mere settlement of the affair on which Lewis could have been liable. It cannot be assumed that he was bound by it. He had no notice of it, and it is a different agreement from that for which he was liable, for the amounts are different. There is no evidence that he had any knowledge of it, and, looking at the complicated nature of the agreement, I cannot say it was a simple continuance of the original agreement, and I am of opinion that judgment must be for the defendant.

Bentley v. Vilmont. (a.)

Criminal law—Goods obtained by false pretences—Bonâ fide purchase by third party in market overt—Conviction of fraudulent party—Order for restitution against purchaser—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100.

A bonâ fide purchaser for value in market overt of goods obtained by his vendor under a contract of sale induced by fraud, even if he purchase before any avoidance of the contract, is liable, under section 100 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, when the person obtaining the goods by false pretences has been convicted, to have an order of restitution of the goods to the original owner made against him if he has possession of the goods at the time of the conviction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 35 W. R. 238, 18 Q. B. D. 322) affirmed.

Moyce v. Newington, 27 W. R. 319, 4 Q. B. D. 32, overruled.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Denman, J., sitting without a jury.

The plaintiff (the present respondent) was a trustee for a French firm of Galpin & Cochard, cloth merchants at Amiens, in liquidation, who had carried on transactions with Klein & Hodder, professing to be traders in London. A large amount of goods were obtained from them by Klein & Hodder upon what were afterwards discovered to be false pretences. The goods were exposed for sale at the shop of one Starbuck, in the city of London, and a bargain of sale was executed between Hodder and the appellant which was admitted to be a sale in market overt. The appellant forwarded a cheque in payment, and Starbuck was instructed to hold for the appellant. Klein & Hodder were subsequently convicted on the prosecution of Galpin & Cochard, but before the conviction Galpin & Cochard discovered the goods a Starbuck's shop and claimed them. The appellant also brought an action against Starbuck, who interpleaded. An application was made upon the conviction for an order for restitution of the goods to the prosecutors, but this was refused.

At the trial of the interpleader issue Denman, J., considering himself bound by Moyce v. Newington, gave judgment for the appellant. The Court of Appeal reversed this decision and entered judgment for the respondent.

The appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

July 11, 18, 19.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Jelf, Q.C. (Attenborough with them), for the appellant.—In the first place, section 100 is not applicable at all to the case of a contract voidable only, and not actually avoided; in the second, it is not applicable where there has been a bonâ fide purchase in market overt. At common law the contract could not have been avoided after a bonâ fide sale to a third party: White v. Garden, 10 C. B. 919. The word "owner" cannot refer to a person who has passed away the property in goods; at any rate, until he has avoided the contract. The interpretation clause and the provisoes to this section are in favour of the appellant's contention. Moyce v. Newington, which was approved in Babcock v. Lawson, 27 W. R. 886, 4 Q. B. D. 394, is in point. Lindsay v. Cundy, 26 W. R. 406, 3 App. Cas. 459, was decided on different grounds. Scattergood v. Sylvester, 15 Q. B. 506, is also distinguishable. The respondent is compelled to contend that section 100 creates a new title.

They also referred to Horwood v. Smith, 2 T. R. 750; Chichester v. Hill, 31 W. R. 245; Reg. v. Kenrick, 5 Q. B. 49; and Reg. v. Stancliffe, 11 Cox C. C. 318.

A. Charles, Q.C. (C. W. Matthews with him), for the respondent.—The effect of the decisions is that, in spite of a sale in market overt, the property and the right of property are reverted by the section in the original owner. The growth of the law on the point may be traced by the following references:—Bracton, vol. 2, p. 513 (Sir T. Twiss's edition); Staundforde's Pleas of the Crown, art. R. 750; 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, ss. 53, 57; Scattergood v. Sylvester, 15 Q. B. 506. Later cases in the respondent's favour are Reg. v. Kenrick; Reg. v. Stancliffe; Reg. v. Ford, 11 Cox C. C. 320; and Reg. v. Horan, 6 Ir. Rep. 293. Lindsay v. Cundy was decided in the Court of Appeal and the Queen's Bench Division, 25 W. R. 417, 2 Q. B. D. 96, 24 W. R. 730, 1 Q. B. D. 348, on grounds which are in our favour.

Sir R. E. Webster in reply.

Aug. 5.—Lord Watson.—In this case I have come, with very great reluctance, to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought not to be disturbed.

The respondent parted with his goods under a voluntary contract of sale, which had the effect of vesting the property of the goods in the purchasers, Klein & Co. It now appears that the sale was induced by fraud, a circumstance which gives the seller the option, either of adhering to his bargain or of rescinding it, in a question with the fraudulent purchaser. The individual partners trading, or professing to trade, under the firm of Klein & Co. have been convicted, at the respondent's instance, of the statutory misdemeanour of obtaining the goods sold to them by fraudulent pretences. Before the prosecution was instituted, and before he had any notice that the goods had been fraudulently obtained, the appellant purchased them in good faith for an adequate price, paid the purchase-money, and obtained delivery. In these circumstances the respondent sues the appellant, under section 100 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, for restitution of the goods, which still remained in the possession of the appellant at the time when this action was raised.

I do not think that, apart from statute law, a bonâ fide purchaser from one who has acquired the property of the goods by a contract of sale tainted with fraud, stands in precisely the same relation to the original owner as a purchaser of stolen goods, without notice of the theft, in market overt. In the latter case the original owner and the purchaser in open market are to this extent in pari casu, that neither has done aught to mislead the other; whilst, in the former case, the original owner has intentionally given his fraudulent vendee an ex facie absolute and valid title to the goods, upon which purchasers without notice of the fraud are entitled to rely. I have great difficulty in supposing that the Legislature, as an incentive to the prosecution of crime, deliberately intended, in the case where the property has been passed by the act of the original owner, to deprive the honest purchaser both of his goods and of his money; but I have been unable to put a reasonable construction upon the language of section 100 which will avoid that inequitable result.

Section 100 enacts that if any person guilty of any felony or misdemeanour in "stealing" or in "obtaining" a chattel or other property shall be indicted of such offence by or on behalf of the "owner of the property" and convicted thereof, "in such case the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative." That enactment enables an owner who has brought himself within the provisions of the clause to sue for recovery of his property. It has been settled by a long series of authorities, under successive statutory enactments, of which 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, is the last, that the former owner of goods which were stolen from him, upon his prosecuting the thief to conviction, becomes entitled to recover the goods from a bonâ fide purchaser who has paid a full price in open market. To my mind these authorities are not reconcileable with any construction of the clause which does not attach to the expression "owner of the property" the same meaning as if it had been "the original owner of the property," or which does not attach the same meaning to the words "the property shall be restored to the owner," as if they had run thus: "the property shall re-vest in and shall be restored to the original owner." These expressions must, in my opinion, have the same force and must be similarly construed in the case of conviction for fraudulently obtaining goods as in the case of conviction for theft. The language of the clause leaves no room for making any distinction between goods obtained by fraudulent pretences without the property passing, and goods obtained by the same means under a voidable contract of sale; and it is for these reasons that I am constrained to hold that the respondent must prevail.

Upon two recent authorities cited at the bar I have these observations to make. In Lindsay v. Cundy one Blenkarn had been convicted of obtaining goods from the prosecutor by false pretences, but the defendant had purchased the goods from Blenkarn, and had resold them before his conviction. The judges of the Queen's Bench were of opinion that there was a voidable contract of sale which passed the property of the goods to Blenkarn; and they gave judgment for the defendant on the authority of Horwood v. Smith, in respect that the statute did not re-vest the property in the prosecutor until conviction, and that his statutory title did not relate back to the date of the original fraud. Blackburn, J., treated the case of purchase of stolen property from a thief in market overt as on all fours with that of purchase from a seller who has a title of property under a contract voidable on the ground of his own fraud. His lordship said, "When did the plaintiff's property begin, that is to say, begin after the time the defendants had got the goods in this case? Not till after the conviction of the party guilty of the fraud, because before that time the property had been altered by a bonâ fide purchase from a person who held it under a voidable but not void contract. Altering these few words, everything in the judgment of Buller, J. (i.e., in Horwood v. Smith), is applicable to this case." A different view was taken of the true character of the original transaction both in the Court of Appeal and in this House. It was held that there was no contract, and that the property did not pass; and, upon that footing, the sale to them not having been in market overt, the defendants were made liable for the conversion of the goods before conviction. In tions were made, either by the Lords Justices or e noble and learned lords who decided the case upon the effect of the Act of 1861, and their nts do not impair the authority of the views ex- upon that point in the Court of Queen's Bench. later case, of Moyce v. Newington would, if well d, be conclusive in favour of the appellant. I the defendant in that case did commit a legal in taking the sheep brevi manû out of the posses- the plaintiff before he had obtained the convic- his fraudulent vendee. The point decided was tion 100 does not give the original owner, who with his property under a contract of sale in- by fraud, the right to demand restitution from a fide purchaser who is in possession at the time of tution. I regret having to dissent from that ; but I cannot say that I have any hesitation in from the reasons assigned for it by Cockburn, which appear to me to be derived from an entire misconception of what was decided by the Court of in Horwood v. Smith, and by the Court of Bench in Lindsay v. Cundy.

am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed costs; and I move accordingly.

Lord Bramwell.—I agree in the reasoning and con- of my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson). I agree also in his regret that our decision must be as it is, and in his remark that he does not think the Legis- could have so intended.

It is manifest from the old authorities—Glanvil, The Mirror, and others—cited by Mr. Charles, the case of stolen goods the plaintiff in a pro- by appeal in which he established the theft was to a restitution of stolen goods, though they sold in market overt. That, indeed, changed property, but that property was restored on the suc- the proceeding. It cannot be doubted that the of Henry VIII. (21 Hen. 8, c. 11) was intended the same effect and consequences. This is by the reason of the thing and the authorities, deed was admitted by the Attorney-General. then, were a case of stolen goods, the plaintiff's not be contested. But it is a case, not of goods, but of goods obtained under a contract tained by fraud and voidable. The question arise under the statute of Henry VIII., but it To hold that the cases differ would be to hold same words in the same place are to have dif- meanings as to different things. That cannot be. authorities are all one way and against the de- except Moyce v. Newington. That case was decided on a mistake as to the effect of Lindsay The law is that on conviction the property Until then it is not in the original owner if it sold in market overt or sold by a fraudulent to a bonâ fide purchaser from him.

Fitzgerald.—It seems to me unfortunate that not the facts before us as to the alleged con- between the claimants (Galpin and Cochard) and Hodder and Klein, and as to what was the of the false pretence by which the alleged was rendered voidable. The only statement we the facts is to be collected from the judgment of J.:—"Between January and March, 1885, obtained some goods from Galpin and Cochard must take to have been obtained by false pre- so that there was an obtaining of them, as far as by some bargain or other which was a bargain might have been avoided, but there was an ob- of them. Between March and May the goods pawned by this man Hodder who had so ob- them with a person of the name of Dobree, a broker, and Dobree not, I suppose, having premises of his own to store them in, stored them at the premises of a man named Starbuck."

The goods may have been obtained by falsehood on the part of the supposed vendee, which would lead to the conclusion that there never had been any contract of sale. The additional matters of fact are succinctly stated in the report, but I need not further advert to the particulars, for it seemed agreed by the parties on the argument that your lordships should dispose of the appeal on the basis that there had been a contract under which the property in the goods in question passed to the vendee (Hodder), but under such circumstances that the bargain was so vitiated by the false pretences of the vendee as to render it voidable at the option of the vendor.

We must, however, go further, and assume that the false pretence of Hodder was of some existing material fact false to his knowledge, by which he obtained not only the bargain, but the possession of the goods. Hodder having got possession of the goods (merinoes and cashmeres), pawned them with Dobree, but when exactly, or under what circumstances, does not appear, and Dobree sent them to be finished and exposed for sale at the shop of Starbuck, in the City of London, where Bentley, the defendant in the issue, bought them on the 30th of May, 1885, under circumstances not now impeached, which amounted to a sale in market overt. The appellant does not rest his claim on any other title than the purchase in market overt. Galpin and Cochard elected to avoid the contract. We must take it that they did so, but when or how does not appear, save that on their prosecution Hodder and Klein were committed for trial on the same 30th of May, and since tried and convicted, in September, 1885, of obtaining the goods in question by false pretences.

We have had a very able and interesting argument, but I need not follow it through all its details, for it was admitted by counsel for Bentley, looking to the long current of authorities, that if the goods had been stolen from Galpin and Cochard, though purchased by Bentley in market overt, he could not deny that, on conviction of the thief, the original owners, Galpin and Cochard, would have been entitled to the restoration of the goods. It seems to me that it was right to make this admission, for when we find a long train of decisions all pointing the same way we ought not to disturb them, even though we should think that it would have been more expedient, if practicable, to give full effect to a sale in market overt. The practice and current of authority has been the same in Ireland as in England, but especially since the decision in R. v. Horan, Ir. Rep. 6 Com. Law 293, in which, on a question reserved, ten judges took part and were unanimous.

The case before your lordships is thus reduced to the question whether Moyce v. Newington was well decided. If it was well decided, the appellant (Bentley) has established his right to succeed on the issue, for that case is exactly in point. I concur with my noble and learned friends in opinion that Moyce v. Newington cannot be supported, as it seems to me to rest, not on what the Legislature has expressed, but on what it ought to have said. I am unable to adopt the conclusion of Cockburn, C.J., that the language of the Legislature applies, and is obviously intended to apply, to cases, and to those only, in which possession has been obtained without the property passing. The Legislature has not said so, and, in my opinion, did not intend to say so. The Legislature seems rather, from the time at which it first made obtaining goods by false pretences a misdemeanour, to have put the misdemeanour and the cognate and closely allied offence of larceny on the same ground as to the right of restoration on conviction. I refer, inter alia, to 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, the title of which is "An Act for consolidating and amending the laws in England relative to larceny and other offences connected therewith." Section 53 enacts: "And whereas a failure of justice frequently arises from the subtle distinction between larceny and fraud, for remedy thereof be it enacted that, if any person shall, by any false pretence, obtain from any other person any chattel, money, or valuable security with intent to defraud or cheat any person of the same, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." "Provided always that, if upon the trial of any such person it shall be proved that he obtained the property in any such manner as to amount in law to larceny, he shall not, by reason thereof, be entitled to be acquitted." And section 47 enacts: "And to encourage the prosecution of offenders be it enacted that, if any person guilty of any such felony or misdemeanour in stealing, taking, obtaining, or converting, &c., any chattel, &c., shall be indicted for any such offence by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, in such case the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative." And again, by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126 (the Criminal Justice Act), where a summary jurisdiction is given in certain cases of larceny and false pretences, section 8 provides: "It shall be lawful for the justices by whom any person is convicted under this Act to order restitution of the property stolen, taken, or obtained by false pretences in those cases in which the court before whom the person convicted would have been tried but for this Act may be by law authorized to order restitution."

The Legislature seems to me, in these general statutes—including 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100—to have dealt with and expressed the right to restoration of the goods on the conviction of the offender in the same language, and depending on the same event, whether the offence was felony or larceny or the misdemeanour of false pretences. If we were to adopt the view of Cockburn, C.J. (though it might be desirable to be able to do so), the consequences would probably be more extensive than at first sight appears—e.g., it would seem, then, difficult in such case to sustain a conviction for obtaining goods by false pretences where the contract was such that, as between the vendor and the vendee, it was not absolutely void, but voidable only at the election of the vendor.

I have only to add that by this decision we do not intend to interfere with the principle established in White v. Garden.

Lord Macnaghten.—I agree in the opinions which have been delivered by my noble and learned friends, and I share the regret which has been expressed in being compelled to arrive at this decision.

Cooke v. Fuller, 26 Beav. 99, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 25, questioned.

Appeal from Kay, J.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of a fund which had been paid in in the administration of the estate of a testatrix who died in November, 1862. The petitioners were Mrs. Finney, the wife of T. Finney, and her only child, Alice Finney, who had attained twenty-one on June 1, 1887. Under the will and codicil of the testatrix, the fund in question had been limited to Sarah Ann Waite, who afterwards became Mrs. Finney, for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and subject thereto for such of her children as she should appoint. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Finney took place in 1863, and no settlement was made on that marriage. In 1869, Mrs. Finney obtained a decree of judicial separation from her husband, who was still living, and the separation still continued. Mrs. Finney had appointed the corpus of the fund to her daughter, Alice Finney, and the petitioners prayed that the fund might be paid out to the present trustees of the will of the testatrix, or to the petitioners themselves. Kay, J., refused the application.

The petitioners appealed.

Dundas Gardiner, for the appellants.—After a decree for judicial separation, the wife, with respect to her property, is in the position of a feme sole, and, therefore, the restraint on anticipation is gone: 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 25,* 21. The only restriction is that the wife may not marry again. That applies to property the title to which accrued to the wife before the decree of separation: In re Insole, 14 W. R. 160, L. R. 1 Eq. 470; during the separation the husband loses all rights to his wife's property, and the wife can give a good discharge for it: In re Coward and Adam's Purchase, 23 W. R. 605, L. R. 20 Eq. 179; Dawes v. Creyke, 33 W. R. 869, 30 Ch. D. 500. Cooke v. Fuller, 26 Beav. 99, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 25, governs this case, and is in our favour.

Cotton, L.J.—This is a petition by a married lady who has got a decree for judicial separation, asking to have a fund in court paid out to her and her daughter who is entitled to the corpus after the death of her mother. But there is a restraint on anticipation with regard to the fund in question, and to get rid of that latter section 25 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 is relied on. [The Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] The words of the section have no application to this case, the section does not provide that the wife is to be considered a feme sole in all respects, but in my opinion it limits the property in respect of which she is to be considered as a feme sole, and to which the section is to apply, to property which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her after the order and during the continuance of the judicial separation. But in this case the lady was entitled to this fund before the decree for judicial separation, just as she is now entitled to it.

* 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 (Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857), s. 25:—"In every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, from the date of the sentence and whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her, and such property may be disposed of by her in all respects as a feme sole, and on her decease the same shall, in case she shall die intestate, go as the same would have gone if her husband had been then dead."

Several cases have been referred to. In In re Insole a reversionary interest fell into possession during the continuance of the judicial separation, and that might well be considered as therefore property "coming to or devolving upon" her within the meaning of section 25; but that has no application here. In re Coward and Adam's Purchase was the case of a legacy charged on land, and which Sir George Jessel, M.R., held that neither the wife nor husband could have required payment of while living together before the separation. But after an order for separation was made the person liable to pay the legacy offered to pay it to the wife, and under those circumstances the Master of the Rolls held that it "came to" her after separation within the meaning of the section. In Dawes v. Creyke property came to the wife after the decree of judicial separation and during the continuance of the separation, and Bacon, V.C., held that it was not bound under the covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in the marriage settlement. That point is not necessary to be decided here. As to the case of Cooke v. Fuller, it is no doubt like the present case, but we are not bound by it, if it is to be taken as a decision authorizing the payment to a wife as a feme sole of a fund which had belonged to her before the separation, we decline to follow it, and, indeed, overrule it. There may have been circumstances in that case justifying the decision arrived at, but no reasons are given in the report. In my opinion the present case this married woman is not entitled to the fund paid out to her.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This property has not in any sense of the words been "acquired by" or "come to or devolved upon" the wife after the separation decree, and it cannot therefore come within section 25 of the statute mentioned. None of the cases cited come near it except Cooke v. Fuller. I do think that that case was in fact wrongly decided, for looking at it I find it was a case under section 21 of the 21 Vict. c. 85, and not under section 25. Now section 21 provides that "a wife deserted by her husband may at any time after such desertion . . . . . for an order to protect . . . property which she may become possessed of after such desertion . . . "; and in Cooke v. Fuller the property in question seems to have come to the wife after the desertion, and therefore it may have been considered that the protection order operated as from the time of desertion.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The words of section 25 are plain; they limit the property to which the section applies to property which the wife might acquire or which might come to or devolve upon her after the separation decree. The cases cited are not in point. I agree with what has been said by the Lords Justices who have preceded me as to Cooke v. Fuller. The language of the Act admits of no doubt.

Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith. (a.)

Libel—Interlocutory injunction—Principles regulating the exercise of jurisdiction.

An interlocutory injunction to restrain the future publication of matters defamatory of an indefinite general description ought not to be granted, because, if granted, it would be left to the court to decide, on motion to commit, whether what might thereafter be published was libellous or not.

The principles laid down in Coulson v. Coulson, 3 Times L. R. 846, as to granting interlocutory injunctions with respect to libels, approved.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was brought against the proprietors of the Liverpool Mercury, and claimed damages for libel and an injunction. The plaintiffs were a company whose object was the carrying on the business of co-operative stores at Liverpool, and the company was registered on September 1, 1887.

On October 29 the plaintiff company moved for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from printing or publishing in the Liverpool Mercury "any articles, letters from correspondents, or any other matter containing assertions, imputations, or suggestions that the company was insolvent or incapable of carrying on its business with success, or that the shareholders did, at the general meeting, unanimously sign or propose a resolution to the effect that another general meeting of the company should be convened for the purpose of taking into consideration whether the company should be wound up . . . or any articles, correspondence, or other matter suggesting that a committee of the shareholders should be appointed . . . for that purpose . . . or imputing motives for the recent resignation of two of the directors of the company which tended to the prejudice of the company and to hamper the present directors from conducting the business of the company with success, or which might prevent other persons from applying for the allotment to them of shares in the company."

The material facts were these. On October 19, 1887, the first statutory meeting of the shareholders of the company was held. A reporter of the Liverpool Mercury was present at the invitation of some of the directors. At this meeting a resolution was proposed by one of the shareholders that a meeting should be called to consider the advisability of winding up the company. He was informed that a requisition by shareholders holding one-fifth of the capital was required for that purpose. The proposer of the resolution complained that the company had started with insufficient capital, and was in debt, and that two directors of the company, Messrs. Wrigley and Cullen, in reliance on whose names he had taken shares, had retired from the directorate. A full report of this meeting appeared in the Liverpool Mercury of October 20, and the accuracy of the report was not questioned. On October 21 there was published in the Liverpool Mercury a letter with reference to the company signed, "A Shareholder," in which the writer stated that he and a number of his friends who had taken shares in the company were surprised to learn at the statutory meeting the fact of the withdrawal of two of the directors, and contained the following statements:—"Had their retirement received the same publicity as the company's prospectus did, advertising their names as directors, the hard-earned savings of many working people would not be at present jeopardized"; and "I assume that they" (the directors referred to) "are aware that a requisition to call another meeting was unanimously signed for the purpose of taking into consideration whether the company should be wound up or otherwise liquidated." The company's solicitors wrote to the editor of the Liverpool Mercury immediately after the publication of this letter complaining that it attacked the solvency and credit of the company, and asking for the writer's name. The editor refused to give the writer's name, and said that the letter arose naturally out of the proceedings at the meeting of the 19th, and contained no imputation which was not publicly made thereat or reported in the papers. On October 24 another letter, signed "A Lady Shareholder," was published in the Liverpool Mercury indorsing the remarks of the writer of the former letter and suggesting the appointment of a shareholders' committee to wind up the company.

The company, immediately after the publication of the letter of October 24, issued the writ in the action. The defendants admitted that the statement in the letter of October 21 as to the unanimous requisition was incorrect, and evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff company that the allegations of insolvency were unfounded.

Kekewich, J., refused to grant the plaintiff company the interlocutory injunction.

The plaintiff company appealed.

R. Neville and Dunham, for the appellants.—There is specific defamatory matter published, and a threat to continue such publication, and, therefore, no question as to determining whether there is primâ facie a libel or not arises on the motion for this injunction. In Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Beall, 30 W. R. 583, 20 Ch. D. 501, it is said that three things are necessary in such cases for an injunction; first, the untruth of the statement; second, a threat to repeat it; third, no privilege. These three necessary conditions exist here. [COTTON, L.J.—You ask by the injunction to restrain, not merely the republication of what is defamatory, but generally the publication in future of anything bearing on this matter.] All publications containing similar defamatory matter; an order of this kind was made in Hill v. Hart Davies, 21 Ch. D. 798, 30 W. R. Dig. 157, and in Hermann Loog v. Beall, 32 W. R. 994, 26 Ch. D. 306, which was a case of slander merely. [COTTON, L.J.—In that case we corrected the order by confining the injunction to restraining the utterance of the words to "customers," and not generally to "other persons."] In Thorley's Cattle Food Co. v. Mossam, 28 W. R. 966, 14 Ch. D. 763, and Briton Life Association v. Roberts, 2 Times L. R. 319, interlocutory injunctions were granted. In Armstrong v. Armit, 2 Times L. R. 887, an injunction was refused, but it is no authority against us, because the statements were not proved to be untrue, and the occasion was privileged. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Mulkern v. Ward, L. R. 13 Eq. 619, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 38.] If the occasion is not privileged there is no difference between a false statement published in a newspaper and that published by a private individual: Marks v. Conservative Newspaper Co., 3 Times L. R. 244. [COTTON, L.J.—That was a case of a publication in a paper of a public trial. I think there is a distinction, because, if a private individual takes on himself to publish a report of a trial it may be evidence of malice, because it is not usually done by him.] Section 2 of the Act 44 & 45 Vict. c. 60 shows that beyond what is stated in that section newspapers have no privilege. Hibbins v. Lee, 4 F. & F. 243; Parsons v. Surgey, 4 F. & F. 247; Davis v. Cutbush, 1 F. & F.; and Davison v. Duncan, 5 W. R. 253, 7 E & B. 229, illustrate this point. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Fletcher v. Anderson, Ir. App. Cas.] On the balance of convenience and inconvenience, we are entitled to an interlocutory injunction; the non-publication of statements relating to the plaintiff company cannot hurt the defendants, whereas the continued publication of such statements may destroy the company; interlocutory injunctions to restrain libels are grounded on the same principles as regulate all interlocutory injunctions. Coulson v. Coulson, 3 Times L. R. 846, only shows that in the case of libels interlocutory injunctions are to be granted with caution. [COTTON, L.J.—How can we grant an injunction in the terms you ask so as not to cover something which may not be libellous? I agree with what was said by the Master of the Rolls in Coulson v. Coulson, that we ought not to restrain the publication of what is not before us, or what a jury might reasonably consider not libellous.]

Warmington, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the respondents, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., who declined to grant an interlocutory injunction in an action brought against the proprietors of a newspaper in respect of three alleged libels—the first being a report of a meeting of the shareholders of the plaintiff company published in the newspaper of the defendants, and the others being two letters published in the same newspaper. The injunction sought for is not to restrain the future publication of those alleged libels, and for this reason—that there is no probability of any republication in that paper of the report of the meeting, and no probability that those letters will be again sent to the paper. It is not necessary to decide the question how far, if those who regulate the affairs of a company invite the reporters of a newspaper to come to a private meeting, the company can afterwards sue the newspaper for publishing a full report of the meeting because statements made at the meeting were libellous. I think that would require some consideration. Nor is it necessary for us to consider how far the proprietors of the newspaper would be liable for inserting letters commenting on what was said at the meeting, of which they had published a report? We have not to decide these questions, because there is no probability that the report of the meeting or the letters will be repeated, and whether damages can be recovered for them is a question to be decided only at the trial of the action. There is also another question to be considered at the trial—whether a company issuing a prospectus asking shareholders to join does not to a certain extent, invite public comment on its constitution, its capital, and its prospects. The injunction now asked for is not an injunction to restrain the republication of the report or of the letters, but it is to restrain the defendants from publishing "any article letters from correspondents, or any other matter containing assertions, imputations, or suggestions that the plaintiff company is insolvent, or incapable of carrying on its business with success, or that the shareholders did at the general meeting, unanimously sign or propose a resolution to the effect that another general meeting of the company should be convened for the purpose of taking into consideration whether the company should be wound up." Now there is really no suggestion that the defendants threaten or intend to republish the statement as to the unanimous resolution. Ought we then to grant an injunction with reference to the future publication in this paper of things of the nature he complained of? No doubt it may be very truly said by the plaintiff: "I am not bound by the notice of motion; I am entitled to go for any injunction with regard to future publication that the court may grant me." But I agree with Kekewich, J., that there would be the very greatest difficulty in laying down the terms in which we, in the present case, could grant an injunction. In Coulson v. Coulson the Master of the Rolls said that to justify the court in granting an interlocutory injunction it must come to a decision on the question of libel or no libel before the jury decided whether it was [illegible], and could not afterwards have it set aside. The [illegible]ndant was placed in this predicament by the order. [illegible] told that he must pay £34 into court or the [illegible]gment for £68 would stand, and execution might [illegible] for the larger amount. He paid the money into [illegible], not voluntarily, but under compulsion of the [illegible]. I cannot see any assent on his part to the [illegible]. The judges in the court below seem to have [illegible]red in opinion upon the point of practice, and to [illegible] assumed that they had jurisdiction to impose [illegible]. We have jurisdiction as to the costs, and can [illegible] it to impose terms. Therefore, if the defendant [illegible] pay the £34 now in court to the plaintiff, which I [illegible] he has agreed to do, he must have the costs [illegible] this appeal, and the costs below.

Lopes, L.J.—This appeal raises an important point of [illegible]. The question is whether the case comes with[illegible] rule 6 or rule 7 of order 21—in other words, whether [illegible] indorsement on the writ is or is not a statement of [illegible]. If it is a statement of claim, the case comes [illegible] rule 6; if not, it comes within rule 7. It seems [illegible] me that this question is disposed of by ord. 21, r. 1 [illegible]. The words "no further statement of claim" con[illegible] to my mind that that which has been delivered is a [illegible]ment of claim, and the rule goes on to say that [illegible] indorsement on the writ shall be deemed to be the [illegible]ment of claim." I am therefore of opinion that [illegible] indorsement on the writ is a statement of claim. That being so, the judgment was prematurely signed, [illegible] is irregular. It is said that the plaintiff is assisted [illegible] ord. 70, r. 1. I do not think that that rule applies [illegible] in cases like the present. It applies where the party [illegible] made a blunder, as, for instance, where he has [illegible] a statement of claim or defence too late. [illegible] present case is outside the rules, it having been a [illegible]ful act to sign judgment, and the defendant is [illegible] ex debito justitiæ to have it set aside. It was [illegible] urged that the defendant was precluded from [illegible] by having availed himself of the order of the [illegible]al Court. I do not think so, as he paid the [illegible] into court under stress of the order. As to the [illegible], they are in the discretion of the court, and it en[illegible] the court to impose terms. As the defendant's [illegible] has agreed to allow the £34 to be paid out to [illegible]intiff, the defendant must have the costs both [illegible] below.

[illegible] defendant sold certain shares in a company [illegible]h a broker upon the London Stock Exchange. The [illegible]iff purchased the shares through a broker. The [illegible]fer was executed, and the price of the shares was [illegible] upon the delivery of the transfer in accordance with [illegible] rules and usages of the Stock Exchange; and this [illegible] done before any application could be made by the [illegible]feree to the company to register him in respect of [illegible]hares. The plaintiff then applied to the company to [illegible] his name entered upon the register as the transferee [illegible] shares, but the company declined to register him. [illegible] plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendant to recover back the price paid for the shares, as upon a total failure of consideration.

Appeal from the judgment of Stephen, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The defendant sold through a broker upon the London Stock Exchange thirty shares in the National Conservative Industrial Dwellings Association (Limited), and the London Founders' Association purchased the shares through their broker upon the Stock Exchange for the sum of £142 10s.

Upon the proper day the name of Palmer was given as the transferee of the shares. The transfer to Palmer was prepared and executed, and the money was paid upon the transfer being handed over, in accordance with the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, and this was done before the transferee could apply to be registered in respect of the shares. An application was thereupon made by Palmer to the National Conservative Dwellings Association to have his name entered upon the register of members in respect of the shares, but the directors declined to register him. By the articles of association of the National Conservative Dwellings Association the directors might, in their discretion, decline to register as a member any person claiming shares by transfer.

The plaintiffs, the London Founders' Association and Palmer, brought this action to recover back the money paid for the shares. Stephen, J., gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff Palmer appealed. Palmer was throughout the case treated as the real plaintiff in the action.

H. F. Dickens and W. E. Gordon, for the appellant.—A share in a company is a right to receive certain benefits from the company, and to do certain acts as a member of the company, and to be under certain liabilities: Colonial Bank v. Whinney, 33 W. R. 852, at p. 857, 30 Ch. D. 261, at p. 286, 34 W. R., at p. 707, 11 App. Cas., at p. 438. A shareholder has a status in the company in the above sense: Emmerson's case, 14 W. R. 905, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 433. The cases of Wilkinson v. Lloyd, 7 Q. B. 27; and Bermingham v. Sheridan, 12 W. R. 658, 33 Beav. 660, show that a contract for the sale of shares implies a condition subsequent that the purchaser shall be registered as a member. If the purchaser cannot obtain registration, he does not obtain what he contracted for—namely, a certain status in the company and as the contract is entire he can recover the price paid. The transfer is not the contract; the contract is not complete until registration. There is no distinction between a Stock Exchange contract and any other. The Stock Exchange rules regulate the mode of transfer, but do not affect the contract itself. The decision in Stray v. Russell, 7 W. R. 641, 1 E. & E. 888, in the Court of Queen's Bench is against this view, but the Exchequer Chamber (8 W. R. 240, 1 E. & E. 916) did not adopt the judgment upon that ground.

ant was entitled ex debito justitiæ to have it set aside without terms, the irregularity not being a mere non-compliance with the rules within ord. 70, r. 1.

Held, also, that the defendant, by asking for costs in the summons, did not give the court jurisdiction to impose terms, though the court, having discretion as to the costs, was enabled to exact terms as a condition of giving costs.

Held, also, that the defendant, by paying the money into court, had not so availed himself of the order of the Divisional Court as to be precluded from appealing.

A writ of summons, specially indorsed with a claim for £68, was served on the 21st of January, 1888, and the defendant entered an appearance on the 26th of January. Judgment was signed on the 7th of February for want of a statement of defence. The defendant thereupon took out a summons to have the judgment set aside, with costs, upon the ground that, under ord. 21, r. 6, he had ten days from the time limited for appearance within which to deliver his defence—that is to say, the last day for appearance being the 28th of January, he had ten days from that day to deliver a defence. The plaintiff contended that, under ord. 21, r. 7, the defendant had only ten days after his appearance within which to deliver a defence. Hawkins, J., dismissed the application. The Divisional Court (Huddleston, B., and Manisty, J.) made an order setting aside the judgment upon the defendant paying £34 into court within four days, otherwise the judgment to stand; costs to be costs in the cause.

The defendant appealed, having paid £34 into court.

J. G. Witt, for the defendant.—The indorsement on the writ is a statement of claim: ord. 20, r. 1 (a). It is headed "Statement of Claim," and gives full particulars, including the place of trial. The statement of claim was delivered when the writ was served: Veale v. Automatic Boiler Co., 35 W. R. 454, 18 Q. B. D. 631. Ord. 21, r. 6, therefore applies, and the defendant had ten days from the time limited for appearance—namely, the 28th of January—to deliver a defence, and the judgment was premature and irregular. That being so, the defendant was entitled ex debito justitiæ to have the judgment set aside, and the court had no power to impose terms.

He also cited Smith v. Sydney, 18 W. R. 628, L. R. 5 Q. B. 203.

Israel Davis, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 21, r. 6, refers to a separate statement of claim, which must be delivered; a writ is served. A specially-indorsed writ is in lieu of a statement of claim. It can be served in the vacation: Murray v. Stephenson, 35 W. R. 666, 19 Q. B. D. 60; a statement of claim cannot. No statement of claim, therefore, has been delivered here, and ord. 21, r. 7, applies. Further, if the judgment was irregularly signed it was a non-compliance with the rules, and the court had power, under ord. 70, r. 1, to set the judgment aside upon terms. Again, even if the defendant is entitled to have the judgment set aside ex debito justitiæ, the court has power to impose terms if costs are asked for in the summons, the defendant thereby submitting himself to the discretion of the judge: Bartlett v. Stinton, 14 W. R. 614, L. R. 1 C. P. 483; Abbott v. Greenwood, 7 Dowl. 534. [FRY, L.J., referred to Cash v. Wells, 1 B. & Ad. 375.] Lastly, the defendant, having acted upon the order of the Divisional Court by paying the £34 into court, elected to take and avail himself of that order, and cannot now appeal against it: Pearce v. Chaplin, 9 Q. B. 802. He served the order upon the plaintiff with the indorsement of the payment into court upon it.

Witt replied upon the last point.

FRY, L.J.—This appeal raises several points. The first and most important one is a point of practice. The plaintiff served a specially-indorsed writ upon the defendant, the indorsement being headed "Statement of Claim," stating the place of trial, and giving the information usually given in a statement of claim. It was served on the 21st of January, and the defendant entered an appearance on the 26th. The question is, what is the earliest date on which the plaintiff can sign judgment for want of a statement of defence? That question depends on ord. 21, rr. 6, 7. By rule 6, where a statement is delivered, the defendant must deliver his defence "within ten days from the delivery of the statement of claim, or from the time limited for appearance, whichever shall be last." By rule 7, a defendant who has appeared and "who has neither received nor required the delivery of a statement of claim, must deliver his defence (if any) within ten days after his appearance." In the present case the last day for appearance was the 28th of January, and judgment was signed on the 7th of February. If the time ran from the last day limited for appearance, the judgment was wrongly signed. If the time ran from the actual appearance, it was right. We have therefore to consider whether a statement of claim has been delivered. In my opinion a statement of claim was delivered when the writ was served. That is made clear by ord. 20, r. 1 (a), which provides that, where a writ is specially indorsed, "no further statement of claim shall be delivered, but the indorsement on the writ shall be deemed to be the statement of claim." Two things are to be observed here. No "further statement of claim" is to be delivered. That implies that the special indorsement is a statement of claim. The rule also expressly provides that the indorsement shall be "deemed to be the statement of claim." Therefore the indorsement is the statement of claim, and the service of the writ is the delivery of the statement of claim. Accordingly the case falls within rule 6, and the defendant had ten days from the time limited for appearance to deliver his defence. Hence he had ten days from the 28th of January, and so the judgment signed on the 7th of February was premature and irregular. In the case of an irregular judgment the defendant has a right to have it set aside ex debito justitiæ.

It was said that under ord. 70, r. 1, the court was enabled to deal with this case in a different way from what it could otherwise do. That rule refers to non-compliance with the rules of practice, whereas here the plaintiff had no right to judgment. The case is, therefore, not within the rules. We must apply the practice independently of the rules. There is a great distinction between setting aside a judgment that is irregular, which is a matter ex debito justitiæ, and setting aside a judgment where the court has a discretion to exercise. In the latter case the court can impose terms; in the former case it cannot. But though that is so, the court always has a discretion to deal with the costs of the application, and by that means the court has been enabled to impose terms.

It was said that the court has a discretion in the matter where costs are asked for in the summons. Bartlett v. Stinton was cited in support of that proposition. There, however, the judge had made an order setting aside the execution, with costs, and I do not think that the language of Erle, C.J., would apply if the judge had refused to give costs, or that he intended to say that the judge could impose terms merely because costs were asked for in the summons. This view is in accordance with what Bayley, J., said in Cash v. Wells. When the court gives costs it may exact terms as a condition of giving the costs, but it has no right to impose terms merely because costs are asked for.

It was then said that the defendant had availed himself of the order of the Divisional Court, and was therefore precluded from appealing against it. It was said that he had acted upon the order by paying the £34 into court, and could not afterwards have it set aside. The defendant was placed in this predicament by the order. He was told that he must pay £34 into court or the judgment for £68 would stand, and execution might issue for the larger amount. He paid the money into court, not voluntarily, but under compulsion of the order. I cannot see any assent on his part to the order. The judges in the court below seem to have differed in opinion upon the point of practice, and to have assumed that they had jurisdiction to impose terms. We have jurisdiction as to the costs, and can use it to impose terms. Therefore, if the defendant will pay the £34 now in court to the plaintiff, which I understand he has agreed to do, he must have the costs of this appeal, and the costs below.

Lopes, L.J.—This appeal raises an important point of practice. The question is whether the case comes within rule 6 or rule 7 of order 21—in other words, whether the indorsement on the writ is or is not a statement of claim. If it is a statement of claim, the case comes within rule 6; if not, it comes within rule 7. It seems to me that this question is disposed of by ord. 21, r. 1 (a). The words "no further statement of claim" convey to my mind that that which has been delivered is a statement of claim, and the rule goes on to say that "the indorsement on the writ shall be deemed to be the statement of claim." I am therefore of opinion that the indorsement on the writ is a statement of claim. That being so, the judgment was prematurely signed, and is irregular. It is said that the plaintiff is assisted by ord. 70, r. 1. I do not think that that rule applies to a case like the present. It applies where the party has made a blunder, as, for instance, where he has delivered a statement of claim or defence too late. The present case is outside the rules, it having been a wrongful act to sign judgment, and the defendant is entitled ex debito justitiæ to have it set aside. It was then urged that the defendant was precluded from appealing by having availed himself of the order of the Divisional Court. I do not think so, as he paid the money into court under stress of the order. As to the costs, they are in the discretion of the court, and it enables the court to impose terms. As the defendant's counsel has agreed to allow the £34 to be paid out to the plaintiff, the defendant must have the costs both here and below.

Order accordingly.

Contract—Sale of shares upon the Stock Exchange—Registration of transferee—Obligation of vendor.

The defendant sold certain shares in a company through a broker upon the London Stock Exchange. The plaintiff purchased the shares through a broker. The transfer was executed, and the price of the shares was paid upon the delivery of the transfer in accordance with the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange; and this was done before any application could be made by the transferee to the company to register him in respect of the shares. The plaintiff then applied to the company to have his name entered upon the register as the transferee of the shares, but the company declined to register him. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendant to recover back the price paid for the shares, as upon a total failure of consideration.

Held (affirming the judgment of Stephen, J.), that the defendant was not liable, as the contract of sale did not impose upon him the obligation of procuring the registration of the transferee by the company.

Appeal from the judgment of Stephen, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The defendant sold through a broker upon the London Stock Exchange thirty shares in the National Conservative Industrial Dwellings Association (Limited), and the London Founders' Association purchased the shares through their broker upon the Stock Exchange for the sum of £142 10s.

Upon the proper day the name of Palmer was given as the transferee of the shares. The transfer to Palmer was prepared and executed, and the money was paid upon the transfer being handed over, in accordance with the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, and this was done before the transferee could apply to be registered in respect of the shares. An application was thereupon made by Palmer to the National Conservative Dwellings Association to have his name entered upon the register of members in respect of the shares, but the directors declined to register him. By the articles of association of the National Conservative Dwellings Association the directors might, in their discretion, decline to register as a member any person claiming shares by transfer.

The plaintiffs, the London Founders' Association and Palmer, brought this action to recover back the money paid for the shares. Stephen, J., gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff Palmer appealed. Palmer was throughout the case treated as the real plaintiff in the action.

H. F. Dickens and W. E. Gordon, for the appellant.—A share in a company is a right to receive certain benefits from the company, and to do certain acts as a member of the company, and to be under certain liabilities: Colonial Bank v. Whinney, 33 W. R. 852, at p. 857, 30 Ch. D. 261, at p. 286, 34 W. R., at p. 707, 11 App. Cas., at p. 438. A shareholder has a status in the company in the above sense: Emmerson's case, 14 W. R. 905, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 433. The cases of Wilkinson v. Lloyd, 7 Q. B. 27; and Bermingham v. Sheridan, 12 W. R. 658, 33 Beav. 660, show that a contract for the sale of shares implies a condition subsequent that the purchaser shall be registered as a member. If the purchaser cannot obtain registration, he does not obtain what he contracted for—namely, a certain status in the company and as the contract is entire he can recover the price paid. The transfer is not the contract; the contract is not complete until registration. There is no distinction between a Stock Exchange contract and any other. The Stock Exchange rules regulate the mode of transfer, but do not affect the contract itself. The decision in Stray v. Russell, 7 W. R. 641, 1 E. & E. 888, in the Court of Queen's Bench is against this view, but the Exchequer Chamber (8 W. R. 240, 1 E. & E. 916) did not adopt the judgment upon that ground.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This was a contract made upon the Stock Exchange with respect to the sale of certain shares in a limited company. By their articles of association the company may, in their discretion, decline to register the name of any transferee of shares. The contract was made between brokers upon the Stock Exchange, and I shall treat the case as if the present dispute was between the parties who had instructed the brokers. The plaintiff was the purchaser through a broker, the defendant was the seller through a broker. The transfer to the plaintiff was executed and handed over to the plaintiff's broker, and thereupon, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, the agreed price was paid. The plaintiff's name was taken to the company for registration, and they declined to register it. This action was then brought to recover back the money paid for the shares. It was contended for the plaintiff that, although the transfere was to pay for the shares at the time the tranafer was handed over, which was done before his name was taken to the company for registration, yet there is implied in the contract a condition subsequent that if the company for any reason refuses to register the transferee, the contract is to be considered at an end, and the money is to be repaid, upon the ground of a total failure of consideration. That proposition depends upon two questions—Was there implied in the contract such a condition subsequent? and, if so, was there a total failure of consideration? It is unnecessary for us to consider the second question, because at this date it would be wrong to throw any doubt upon this, that in the case of a contract for the purchase of shares upon the Stock Exchange no such condition subsequent can be implied, the vendor not undertaking, absolutely, that the purchaser or his nominee will be registered by the company.

Now, in 1859 that very point came before the Court of Queen's Bench in Stray v. Russell. When the case of Wilkinson v. Lloyd was cited and relied upon for the plaintiff, Lord Campbell said (1 E. & E. 897): "You have to show that the vendor here was equally bound, as was the vendor in that case, to obtain the directors' consent." In delivering judgment he showed the distinction between Wilkinson v. Lloyd and the case then before the court, and proceeded (7 W. R. 642, 1 E. & E. 900): "Here the purchase of shares in a joint stock banking company was made at the request of the plaintiff by a broker on the Stock Exchange in London, and the contract must be considered as made with reference to all the established usages of the Stock Exchange. . . . According to these usages, the price of the shares is payable on the one broker handing over to the other the transfers and certificates. What does the vendor contract to sell and deliver? Genuine transfers and certificates, with the interests and rights which they convey. There might be a condition subsequent imposing upon the vendor the onus of procuring the consent of the directors to the transfer; but I find no evidence of such a condition." It was upon that ground that he distinguished the case from Wilkinson v. Lloyd. Crompton, J., also says (7 W. R. 644, 1 E. & E. 913): "In the first place, I am not satisfied that, according to the contract, the defendant engaged that the banking company should accept the plaintiff as a member of the co-partnership. By the contract, as explained by the usage of the Stock Exchange, the name was to be given on a certain day, so that the vendor might get the transfer made out to the vendee or to his nominee, and he was then to hand over the transfers and certificates of shares, and to receive his money; and there is nothing that satisfies me that anything more was to be done by the vendor. . . . The fact of the payment having to be made on the handing over the certificates and transfers, and the practice stated as to no prior consent being ever asked for, and as to no assent being ever refused, make it very probable that the vendee in such case bargains only for the delivery of the shares and transfers, and takes the chance of getting himself or his nominee or sub-vendee accepted and registered." He then refers to Wilkinson v. Lloyd, and proceeds: "But whatever may have been the case of the purchase of the partnership shares in the mines (real property to some extent) in that case, on a sale between the parties not according to any course of business on the Stock Exchange, I can make no such assumption in the present case, where the sale was according to the regulations of the Stock Exchange, which made the price payable on handing over the shares and transfers, and according to which it is at least probable that the vendee was to take upon himself the duty of getting the transfers completed and the shares registered, and where, from the nature of the transaction, it seems to me very unlikely that the vendor should undertake for the acceptance of any particular name or person, when he may have been entirely ignorant, at the time of the contract, of the name and responsibility of the intended transferee." The court decided that the vendor did not undertake to obtain the purchaser's registration. What was said about the plaintiff not being ready and willing to perform the contract, and about his knowledge of all the facts at the time the money was paid, only formed alternative grounds for the judgment. That was a decision upon an every-day mercantile contract, and even if we could not agree with it, we could not, nearly thirty years afterwards, in the face of the well-known rule by which we are guided, overrule it, when it must have formed the basis upon which a number of other Stock Exchange contracts have since been made. However, I think that view of the Queen's Bench was confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber. Williams, J., in delivering the judgment, said: "We all think that construing the contract in this case by the usage of the Stock Exchange, subject to which it was made, there was no undertaking by the vendor of the shares to obtain absolutely the consent of the directors to the transfer." That expressly negatives both the argument in that case and the argument addressed to us. There is no doubt that the vendor must not prevent, or do anything to prevent, the company from accepting the purchaser or his nominee; but it was not suggested that there was anything of the sort here. I do not wish to rely upon the company having the option of refusing to register a transferee; the result would be the same if the company had not the option. In my opinion, the vendor does not stipulate that the company will accept the purchaser or his nominee. He does not take that responsibility. He only agrees to hand over the transfers and certificates. I entirely agree with the decision in Stray v. Russell. Looking at this as a matter of business, it would be most foolish and improper for a man selling shares upon the Stock Exchange to agree to such a condition. I cannot conceive how anyone can be assumed to agree to it, and it is impossible to imply it. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I also agree that this appeal fails. The first subject for inquiry is as to the nature of the contract. It was a contract for the sale of shares according to the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, the shares requiring registration and the company having power in their discretion to decline to register. It was argued for the plaintiff that under the contract the purchaser, on the one hand, agreed to pay for the shares, and the vendor, on the other hand, agreed that the purchaser should become the registered owner of the shares, and, that being so, the purchaser had a right to rescind the contract and recover back his money upon the refusal of the company to register him, upon the ground that there was a total failure of consideration. The other view of the contract is that the vendor agreed upon payment of the purchase-money to hand over, to use the language of Lord Campbell in Stray v. Russell, genuine transfers and certificates, with the interests and rights which they convey. These are the two views of the contract, and we have to determine which is the right one. The machinery of the Stock Exchange affords a strong argument to show that the latter is the true view. According to the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, the name of the proposed transferee must be given on a certain day to enable the vendor to make out the transfer, and payment is to be made upon the transfer being executed and handed over. All this takes place before the purchaser applies to have his name entered on the register. The fact of the money passing before the application for registration, is strong to show that the obligation to procure the registration is no part of the contract which the vendor has entered into. For this reason, I am of opinion that the plaintiff fails. However, in addition to this, we have a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Stray v. Russell pronounced twenty-nine years ago. I should be very sorry to disturb that decision, upon the faith of which thousands of contracts must have been made. Mr. Dickens placed before us certain considerations to show that that decision was wrong. He instanced the case of an assignment of a lease where the lessor's consent was necessary. But there the lessor's consent must be obtained before the assignment, and without it the assignment could not be made. It is, therefore, a condition precedent to the execution of the assignment, while in this case the directors' acceptance of the transferee's name was not a condition of the contract at all. Nor also as to the decision in Wilkinson v. Lloyd, which was relied upon. The court there held that in that case, which was not the case of a sale of shares on the Stock Exchange, the consent of the directors was a condition precedent to the transfer being effectual, and without such consent there was a total failure of consideration. That being my view of the contract, it is unnecessary to go into the second inquiry as to whether, if such a condition were implied in the contract, there was a total failure of consideration.

Lindley, L.J.—In my opinion, the duty of the vendor is to hand over the securities at the time fixed by the rules of the Stock Exchange. He must execute a proper transfer. He must pay all calls due before the contract of sale was entered into. It is said, however, that he has a further duty—namely, to obtain the directors' acceptance of the purchaser's name for registration—and that if the directors decline to register the name, the purchaser can recover the price paid for the shares. It is sufficient for me to say that I cannot read any such condition subsequent into the contract, and for this conclusion Stray v. Russell is a good authority. In my opinion, the vendor does not undertake to procure the acceptance and registration of the purchaser by the directors.

Mayor, &c., of Bury v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. (a.)

Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 46—Railway company—"Bridge"—Repair of road carried by bridge.

A railway company which has carried a road over the railway by a bridge is bound, under section 46 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to repair and maintain the road over the bridge as well as the actual structure of the bridge.

Appeal from a divisional court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.).

The action was brought for work done and materials provided by the plaintiffs in paving and flagging a railway bridge in Manchester-road, Bury.

A special case was, under ord. 34, r. 1, stated for the opinion of the court.

It appeared that the plaintiffs were the urban sanitary authority for the borough of Bury.

The defendants, acting in pursuance of powers given to them by their private Acts (which incorporated the Railways Clauses Act, 1845), in 1847 extended their railway to Bury, and in so doing passed under the turnpike road in a deep cutting. They accordingly supported the turnpike road, the level of which was unaltered, by two arches which constitute the bridge in question. It was admitted that the road had not been either widened or lengthened by the construction of the railway, and that no additional burden or expense in respect of the maintenance and repair of the roadway had been cast upon the plaintiffs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the defendants were liable, under the provisions of section 46 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, to keep the roadway of the bridge in repair.

The Divisional Court held themselves bound by authority, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

By section 46, "If the line of railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway or the railway shall be carried over such road by means of a bridge of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided, and such bridge, with the immediate approaches and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed, and at all times thereafter maintained, at the expense of the company."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Henn Collins, Q.C. (W. Graham with them), for the defendants.—We are liable to repair the bridge, but not the road carried by the bridge. There is, no doubt, authority against us, but it is not binding on this court: Leech v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 8 W. R. 216, 5 H. & N. 160; North Staffordshire Railway Co. v. Dale, 8 E. & B. 836, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 89; Waterford and Limerick Railway Co. v. Kearney, 12 Ir. C. L. Rep. 224; Fosberry v. Waterford Railway Co., 13 Ir. C. L. Rep. 494; London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Skerton, 5 B. & S. 559; Reg. v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 32 L. T. 858, 23 W. R. Dig. 203. Section 46 must be read with sections 50—56. Section 53 applies to the maintenance of a road. The bridge in section 46 is only intended to carry the road, and does not include it. Here the road was carried over at a level, and there was no ascent or descent. Therefore this case does not come within section 46 at all.

(a.) Reported by A. P. Percival Kemp, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. S. Wright, for the plaintiffs, referred to Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Hackney Board of Works, 31 W. R. 769, 8 App. Cas. 687.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I find that no less than sixteen judges have construed section 46 according to the plain meaning of plain English words. Even if I had any doubt on the subject myself—and I have none—I should be very slow to overrule them. The section deals specifically with a very plain state of things. If it stood alone there could be no doubt whatever of its meaning; but it is said that it must be read in conjunction with other sections which, although they are equally clear by themselves, yet if they are taken as referring to the same subject-matter as section 46, become also obscure. I think section 46 must be read by itself, and that it is the only section referring to the state of affairs in the present case. It is clear that whatever the company are bound by the section to execute, that they are also bound to maintain for ever. Now, is it not clear that where, as in this case, the road is carried over the railway, the railway company are bound to construct both the structure of the bridge and the road upon it? They have, as it were, to replace the road by a bridge. It has been contended that the word "bridge" does not include road, and that the bridge has only to carry the road. I do not think that is so. I think "bridge" must be read in the ordinary sense, which includes the road upon the bridge. That is, therefore, what the railway company are bound to execute, and that, therefore, is what they have to maintain. It is true that other sections of the Act have words which refer to bridges, but I do not think they refer to such a bridge as there is here. I do not think the general words used in those sections can in any way affect the specific enactment in section 46. I, therefore, feel no doubt on the subject. I think that the decision of the court below must be affirmed.

Fry, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It would, I think, be extremely difficult to overrule such a long line of decision. But I myself should have arrived at the same conclusion if the question was a new one. The section states the contingency to which the enactment applies. Mr. Henn Collins has urged that the contingency as there described does not cover this case, and that the section has no application when the road is carried over the railway at a level, although on a bridge, there being no ascent or descent. I think that is an idle distinction, and that all that is meant by ascent and descent in the section is to limit the amount of such ascent and descent, if any. Then it was urged that "bridge" did not include the road over the bridge. It has been, I think, part of the law of England that a bridge is part of a highway, being, in fact, the road supported on arches. The statute 22 Hen. 8, c. 5, is indeed silent on this point, but it is conceded that it did include road in the word "bridge." Then what is the meaning of "approaches"? It has been gravely argued that they do not include roadway. Surely the meaning is something by which the bridge may be approached by the kind of traffic generally using the highway. So also as to necessary works. They must be works to enable vehicular traffic to get to the bridge with safety and convenience, works which are necessary to the bridge as a useful and convenient part of the highway. There can be no doubt that metalling the roadway of the bridge and the approaches is so necessary. I do not think the other sections which have been cited apply to this case. It is covered by section 46, and I hold the plain meaning of that section to be that the railway company are bound to execute, and, therefore, to maintain, the roadway of the bridge as well as the actual structure.

Lopes, L.J.—It appears to me idle to contend that "bridge" in section 46 does not include roadway. The subsequent sections do not seem to me to apply, and cannot be called in aid to vary the plain meaning of section 46. Nor do I think the argument that the section does not apply to a level bridge is tenable. A road is carried over a railway just as much by a bridge on a level as if it were by an ascent and descent. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Republic of Peru v. Dreyfus & Co. (a.)

Foreign country—Contract with Government of—Agreement to be bound by laws of—De facto Government of, recognized by Government of contractor's country—Validity of acts of de facto Government unless ratified by subsequent de jure Government.

The defendants, who were French subjects, contracted with the Peruvian Goverment for the purchase of guano, and agreed to be bound by the tribunals of Peru. Disputes arose on matters of account, and the matter was compromised between the defendants, who consented to this course, and the de facto Government of Peru of the Dictator, Senor Pierola, which had been recognized by the French Government. After many years' litigation against other parties in other English courts, the defendants recovered a large sum to which they were entitled under the compromise, and this sum was still in court. The plaintiffs, who were the de jure Government of Peru, reconstituted in 1886, did not interfere in those proceedings, but they now moved to restrain the defendants from taking the money out of court, on the ground that the compromise was void unless ratified by the de jure Government when restored.

Held, that it was a question of international law that the acts of the de facto Government towards foreigners by whose Government it had been recognized did not require ratification and could not be repudiated by the de jure Government; that the compromise was therefore valid; and that, taking into consideration the balance of convenience and the attitude of the Peruvian Government during the recent litigation, and the fact that Senor Pierola's Government could not have recovered the money, the motion must be dismissed, with costs.

Motion.

This was a motion to restrain the defendants from taking out of court a sum of £200,256 6s. 1d. Consols to which they had been declared entitled in an action, Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., and the question in dispute was whether the present Government of the Republic of Peru was, as against Dreyfus & Co., who were French subjects, bound by the Acts of the de facto Government of Signor Pierola, Dictator of Peru from 1879 to 1881, which Government had been recognized by France; or whether Dreyfus & Co. had not, by agreeing to be bound by the laws of Peru, precluded themselves from claiming protection as foreigners, in which case a compromise entered into between them and Senor

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pierola would be an internal act of State and void unless confirmed by the de jure Government on its restoration.

The material facts, as stated by Kay, J., were as follows:—In the year 1869 Messrs. Dreyfus & Co. entered into a contract with the then Government of Peru, under certain conditions expressed in a memorandum dated the 19th of August, 1869, which was signed in Paris on the 5th of July, 1869, for the purchase of 2,000,000 tons of guano at the price of 36 soles 50 cents per ton, and article 33 of that contract provided thus:—"All the differences to which the present contract may give rise shall be decided by the tribunals of the Republic of Peru. Dreyfus Bros. & Co. bind themselves to submit to the decision of the said tribunals, but they reserve to themselves on their part the exclusive right of submitting to the respective tribunals of the country of every consignment, whether directly or by the medium of the fiscal agent who may present himself to the Government, every difficulty which may occur or arise with the consignees in the course and for the execution of this contract."

By further agreements of the 17th of August, 1869, and the 14th of April, 1874, the contract was modified so as to make the price per ton which defendants were to pay variable, and a dispute afterwards arose between the defendants and the Peruvian Government as to the amount actually due from one to the other of them, the defendants claiming against the Government some four millions English money, while, on the other hand, the Government, upon an investigation of the accounts to which the defendants were not parties, claimed that nothing was due from them to the defendants, but that, on the contrary, the defendants were indebted to the Government in a sum of about £100,000. This result was stated in a document called a decree or resolution of the Government, dated the 7th of June, 1878, which is at page 16 of the book of documentary evidence. Against this Messrs. Dreyfus energetically protested, but no proceeding was taken either by them or by the Government to submit their difference to the tribunals of the Republic of Peru.

In this state of things, a war having broken out between Peru and Chili in April, 1879, Senor Nicolas de Pierola, on the 23rd of December, 1879, became dictator in Peru, the previously existing Government of that country being overthrown.

On the 13th of April, 1880, Senor Pierola was recognised by this country as the supreme ruler of Peru, and he was also recognized by the Government of France and other European States. Senor Pierola entered into negotiations with Messrs. Dreyfus, his first object, which, however, does not seem to have been successful, being obviously to raise money, by their assistance, for the purpose of the de facto Government of Peru, and especially to carry on the war.

A correspondence as to this is set out at page 45 of the book.

In 1880, during his dictatorship, eleven ships were being loaded with guano, which was to be dispatched to the Peruvian Guano Co. before mentioned; but, a dispute having arisen with that company, the bills of lading were sent to the financial agent of the Republic in Europe, with instructions that if the Peruvian Guano Co. refused to indorse them the cargoes were to be applied in payment to Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers, with whom a contract had been entered into by the Government of Senor Pierola dated the 7th of January, 1880. This contract purported to be made in order to put an end to the questions which had arisen between them and the Government of Peru. By it the parties agreed to cancel the previous contract of the 14th of April, 1874, and taking as a basis the claim of Messrs. Dreyfus—that is, the four millions of money—Messrs. Dreyfus were to export the number of tons of guano sufficient to cover the said balance and to credit it in account at the price which the new guano contractor might pay, and for want of any contract, at £5 sterling per ton. The transaction was to be a complete alienation of the guano, subject only to a condition, in order to prevent undue competition, for sale only in France and Belgium. The statements of account issued by the previous Administrations of Peru were not to be taken as final, but the decision of such accounts was to be given by the tribunals of Peru within the maximum term of six months.

On the 4th of June, 1880, the then Government of Peru, in pursuance of a decree of Senor Pierola as Supreme Chief of the Republic, with the unanimous submission of the Council of Secretaries of State and the consent of Messrs. Dreyfus, settled the account between the Government of Peru and Messrs. Dreyfus at £2,583,764 10s. due to them, thus reducing their claim by more than £1,400,000.

Other communications passed, but finally the amount due from the Government of Peru to Messrs. Dreyfus was agreed at a sum which the moneys they have recovered in the action against the Peruvian Guano Co. will not be sufficient to pay. The bills of lading of the eleven ships were handed to Messrs. Dreyfus, and in 1880 they commenced the action against the Peruvian Guano Co. to recover the cargoes of the eleven ships of guano, which action has now been decided in favour of Messrs. Dreyfus.

In November, 1881, Senor Pierola resigned, and, after an interval, in June, 1886, the Government of Peru was reconstituted in the form in which it had existed previously to his dictatorship.

On the 24th of October, 1886, the present Government passed a law declaring void all the internal acts of Government done by Senor Pierola.

The short result of these facts is this:—At the time when Senor Pierola seized upon the supreme power, there was a question pending between Messrs. Dreyfus and the Peruvian Government as to the result of the accounts of their dealings in guano under the first contract. By article 33 of that contract this question was to be settled by the tribunals of Peru. With the assent of Messrs. Dreyfus this provision was waived, and the amount due was settled by Senor Pierola's Government reducing the claim of Messrs. Dreyfus by more than £1,400,000. To this settlement Messrs. Dreyfus assented. They were not subjects of the State of Peru, but of France. The French Government had recognized Senor Pierola's Government as the de facto Government of Peru. Senor Pierola made provision for paying this amount by consigning fresh cargoes of guano to Messrs. Dreyfus. They have recovered these cargoes after long litigation with the Peruvian Guano Co., who claimed them, and the present Government of Peru are now seeking to deprive them of moneys, the proceeds of these cargoes, on the ground that by the law of Peru the arrangement with Senor Pierola's Government was void.

Bigby, Q.C., Bramwell Davis, and G. M. Ballou, for the motion.—In 1878 there was nothing due by us to the defendants; on the contrary, they owed us a large sum. Senor Pierola, of his own authority and without the intervention of the ordinary tribunals, compromised the claims and agreed that we were indebted to the defendants. He was a mere usurper, and all the internal acts of his Government were void unless ratified by the de jure Government on its restoration. This compromise was not ratified, and is void. It is not a question of international law, as the defendants agreed to be bound by the law of Peru. Senor Pierola had no power to release them from that agreement and settle the dispute himself.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and M. Ingle Joyce, for Dreyfus & Co.—It is a question of international law. We are French subjects, and the French Government recognized that of Senor Pierola as the de facto Government of Peru. After that recognition a de jure Government could not annul the acts of the de facto Government as between Peru and French subjects: Republic of Peru v. The Peruvian Guano Co., ante, p. 217, 36 Ch. Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20.—Kay, J.—By the motion in this case the Republic of Peru seek to restrain the defendants, Messrs. Dreyfus & Co., who are subjects of France, carrying on a large financial business in Paris, from taking out of court certain moneys which are standing to the credit of another action in this court—Dreyfus v. The Peruvian Guano Co.—in which the rights of these defendants, Messrs. Dreyfus & Co., to such moneys were established as between them and the Peruvian Guano Co. The present plaintiffs, the Republic of Peru, were not parties to that action. They watched the progress of it, and counsel attended on their behalf at the trial to observe what might take place. When I understood the object of the motion and the nature of the questions involved I suggested that the motion should stand till the trial, and that either party should have liberty to apply to advance such trial, the money being kept in court in the meantime. The defendants were not unwilling to assent to this if such trial could be arranged to come on within three months, and if the plaintiffs would agree that in case any further evidence was wanted as to Peruvian law the witnesses should be produced in court to avoid the expense of a commission to Peru. To this, however, the plaintiffs, the Peruvian Government, declined to assent. The defendants, Messrs. Dreyfus & Co., have been litigating with the Peruvian Guano Co. for about eight years, and the Peruvian Government during all that time have not intervened until, on the 22nd of November, 1886, they issued the writ in this action. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] It is difficult to see how this can be determined by the law of Peru. It is a question of international law of the highest importance whether or not the citizens of a foreign State may safely have such dealings as existed in this case with a Government which such State has recognized. If they may not, of what value to the citizens of a foreign State is such recognition by its Government? There have been successive Governments in European countries—usurpations of the power of previous Governments overthrown, altering the constitution essentially. These have in turn been recognized by this and other nations. When the Government of this country recognized the third Emperor of the French, if any Englishman entered into contracts with his Government, could it be maintained that the validity of such contracts must depend upon the law of France as settled by decree of the Republic which was established on his deposition? Obviously it would follow that no Englishman could safely contract with the present Government of France, or, indeed, with any existing Government, lest it in turn should be displaced by another Government which might treat its acts as void. There is no authority for any such proposition. I must take the law to be that the Englishman or Frenchman might safely contract with Senor Pierola's Government, if not before, at any rate after, it was recognized by the Governments of England and France respectively. But an agreement between the Government of Peru and Messrs. Dreyfus containing a clause like article 33 of the original contract, submitting all questions upon such contract to the tribunals of Peru, might, of course, be modified by assent of both contracting parties, or of one of such parties and another Government who had succeeded to the rights of the former Government. If Senor Pierola's Government had succeeded to the rights of the former Government of Peru, of course a new convention between this Government and Messrs. Dreyfus modifying the contract in this respect would be as valid as if entered into with the Government who made the contract originally. This is what actually occurred. Senor Pierola's Government did settle with Messrs. Dreyfus the amount to be paid to them under the original agreement, without resort to the tribunals of Peru, just as the original contracting parties might have done. How can that be invalidated? Only by showing that Senor Pierola's Government had no authority—that is, that it was not for the time being the Government of Peru. But that question, as far as Messrs. Dreyfus are concerned, is settled by the recognition of Senor Pierola's Government by France, and is in no sense a question of the law which the Republic of Peru may now think fit to recognise. The decisions on the subject are completely in accordance with the law as I have stated it. I prefer to look somewhat further than the few cases cited at the bar; but all the authorities to which I shall refer are within the last 100 years. There has been in the history of the world during that period many revolutions and usurpations of supreme power among civilized nations who recognize international law. The plaintiffs' counsel have been unable to cite, nor can I find, any authority whatever in favour of their contention.

There is a case, Barclay v. Russell, 3 Ves. 424, in 1797, after the acknowledgment by this country of the independence of the United States, which was in 1783. In that state of things Lord Eldon refused to recognize the right of the United States of America to certain property in this country, consisting of bank stock, which had been purchased by the Government of Maryland in the names of trustees in this country before the war. America, upon the ground that the rights of Maryland in its former condition existed under letters patent granted by the Crown of England, and had not passed to the new State of Maryland. That State had, by the treaty of peace, passed an Act discharging the trustees, and appointing new trustees, and directing transfer of the bank stock in this country. [His lordship read part of Lord Eldon's judgment, and proceeded:—] And his lordship held that, the specific execution of the trust having become impossible, the right to dispose of the money was vested in the Crown.

In a later case of Dolder v. Lord Huntingfield, 11 Ves. 283, Lord Eldon explains that decision by stating that Maryland was only a corporation under the Great Seal of England, and was dissolved by means which the court of justice in this country was obliged to consider rebellious, and that therefore such court could not admit that the title passed to the independent State of America by an act which we were obliged to consider rebellion. But in the case then before him, which was a claim by the Republic of Switzerland to certain moneys which had been remitted by some of the cantons to this country before the consolidation of the Republic in 1798, Lord Eldon said: "This is perfectly different; no offence has been committed against this country by the dissolution of the former Government or the arrangement of the present Government in Switzerland. The question is, therefore, to be determined upon great principles of the law of nations without alluding to the situation of the defendants as subjects of this country." The defendants in that case were the agents of the Bank of England and the South Sea Co., to whom the property had been remitted. And the matter came on upon exceptions to their answers. Lord Eldon's opinion, as I have read it, was clear that the rights of the Swiss Govern-meet over the property in question must be determined by international law.

In The City of Berne, in Switzerland v. The Bank of England, 9 Ves. 347, Lord Eldon refused to grant an injunction to restrain the Bank of England from permitting a transfer of certain funds standing in their names under a purchase by the old Government of Berne before the Revolution expressly on the ground that the existing Government of Switzerland, not having been acknowledged by the Government of this country, could not be noticed by this court, his lordship stating that whether the foreign Government is recognized or not is matter of public notoriety.

It appears from the note 9 Ves. 348 that this was followed in 1823 in a suit instituted by persons representing themselves as the Columbian Government, which was not recognized by the Government of this country. There are decisions that a government not so recognized cannot sue in the courts of a foreign country.

In Gilton v. Hoyt, 3 Wheaton's Rep. 246, 324, in the Supreme Court of the United States, the law is stated thus: "No doctrine is better established than that it belongs exclusively to governments to recognize new States in the revolutions which may occur in the world, and until such recognitions, either by our own Government or the Government to which the new State belonged, courts of justice are bound to consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered. This was expressly held by this court in the case of Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, 241, and to that decision on that point we adhere. And the same doctrine is clearly sustained by the judgment of foreign tribunals: The Manilla, Edwards Rep. 1; The City of Berne v. The Bank of England."

The case of The Manilla there referred to, and another case in the same book, The Pelican, Edward's Rep. App. D., were with reference to vessels which had been captured during the war with France on voyages from Port au Prince, in St. Domingo. That part of the island had revolted against France, and maintained an independent government. This had been, to some extent, recognized by Orders in Council in this country which did not expressly refer to Port au Prince, but Sir William Scott and Sir W. Grant, in these two cases, held that recognition sufficient to prevent the captures being good, on the ground that the ships were trading to and not of their own country from a colonial port of the enemy. The port, after that recognition, could not be treated as a port of the enemy.

In The United States of America v. McRae, 17 W. R. 764, L. R. 8 Eq. 69, James, L.J., then Eq., says:—[His lordship read part of the judgment, and also an extract from Wheaton's International Law, 2nd ed., p. 41, and continued:—] This distinguishes the dealings as to the public property of a State between the State and its own subjects from similar dealings with foreigners, which the succeeding Government, by international law, must treat as valid. Another objection was urged against this motion to which I have not heard any satisfactory answer. The plaintiffs are seeking to prevent the defendants from receiving the proceeds of eleven cargoes of guano which were consigned to them on certain terms by Senor Pierola's Government, disregarding the terms on which the consignment was made. In United States v. McRae a similar claim was made to goods which the rebellious States of America had sent to a citizen of this country. The rebellious States had been countenanced by the United States Government; they had never been recognized by England's Government. Yet it was held, and the decision has not been questioned, that the contract under which the goods were sent must be recognized, and that they could not be recovered in violation of that contract. It was not contended that the United States were entitled to all public property belonging to the rebellious States; but where these States had dealt for value with citizens of another country, such property could not be recovered by treating the contract as void. In a litigation with the foreigner, party to the contract, they must adopt the contract and merely take such rights as the de facto Government of the rebel States might have had under it.

This doctrine is recognized in some of the other citations already made, especially in the judgment of James, L.J., in United States of America v. McRae. It was applied even in the case of rebel States which had not been recognized by this court. It follows à fortiori in this case that the Republic of Peru can only recover the proceeds of the eleven cargoes of guano if Senor Pierola's Government could have done so. That Government certainly could not have recovered them in violation of its own contract, as the Republic of Peru are now seeking to do. The duty of the court upon a motion like this is to consider, upon the evidence before it, whether the plaintiffs show a probable case for relief at the hearing. If they do not, the court should be very reluctant to interfere with the rights of the defendants by interlocutory injunction. I am bound to say that I see no such case. If this were the trial I should decide against the plaintiffs without the slightest hesitation, and, as no facts are in dispute, and the law of Peru seems to me not to be in question, I cannot anticipate that the plaintiff's case may be improved at the trial. Another most important consideration is the relative convenience or inconvenience to the parties of granting or withholding an injunction. Where the plaintiffs do make out a probable case for ultimate relief, or where the evidence leaves this so much in doubt that the court must see there is a serious question of difficulty to try, then this matter of convenience becomes of paramount importance. I cannot think that to be the case here. But, if I must consider it, these are the facts. The sum in court in the other action is something more than £200,000 Consols. Of this amount about £100,000 may now, I understand, be taken out by the Messrs. Dreyfus under the final judgment in that action. They have been litigating the matter for eight years, during most part of which time the Peruvian Government have been passive but interested lookers-on. To retain in court £100,000, even if the interest at three per cent. were allowed to Messrs. Dreyfus, must occasion to a mercantile house a most serious inconvenience and loss. It has not been suggested that Messrs. Dreyfus will not be perfectly able to meet any claim made by the Peruvian Government in this action, if it should be established against them. The Peruvian Government have declined the offer which would have enabled me to advance the trial; and, after hearing the motion, the duty of the court to other suitors prevents it from allowing such precedence. The suit may drag on and not be finally decided for a long time. If the money be impounded, the Peruvian Government will have no particular interest in expediting matters, and will obtain a great advantage against the defendants to which, in my opinion, they have no right. They have given security for costs to a considerable amount, but whether it will cover the costs actually incurred already may be doubted. The balance of convenience and inconvenience is, I think, decidedly against granting the injunction. After full consideration, I think it the duty of the court not to encourage this litigation in any way, but to refuse the motion. And I also think the application so ill-founded that the defendants ought not to be subjected to further litigation unless the plaintiffs are ordered to pay the costs of this motion. I think it my duty to refuse the motion, with costs.

ROGERS v. DRURY. (a.)

Covenant in restraint of trade—Medical practice—Competition.

An agreement for the sale of a practice between two medical practitioners contained a covenant by the vendor not to solicit any patient within a certain radius, or otherwise directly or indirectly to enter into competition with the purchaser.

Held, that, the object of the covenant being to protect the business bought and paid for, the covenant was not confined to active competition, but prohibited the vendor coming into the defined area, thereby diminishing the purchaser's fair chance of obtaining a business.

An agreement between medical practitioners, whereby the plaintiff purchased from the defendant a practice within a certain radius. The agreement provided that the defendant would not practise or reside within such radius, or in any other manner whatsoever, directly or indirectly, enter into competition with the plaintiff in the practice or profession of a physician, surgeon, or accoucheur within such radius. By the agreement the defendant was to be at liberty to commence and carry on a new practice on his own account, and for his own benefit, outside the radius, and was also to be entitled to retain certain excepted patients, who were mentioned by name.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had attended patients within the radius other than those mentioned in the agreement. The defendant said that he had not solicited such patients, who came to him voluntarily, and he absolutely denied active competition.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain a breach of the agreement under the circumstances aforesaid.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and McSwinney, for the defendant.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the facts are, speaking generally, admitted. Moreover, there is no question as to the validity of the covenant, and all I have to ascertain is its meaning. The defendant says there has been no competition, because there cannot be competition without solicitation, and he also says that the competition contemplated by the agreement must be active competition. Neither of these propositions can be maintained. It is important to ascertain what is the object of the covenant. Its object is to protect the practice purchased. The agreement contains divers clauses to secure this object, and amongst them is this covenant. I decline to draw a distinction between active and passive competition. The covenant is not to enter into any competition in any way whatever. What I have to do is to give each of its terms its full and appropriate meaning, and doing this, and bearing in mind the object of the covenant, I think that it is clearly infringed, for it appears to me that the vendor, by coming into the area of the practice, is acting most injuriously towards the plaintiff, and, to my mind, diminishes the plaintiff's fair chance of obtaining that which he has purchased. The defendant has said that the patients would not have called in the plaintiff in any circumstances. To this it can be answered that there might be circumstances under which it would be most important to call in the doctor on the spot, and the skill of the plaintiff is not questioned.

Motion allowed, with costs.

KYSHE v. ALTURAS GOLD CO. (a.)

Company—Director—Exclusion by co-directors—Injunction.

An injunction will be granted in an action by a director of a company against his co-directors to restrain them from excluding him from acting as director, although, in the opinion of the directors, he is unfit to be a director of the company by reason of alleged misconduct.

Motion.

The action was brought by John B. Kyshe, a director of the Alturas Gold (Limited), against the Alturas Gold (Limited), and J. R. Armitage, F. Hodgkinson, W. A. Ellis, and G. Forman, the other directors of the company, both as directors and in their personal capacities, for (1) a declaration that the plaintiff was a director of the company and entitled to all the rights and privileges of a director, including the attending, voting at, and taking part in, all meetings of the board of directors of the company; (2) delivery to the plaintiff of certificates for 500 shares in the company agreed to be allotted to him, and payment of fees due to him; (3) an injunction to restrain the defendants, J. R. Armitage, F. Hodgkinson, W. A. Ellis, and G. Forman, or any of them, from excluding the plaintiff from any meeting of the said board of directors of the company and from holding any meetings of the said board without notice to him, and from in any way interfering with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as director.

The plaintiff had been duly elected a director of the company by the other directors, in accordance with the articles of association, which also contained an express provision for the removal of a director, before the expiration of his period of office, by a special resolution of the shareholders, at a meeting of the company.

The motion was made by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendants, other than the company, until the trial of the action or further order from excluding the plaintiff from any meeting of the board of directors of the company, and from holding any meetings of the board without notice to the plaintiff, and from in any way interfering with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as a director of the company.

Evidence was produced on behalf of the directors that the plaintiff had received his shares in the company which qualified him to be a director, as a present from the vendor of the property to the company; that he had gone out to America, where the property of the company was situated, to inspect and report upon the management of the business there; that he had at first, acting as was alleged, upon some understanding with the agent of the vendor, sent home favourable reports, but had afterwards quarrelled with the agent and sent home unfavourable reports, which were not warranted by the facts; and that if they had known the plaintiff's real position they would not have elected him a director.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff put a different complexion on his conduct.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Lemon, for the motion.—The defendants have no right to interfere with the plaintiff in the discharge of his duties as a director of the company or exclude him from acting as a director: Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610. [They were stopped by the court.]

Cookson Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and F. B. Palmer, for the defendants.—The plaintiff has been guilty of breach of trust and misfeasance, and has abused his position as agent of the company, and therefore the court will not assist him by an injunction.

They referred to In re Caerphilly Colliery Co., Pearson's case, 25 W. R. 618, 5 Ch. D. 336; In re Western of Canada Oil, Lands, and Works Co., Carling, Hespeler, and Walsh's cases, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115; In re Canadian Oil Works Corporation, Hay's case, 24 W. R. 191, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 593.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The defendants have no right to act as they have done in preventing the plaintiff from acting as director of the company.

North, J.—I should not have heard Mr. Hardy in reply if it had not been that statements were made which he might have wished to refute. The defendant directors were entitled to do everything they legally could do in the interests of the company. But the plaintiff was duly elected a director of the company. He had obtained a sufficient number of shares to qualify him to be a director. The circumstances under which he obtained them might be such as to make him a trustee of the shares for the company; but that does not prevent him from being and acting as a director of the company. It is necessary that a director should have an opportunity of being present at the meetings of the directors to take part in the business transacted by them. But in this case the other directors have taken upon themselves the power of excluding the plaintiff from their meetings and of carrying on the business of the company in his absence, which they have no right to do. The board of directors who manage the business of the company is made up of the whole number of directors, and not a selection from them. It is not in the power of any number of directors to appoint a committee of themselves to transact the business of the company to the exclusion of one of their number. Not that it is necessary that all the directors should be present at their meetings in order that the business of the company may be legally transacted; but every one of them should have the opportunity of being present. The company has the power to remove a director. If the other directors think that one of their number is unfit to act, their course is to bring the case before the shareholders and enable them to take such action as they think proper. Inasmuch as the plaintiff is a legal director, and the other directors exclude him from his legal rights, I must prevent them from doing so. It is said that the plaintiff, if his case were brought before the shareholders, would make statements injurious to the interests of the company; but the directors opposed to him would have the same power of bringing before the shareholders their reasons for what they had done, giving their views of the matter, and explaining the facts. The other directors have no right to take the matter into their own hands and exclude the plaintiff from acting as director; and I must grant the injunction asked for, until the hearing of the action or until further order, but the costs of both parties will be costs of the action.

Practice—Costs—Judgment on admissions—Motion or summons—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 32, r. 6; ord. 40, r. 1.

In an action to restrain the publication of a trade circular, the defendants, by their statement of defence, offered to submit to a perpetual injunction in the terms of an interim injunction which had been previously granted, "to be obtained on a summons to be issued for that purpose." The plaintiffs set the action down on notice of motion for judgment on the admissions in the pleadings, and delivered to the defendants a copy of the minutes of the proposed judgment, which was identical with that to which the defendants had offered to submit.

Held, that, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs ought to have proceeded by summons in chambers, and that, consequently, they would only be allowed such costs as would have been properly incurred if they had proceeded by summons.

Motion for judgment.

This action was brought to restrain the defendants from issuing a certain trade circular, or from making representations similar to those contained in the circular. The writ was issued on the 27th of January, 1887, and on the 25th of February, before the statement of claim, upon an interlocutory motion by the plaintiffs, North, J., granted an injunction, till the trial of the action or further order, in terms not quite as extensive as those claimed by the writ. By their statement of defence, delivered on the 2nd of April, 1887, the defendants offered to submit to a perpetual injunction in the terms of the interim order, "to be obtained on summons issued for that purpose, and they insist that that is the only relief to which the plaintiffs are in any event entitled, and that the plaintiffs ought, if in the result they fail to get any further or other relief, to pay all the costs of the action incurred after the date of the delivery of the defence." The plaintiffs did not apply for a perpetual injunction by summons, but served on the defendants a notice of motion for judgment on the admissions in the pleadings, and delivered to the defendants a copy of minutes of the judgment for which they intended to ask, the terms of which were equivalent to those to which the defendants had by their defence offered to consent. The plaintiffs now moved for judgment on the admissions in the pleadings.

Willis Bund, for the plaintiffs.

Oswald, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs ought to have proceeded by summons in chambers. They ought, therefore, only to have the costs of a summons, and they ought to pay the difference between the costs of a summons and this motion. Rule 6 of order 32 is wider than the old rule 11 of order 40. When there are admissions in pleadings, it is the practice to obtain judgment under ord. 32, r. 6, by motion or summons, and not to set the action down: Hetherington v. Longrigg, 27 W. R. 393, 10 Ch. D. 162. [North, J.—It is the practice now to set the action down.] Your lordship has jurisdiction to give judgment on admissions in chambers, and there was no necessity for the plaintiffs to incur the costs of this motion.

Willis Bund, in reply.—The plaintiffs have adopted the proper course. Rule 1 of order 40 directs that, except where by the Acts and Rules it is otherwise provided, the judgment of the court shall be obtained by motion, and Kay, J., in Cook v. Heynes, W. N., 1884, p. 75, said that the application for judgment under ord. 32, r. 6, should be by motion in court.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

North, J.—In this case, on an interlocutory application by the plaintiffs, I granted an injunction in terms not quite so wide as those claimed by the writ and notice of motion. The plaintiffs, however, accepted the order in that form, and the defendants offered to submit to a perpetual injunction in the terms of the interim order. The words in the statement of defence are:—[His lordship read the words in the statement of defence above set out, and continued:—] The question has been raised whether there is jurisdiction on a summons in chambers to give a judgment founded on admissions in pleadings. This is a case in which the defendants have offered to consent to as much as the plaintiffs now ask for, and I have no doubt whatever that when a defendant appears and consents to an order for a perpetual injunction in chambers, he is as much bound by it as if it had been obtained by an adverse order against him in court. The defendants, in my opinion, are right in their contention, and, therefore, I shall only allow the plaintiffs such costs as would have been incurred by a summons in chambers. The taxing master will decide what are the proper costs of such a summons, but I think the costs ought to include the costs of the minutes of the proposed judgment, because it is important to have a statement in writing of the order consented to. But I am also asked to order the plaintiffs to pay the defendants the extra costs occasioned by the proceedings in court; I clearly have jurisdiction to order such payment, and I should do so if I thought proceedings in court had been adopted for the purpose of making costs. But it does not appear, however, that costs have been incurred oppressively. And there is also a further reason why I should not order the plaintiffs to pay these costs, as, having regard to the case cited of Cook v. Heynes, the plaintiffs had some show of authority for the course they took. Moreover, I think that after the notice of motion the defendants might themselves have applied in chambers for judgment in accordance with their offer.

Sachs v. Spielman. (a.)

Practice—Pleading—Principal and agent—Action for account—Allegation of fraud by plaintiff—Right of defendant to obtain particulars before delivery of defence—Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 19, rr. 6, 7, 26.

In an action by a principal against his agents to open settled accounts, the plaintiff, in his statement of claim, alleged a secret fraud by the defendants, but stated that the particulars of the transactions in which the fraud was committed were known to the defendants, but were not known to the plaintiff. The defendants, before delivering a defence, applied for particulars, but the application was ordered to stand over until a defence had been put in.

A defendant charged with fraud is not in all cases entitled to particulars before he puts in his defence; but a defendant who first puts in his defence does not thereby waive his right to particulars.

The action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as his stockbrokers for an account, payment of what should be found due to him, and damages. The statement of claim, after alleging that the plaintiff had employed the defendants to buy and sell for commission and carry over purchases and sales of stocks, shares, and securities, proceeded as follows:—

"2. The defendants, in breach of the terms of their employment, at the time they purported to act as the plaintiff's agents acted as principals in many of the transactions in which they were employed, and charged the plaintiff with moneys with which they were not entitled to charge him, and did not credit him with moneys with which he was entitled to credit.

"3. The defendants from time to time delivered to the plaintiff accounts containing accounts of such transactions, as if they had been entered into by them for the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of their employment, but in which they or some one or more of them had really acted as principals, and these accounts were from time to time settled by the plaintiff in ignorance of the frauds.

"4. The particulars of such transactions are known to the defendants, but are not known to the plaintiff, and until the plaintiff has obtained discovery and inspection of the defendants' books and other documents, and examined the defendants by interrogatories, he cannot state the particulars of such transactions."

The defendants, not having delivered a statement of defence, took out a summons in chambers asking that the plaintiff might be ordered to deliver, within seven days, particulars of the transactions in which the defendants had acted as principals when they purported to act as agents, and of the transactions in which the defendants had charged the plaintiff with moneys with which they were not entitled to charge him, and did not credit him with moneys for which he was entitled to credit, or, in the alternative, that paragraph 2 of the statement of claim might be struck out as embarrassing, and that the defendants might have a month's further time to deliver their defence after delivery of such particulars, but the summons was ordered to stand over until seven days after a statement of defence had been delivered.

This was a motion by the defendants to discharge the order made in chambers, and that an order might be made in terms of the summons, with a further alternative that the action might be dismissed on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action and was frivolous and vexatious.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the motion.—The defendants are, under the circumstances, entitled to particulars of the plaintiff's charge before delivering their statement of defence: ord. 19, r. 6. The delivery by them of their statement of defence before they obtain particulars might be regarded as a waiver of their right to particulars: Whyte v. Ahrens, 32 W. R. 649, 26 Ch. D. 717; Leitch v. Abbott, 35 W. R. 306, 31 Ch. D. 374.

Cookson, Q.C., and Wood Hill, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is unable to deliver particulars until he has obtained discovery and seen the details of the transaction from the books of the defendants, and ought not to be required to deliver particulars until he has obtained the information which will enable him to do so. The defendants have full knowledge of the details of the transactions.

They referred to Whyte v. Ahrens and Leitch v. Abbott.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

Dec. 12.—North, J.—The defendants ask for three things; first, for delivery of particulars; secondly, to strike out the statement of claim as embarrassing; and thirdly, to dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious. As regards the first point, the case is rested on ord. 19, r. 6. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] It does not say what is to happen if there is any non-compliance with that order. Then the next rule must be looked at. [His lordship then read rules 7 and 26 of order 19, and ord. 70, r. 1, and proceeded:—].

The first question is, whether there is a sufficient statement of particulars under rule 6 standing alone. Now, in the absence of authority, I should have thought this pleading not sufficiently particular and precise for the purposes of the trial, and that further particulars should be given. But Bacon, V.C., in Whyte v. Ahrens, and Cotton, L.J., in that case and also in Leitch v. Abbott, considered that a general statement, such as is to be found here, might be sufficient. I do not think it necessary, at present, to decide that point, as the question now is whether the order made in chambers is right, by which I did not reject the defendants' demand for particulars, but postponed the consideration of that question until I knew what the issues raised by the defence were. Those two cases which were relied upon by the plaintiff seem to me in point. In Whyte v. Ahrens the facts were these:—The plaintiffs employed the defendants to purchase goods as their agents at the lowest prices. The plaintiffs sued for an account, and alleged in their statement of claim that the defendants had purchased goods at prices higher than the current prices, and had secretly received from the vendors allowances or commissions. The charges against the defendants were stated in general terms, no details being mentioned. The defence denied the statements of the plaintiffs, and pleaded settled accounts; and the plaintiffs, before putting in a reply, took out a summons for discovery of documents, which was adjourned into court. The defendants also applied for particulars of the fraud alleged, and this application was ordered to stand over. The Vice-Chancellor held that the plaintiffs were entitled to discovery before they had to do anything further. Cotton, L.J., took the same view, and observed:—"It was said that if this goes to the hearing, there being no particular allegation of fraud, the plaintiffs, even if they proved any particular items of fraud, would not be entitled to set aside the account. I will assume that is so, though I doubt whether there are not particular statements of fraud. But assume that that is so, then ord. 19, r. 6, is relied on, which says that a party must state, in his pleadings, if he relies on fraud, the particulars of that fraud. Here there has been an application for particulars, and that application has been ordered to stand over till the production of those books. Taking the two together, I think that is right. The production of the books will enable the plaintiffs to define and state what it is they require the defendants to meet at the hearing, and they must do that before the hearing in order to enable the defendants to meet it. But as it is conceded that, according to the old practice in this state of the pleadings, an order would have been made for the production of documents material to the question to be tried at the hearing, though, at present, from ignorance of what has taken place, the plaintiffs are not able to particularize them, so here, in my opinion, the judge was right in saying, notwithstanding the discretion given him by rule 20 of order 31, that he would make an order for the production of the documents." There Fry, L.J., took a different view, but the opinion of Cotton, L.J., prevailed, because he agreed with Bacon, V.C., and there were only two judges in the Court of Appeal.

The other case, Leitch v. Abbott, is, in its circumstances, very like the present. There the plaintiff Leitch alleged that he had employed Abbott as his stockbroker in the purchase and sale of shares and securities, that Abbott had, in breach of the terms of his employment, acted as principal in many of the transactions in which he was employed by Leitch, and charged Leitch with moneys not paid, and with sums in excess of the market price, and Leitch claimed an account and payment of what should be found due and damages. Abbott, by his statement of defence, indirectly admitted that he had been so employed, but denied all the allegations of having dealt with himself as principal, and all other improper conduct, and set up settled accounts. Then there were interrogatories which Abbott declined to answer, and Chitty, J., refused to make any order that he should answer, but the Court of Appeal took a different view. Cotton, L.J., says: "The contention of the defendant comes to this, that the judge is to decide whether he did or did not act in violation of his duty before he gives the discovery. It is said that Whyte v. Ahrens is an authority for this proposition. The defendant cannot however well rely on my judgment in that case, for, if the judge had a discretion, I think it has been wrongly exercised here. But no doubt Fry, L.J., did in that case think that, fraud being alleged by the plaintiff, particulars of the fraud ought to have been given before he could be entitled to discovery. Is that the effect of rule 6 of order 19? There is here a general allegation of fraud, and the plaintiff wants the discovery to enable him to prove his allegation. It may be that he will afterwards have to amend his pleadings, but to say that he must give details of the fraud in the first instance would be to reduce the right of discovery in cases of fraud to very narrow limits indeed. I do not, however, think that that case applies, for there is here a statement of the nature of the fraud alleged." There is no practical distinction between the statement there and the statement in the present case:—"The plaintiff may hereafter have to condescend to particulars, but, in my opinion, it would be wrong to say that he is not entitled to have this discovery now, because he has not given full details of the fraud which he alleges. We may possibly have to decide to what extent the defendant is obliged to go into all these matters, but, in my opinion, it would be wrong to say that the court has a discretion to deprive the plaintiff of discovery altogether, either until the trial of the action or until he has given details of the fraud which he alleges. He wants the discovery in order to enable him to give those details and to establish his right to relief at the trial. I think, therefore, the defendant must give a further answer to the interrogatories."

Then Bowen, L.J., says:—"I will assume that the plaintiff is met with an allegation of a settled account which throws upon him the obligation of proving fraud on the part of the defendant, but it does not deprive him of the right to obtain discovery from the defendant so as to enable him to prove the fraud." Then he refers to Wigram on Discovery, p. 26, and ord. 31, r. 20. Then he proceeds: "Then arises the question on which Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., are not entirely at one, and I am therefore obliged to state my own view. I do not think it necessary to say anything in order to show that the old rule of pleading is a good rule—that, in order to open a settled account, specific errors in the account must be stated." Then he refers to Parkinson v. Hanbury, 15 W. R. 642, L. R. 2 H. L. 1, and continues:—"I think rule 6 of order 19 is only a rule of pleading, and I believe that this has been so decided by the Court of Appeal. Though the omission of one party to comply with the rule gives a right to the opposite party to complain, yet it is an error in pleading and nothing more, and I should be prepared so to decide if the point had not already been decided. Ought, then, the generality of an allegation of fraud to be a bar to the right of discovery? It seems to me that the very fact that the pleader is unable to plead except in general terms is, in many cases, the very reason why he should have discovery from the other party so as to enable him to plead the fraud in detail. If at a particular stage of an action you are stopped by reason of your ignorance of some fact which is known only to the other party, that is the very reason why you should have discovery of that fact from him, and what difference does it make whether you are stopped at the trial or before? I say this in order to show that rule 6 of order 19 is only a rule of pleading, and we ought not, I think, to scan the pleadings too narrowly upon a question of the right to discovery. But, being of opinion that in the present case the relation of principal and agent is the real ground of the plaintiff's right to discovery, I cannot see that we ought to deprive the plaintiff of the discovery which he wants in order to enable him to frame his case." Then Fry, L.J., says:—"I will only say that the inclination of my opinion is in favour of the judgment of the court below."

It has been contended that these two cases do not apply to the present, because in both the defence had been put in, and, therefore, the defendant had waived his right to have the particulars which he sought. But those cases do not seem to have turned on any such point. No judge said that the defendant had waived his right, or put that forward as a reason for his judgment, and the ground of decision was inconsistent with any such waiver; because, although the defence was in, it was held that the right to have particulars after discovery still existed. Instead of that right being waived by putting in the defence, the right was recognized, notwithstanding the defence, and the discovery was given to enable the plaintiff to do what the defendant had a right to call on him to do—namely, to give particulars of the fraud complained of. The fact, therefore, that the defence had been put in in those two cases does not in any way distinguish the present case from them.

Then it is said that the question actually decided in those two cases was as to the right of discovery and not as to the defence. In the present case it is precisely the same. The question now is not what is in issue between the parties. Nobody can say what that is until the defence is seen. That defence may admit that in all or in some of these transactions the allegations in the statement of claim are well founded, or it may deny that they are so. But until I know what matters are in issue between the parties, it is impossible to say that the plaintiff does not require further information. But it is not wanted to enable the defendant to put in his defence. Particulars by way of amendment cannot be given until after discovery, and I have ordered the summons to stand over until after the defence has been put in in order that I may know what the issues raised by the parties are. The general rule is that discovery is not allowed till after defence; but there are exceptions to that rule, and it follows from the two cases I have stated that if I held it necessary to require the plaintiff to give particulars before the defence is put in, I should also hold that this is one of the cases in which the plaintiff would have the right to have discovery before defence.

Then it is suggested that the defendants are embarrassed by the form in which the statement of claim is framed. But how can it be said that the defendants are embarrassed by not knowing these details? The plaintiff has stated in his statement of claim that he has not the means of giving these details. The defendants carried through the transactions, and have in their possession the books containing the full accounts. Therefore they have full knowledge, and can show precisely what the cases are (if any) in which they did do what the statement of claim alleges. I do not see how they can be embarrassed by not obtaining from the plaintiff the information they have in their own possession. Of course I can see why they press for these particulars. If the plaintiff were obliged to give particulars, and to specify the instances in which the defendants have done what he charges them with, the result might be that, from his imperfect knowledge, he would be unable to state in the particulars some cases in which they had actually done what he says they have done; and as, after particulars were given, their defence would be addressed only to those points, the ignorance of the plaintiff might relieve the defendants from being held liable for certain matters with respect to which they are open to the charge contained in the statement of claim.

The case of Thompson v. Birkley, 31 W. R. 230, is an authority on this point. An action was brought to recover damages for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, and it was alleged that the defendant seduced her and debauched her on various occasions. An application was made by the defendant that the plaintiff should give particulars of the times when, places where, and the manner in which the debauching took place, stating also when the seduction took place. The master declined to order any particulars, as there was no statement by affidavit that the defendant had not seduced the plaintiff's daughter. The judge also declined to order such particulars. Then the matter came before the Divisional Court, still without any affidavit, and the judgment of Hawkins, J., was this:—"This appeal must be dismissed. The master declined to entertain the application for particulars unless the defendant made an affidavit that he had not seduced the girl. In other words, the master required an affidavit to satisfy him that the defendant would be embarrassed in his defence by reason of his having no knowledge of the charges made against him. The judge ordered some particulars, but refused to order the particulars now sought for. There are no grounds for this appeal. There is no affidavit that the defendant does not know the nature of the charges against him, and that he will be embarrassed in his defence at the trial. The plaintiff alleges that the seduction took place while his daughter was in the defendant's service. The date of the birth of the child has been furnished voluntarily during the hearing. The whole of the matters are alleged to have taken place while the girl was in the defendant's house. It is very difficult for the plaintiff, in those circumstances, to give such particulars as are asked. The claim alleges a series of acts of indecency terminating in the birth of the child. No one knows better than the defendant to the truth of all these matters. So if he wants the particulars, let him make an affidavit, and if it appears from it that he knows nothing about these charges he will get particulars." Then Watkin Williams, L.J., observes:—"I concur. The order is right. The object of particulars is to prevent surprise at the trial, and to limit inquiry at the trial to the matters set out in the particulars. So I think particulars ought to be discouraged. They tend to narrow the issues. The proper principle is to order particulars only when, from the nature of the case, they are necessary to limit the inquiry, or are necessary by reason of matters brought forward on affidavit. Here there is nothing of the kind. If the defendant had shown that he would be placed at a disadvantage by not having these particulars, that would lay a foundation for his application. But he has not done so."

The present case is stronger, as in that case the matters with respect to which the defendant sought particulars were in the knowledge of the defendants, they were in the knowledge of the plaintiff also; but in the present case the particulars in question are in the knowledge of the defendants, but not in the knowledge of the plaintiff. Therefore this is, à fortiori, a case in which the plaintiff must have the opportunity of knowing what the facts are in order to enable him to furnish particulars. It is clear that the defendants will not be embarrassed, and there is no affidavit to show that there can be any embarrassment in putting in the defence before the particulars are furnished. It therefore is a case in which the defence ought to be put in before particulars are ordered, and I abide by the order in chambers.

Then there is the part of the case as to the action being dismissed, on the ground that there is no cause of action and that it is frivolous and vexatious.

depends on ord. 25, r. 4. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] But there is no doubt that the statement of claim discloses a sufficient cause of action; and as to its being vexatious, the only thing that I can see vexatious is this attempt by the defendants to embarrass the plaintiff by this application to me in chambers, and the pertinacity shown in bringing the same matter before me again in court.

Under these circumstances the application must be dismissed; the plaintiff's costs to be his in any event.

Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works. (a.)

Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 68, 72, 74, 76, 250—Nuisance—"Sewer"—"Drain"—Vesting of sewers in district board—Drainage of contiguous houses by "combined operation"—Connection with drain illegally made without knowledge of board—Liability of board.

The duty imposed by section 72 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, on a district board to keep the sewers which are by the Act vested in them so as not to be a nuisance, is not an absolute duty, but only a duty to use all reasonable care and diligence to keep the sewers in a proper condition, and, consequently, the board will not be liable for a nuisance caused by a drain which has, by reason of another drain being connected with it, become a "sewer," if they did not know before action brought, and could not, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered that the drain was a "sewer."

Action.

E. Bateman, one of the plaintiffs in this action, was the owner, for the residue of a term of twenty-one years, of a block of fifteen contiguous houses, known as Vulcan-terrace, situate on the north side of, and fronting upon, Wallis-road, Victoria-park, within the district of the defendants; the other plaintiff, James Meckiff, was the occupier of one of the houses. Under Wallis-road (which ran east and west) and in front of Vulcan-terrace was a 12-inch sewer, which was admitted to belong to the defendants. At the rear of Vulcan-terrace, and passing under the back yards or gardens of the houses, was a 9-inch sewer or drain, into which the sewage of the fifteen houses was carried by a drain from each house, and which carried the sewage of all the houses into a main sewer under Windsor-road, a road running north and south, and joining Wallis-road near the west end of Vulcan-terrace. This main sewer was the property of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The houses in Vulcan-terrace were numbered 1 to 15, from west to east.

The 9-inch drain was constructed in 1877, when Vulcan-terrace was built, with the approval of the defendants, upon the application of the then owner of the land.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, said that they "have severally suffered damage from offensive and pestilential smells and vapours which the defendants have permitted to emanate from the sewers and drains in and under the control of the defendants situate near to, at the rear, and in front of, the plaintiffs' said premises, and to pervade the same," and they claimed an injunction to restrain the nuisance caused by the smells.

Upon a motion by the plaintiffs for an interlocutory injunction the Court of Appeal (reversing a decision of North, J.) held, 33 Ch. D. 360, that the 9-inch drain was not a "sewer" within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, but that it was a "drain" within the meaning of that section, and, consequently, that it was not vested in, or the property of, the defendants, and that they were not responsible for it.

After the decision of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff Bateman had an investigation made by excavating the ground at the rear of Vulcan-terrace, and it was then discovered that, at a man-hole in the back yard or garden of the house No. 5 in Vulcan-terrace, a drain coming from a factory, belonging to a different owner and situate to the north of Vulcan-terrace, which drain itself also received drains from other premises belonging to other owners, was connected with the 9-inch drain, so that the drainage from the factory and other premises was there discharged into the 9-inch drain and flowed along it into the main sewer under Windsor-road. Before this discovery was made neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants were aware of the existence of this connection. The connection between the two drains could not have been legally made without the consent both of the defendants and of the Metropolitan Board, but, though a search had been made in the books of both boards, no record could be found of the consent of either board having been given to the connection. There was no evidence as to how or when the connection was made.

Waddy, Q.C., T. L. Wilkinson, and Crispe, for the plaintiffs.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the defendants.—The connection of the 9-inch drain with the other drain, which was illegally made without the knowledge of the defendants, cannot make them responsible for a sewer of the existence of which, as a "sewer," they were entirely ignorant.

T. L. Wilkinson, in reply.—The question is, Who is the owner of the 9-inch drain to the west of the man-hole? The drainage from different curtilages is connected at the man-hole, and the drain to the west is, therefore, a "sewer" as defined by section 250 of the Act of 1855, and is vested by section 68 in the defendants.

Dec. 5.—North, J. (after stating the facts, continued:—).—It is now contended that, having regard to the discovery made by the plaintiffs since the hearing of the appeal motion, it is clear that the 9-inch drain is a "sewer" within the meaning of section 250 of the Act of 1885, at any rate as regards that part of it which lies to the west of the man-hole, because the drainage of the fifteen houses is connected with the drainage from the factory, and the 9-inch drain is not "used for the drainage of one building only or premises within the same curtilage," or a "drain for draining a block of houses by a combined operation." No explanation has been given as to when this newly-discovered drain was constructed. It has been argued that, by reason of the connection between this drain and the 9-inch drain having been made by some unknown person, the rights and liabilities of the plaintiff Bateman, or his predecessor in title, and of the defendants have been altered. It is clear that the connection could have been legally made only if the consent of the district board and the Metropolitan Board had been obtained. It was illegal to make the connection without the consent of both those bodies. But it has been argued that, however illegally the connection was made, the definition of the word "sewer" contained in section 250 settles the question who is the owner of the 9-inch drain and who is responsible for it. I am not at present prepared to hold that the unlawful act of a stranger, done without the consent of the owner of Vulcan-terrace, could affect his ownership of the 9-inch drain or the liability of the district board by vesting the drain in them, and then throwing the responsibility for it upon them; or even that, if the connection was made by the permission of the owner of Vulcan-terrace or his tenant, the responsibility of the board could be affected without their consent. This is an important question which should not be decided unless it necessarily arises for decision. I do not intend to decide it finally now, for there is a different ground on which I must decide the present case in favour of the defendants. The liability of the defendants in respect of the 9-inch drain, if they are liable at all, is imposed on them by section 72 of the Act, and it is said that, the 9-inch drain being a "sewer" within the meaning of section 250, the obligation of maintaining it in proper condition is cast upon the defendants, and that, if they to fail to perform this obligation, they are liable to an injunction and to damages. It would be a strange thing if section 72 imposed on a district board a liability in respect of a "sewer" of the existence of which they had no knowledge, or which they believed to be a "drain." An obligation arises only when there is a duty, and, even then, only when there is knowledge of the duty. In Comyn's Digest, tit. "Action upon the case for Misfeasance," it is said, "An action on the case does not lie where a man has not sufficient notice of his duty." That principle has been already applied to this very section 72 in Hammond v. Vestry of St. Pancras, 22 W. R. 826, L. R. 9 C. P. 316, a case the facts of which are very like those of the present case. Under the plaintiff's premises there was a brick drain which, though originally a private drain, had by reason of two other houses having been drained in it become a "sewer." The existence of this drain or sewer was unknown to the defendant's surveyor, nor had any notice of the alteration been given to him. The drain having by some means got out of repair and become choked up, the soil overflowed into the plaintiff's cellar and did damage.

There was evidence that the stoppage of the brick drain was probably occasioned by rats; also that the barrel drain or sewer in the public road, into which the brick drain should have emptied itself, was free from obstruction. The action was brought to recover damages from the defendants for the injury caused by the overflow of the sewage. In that case the action was not founded on any negligence of the defendants; it was only alleged that the defendants had permitted the sewage to flow into the plaintiff's cellar. The jury found that the brick drain was a "sewer"; that it was not known to the vestry, but that it might have been ascertained and known by the exercise of reasonable care and inquiry; that the obstruction was not known before the injury occurred, and that it could not have been known by reasonable care that the brick drain was obstructed. A verdict was thereupon entered for the plaintiffs for £50, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them if the court should be of opinion that, upon the evidence and upon the findings, no liability attached to the defendants. The defendants moved accordingly, and also for an arrest of judgment upon the ground that the declaration disclosed no cause of action; and the Court of Common Pleas held that they were entitled to the verdict and arrest of judgment. Brett, J., in giving judgment, said: "It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that that section imposed upon the defendants an absolute duty to keep the sewers properly cleared and emptied, and that, by reason of their neglect of duty, the overflow complained of ensued. On the part of the defendants, it was insisted that section 72 does not impose upon the vestry or district board an absolute duty to keep the sewers cleansed at all events, but only the duty of using all reasonable care and diligence to keep them in proper and serviceable condition; and that if a sewer be foul and uncleansed, but without any want of reasonable care and diligence on the part of the vestry, if they have done all that careful and prudent men could do, they are not liable for the consequences." After stating the verdict and the material findings of the jury, the learned judge continued:—"It was contended on the part of the defendants that the fact that the brick drain existed was unknown to them absolved them from responsibility. But that seems to me to be answered by the finding of the jury, that they might have ascertained its existence by the exercise of reasonable care and inquiry. Ignorance, under the circumstances, cannot excuse them. I think the case must stand as if the vestry had knowledge of the existence of the brick drain. Upon the facts and findings, we must assume that the brick drain was a 'sewer'; and, therefore, we must take it that the defendants knew of the brick drain, and that the injury to the plaintiff happened through its not having been properly cleansed. Now if the 72nd section does throw upon the defendants an absolute duty or obligation to guarantee that the sewers shall be at all times kept cleansed, it follows that, if any injury arises to an individual from their not being so kept, the vestry are liable. The question, therefore, is, what is the proper construction of the Act of Parliament? That, as it seems to me, will dispose of both points, for both turn upon the construction of section 72. The declaration does not charge the defendants with having been guilty of negligence. It discloses no common law liability in the defendants, and can only be a valid declaration if it can be supported upon the statute." I can draw no distinction between the declaration in that case and the statement of claim in the present case.

The present plaintiffs put their case, not on the negligence of the defendants, but on their omission to perform a statutory duty. Brett, J., continues:—"The words of section 72 are susceptible of either meaning—that an absolute duty is cast upon the defendants, or that they are only bound to exercise due and reasonable care. What, then, is the proper rule of interpretation? The defendants are a public body having a duty imposed upon them by Parliament to do a thing which, even with the exercise of the utmost care and diligence, may not always be capable of being done. It is obvious that circumstances may arise in which a sewer, notwithstanding the exercise of reasonable care, may be obstructed. The terms of the finding in this case assume that. The jury find in effect that the brick drain was obstructed, but that the obstruction was not known to the defendants, and could not by the exercise of reasonable care have been known to them. It would seem to me to be contrary to natural justice to say that Parliament intended to impose upon a public body a liability for a thing which no reasonable care and skill could obviate. The duty may, notwithstanding, be absolute, but, if so, it ought to be imposed in the clearest possible terms. The intention of the Legislature is to be gathered from the language used and the subject-matter. Where the language used is consistent with either view it ought not to be so construed as to inflict a liability, unless the party sought to be charged has been wanting in the exercise of due and reasonable care in the performance of the duty imposed. According to my view of section 72, therefore, the vestry or district board are not to be held liable for not keeping their sewers cleansed at all events and under all circumstances; but only where by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence they can and ought to know that they require cleansing, and where by the exercise of reasonable care and skill they can be kept cleansed. I, therefore, think the rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants, and to arrest the judgment." Denman, J., gave judgment to the same effect.

In that case it was held that the defendants were in the same position as if they had known of the existence of the brick drain, and that it was a sewer, and yet that they were not responsible for the obstruction, because they could not by the exercise of reasonable care and inquiry have discovered it. The present case is a much stronger one in favour of the defendants, because I hold, not only that they did not know that the 9-inch drain was a "sewer," but also that they could not have discovered it by the exercise of reasonable care. The plaintiffs could not have told them anything about it, for they did not know it themselves. The present case, as it seems to me, is an à fortiori case, and, as the defendants in Hammond v. Vestry of St. Pancras were held not to be liable for an obstruction of which they did not know, and which they could not by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered, so the present defendants cannot be held liable for a sewer of the existence of which they did not know, and could not by reasonable care and inquiry have discovered. Even if, on the true construction of the Act, the 9-inch drain west of the manhole is a sewer, the defendants were not, in my opinion, at the time when the action was commenced, under any liability to, or subject to any right of action by, the plaintiffs in respect of it. [His lordship then reviewed the evidence as to the alleged nuisance caused by the sewer under Wallis-road, coming to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had failed to establish their case on this head; and he dismissed the action with costs.]

In re W. F. Bethell.
Bethell v. Hildyard. (a.)

Marriage—Validity of, by domiciled Englishman with woman of an uncivilized tribe according to native customs.

A domiciled Englishman married, according to the native rights, a girl belonging to an uncivilized South African tribe. Polygamy was permitted by the customs of the tribe, a man being allowed one great wife and several concubines.

Held, that, although the marriage entered into was a marriage according to the customs of the tribe, it did not possess the characteristics which are essential to a contract of marriage according to English law, which is, the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others.

The testator, by his will, devised certain real estate to trustees upon trust for his son, Christopher Bethell, during his life, and, in case he should die, leaving a child or children, then upon trust for sale and to stand possessed of the proceeds in trust for such child or children. And in default of children of Christopher Bethell, there was a limitation in favour of another son of the testator. The testator died in 1879.

Christopher Bethell, in 1878, went to reside at the Cape of Good Hope, and remained in South Africa up to the time of his death, which took place in 1884. He received the income of the property devised by his father's will up to his death.

Upon the death of Christopher a summons was taken out to determine who was entitled to the property, and an inquiry was directed whether Christopher Bethell was ever married, and, if so, when and to whom, and whether he left any, and what, children him surviving.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, found that Christopher Bethell, in October, 1883, being then resident at Mafeking, in Bechuanaland, went through the form of marriage according to the custom of the Baralong tribe with Teepoo, a Baralong girl, and had issue by her a female child, which was born ten days after his death; that the Baralongs had no religion and no religious customs, and that polygamy was allowed; that at the time of the marriage the domicile of Christopher Bethell was English; and that, save as aforesaid, he had never married.

When the matter came on for further consideration, it was thought desirable that the infant child should be represented, and the official solicitor was accordingly appointed guardian. A summons was then taken out on behalf of the infant, asking that the chief clerk's certificate might be varied by finding that Christopher Bethell was married to Teepoo, and left one child him surviving, a girl born on the 9th of August, 1884. This summons now came on for hearing.

Upon the evidence adduced it appeared, as was stated by one witness, that among the Baralongs "each male is allowed one great wife and several concubines, who have almost the same status in the harem as the great or principal wife," and the chief of the tribe said "there are those who have three or four wives, but the first is the principal wife." The marriage ceremony was thus described:—"When the consent of the parents has been obtained, the bridegroom slaughters a sheep, a buck, an ox, or cow. The heads of these animals are taken to the bride's parents, as also is the hide, which is cleaned and softened. They are then considered married, and, after the birth of the first child, the number of the cattle previously agreed upon is handed over to the wife's parents." The chief of the Baralong tribe stated that Bethell came to him and said he (Bethell) wanted a woman to take and marry according to the Baralong custom; that the chief asked him, Would he not marry her in church? and Bethell said, "No; I am a Baralong. Did you marry your wife in church? Did you not also marry in the custom I am about to do?" The chief stated that he then told Bethell he might take a wife, and that Bethell took Teepoo and married her according to the Baralong custom, and that she was his wife, and not his paramour.

"I hereby desire that in the event of my decease here in Mafeking, and in the absence of any other will, Mr. E. Rowland shall take over all my arms, ammunition, cannon wagon, oxen, horses, and any other property that may be in my possession, and shall sell them to the best advantage. . . . And he shall inform my relatives in England of my decease and of the manner in which my property is disposed of. Always providing that before disposing of any of the proceeds of the sale of my property he shall purchase or put aside thirty heifers, ten three years old, ten two years old, ten one year old, and shall use them for the benefit of Teepoo in the following manner—he shall keep the heifers for the space of one year from my decease, and in case she (Teepoo) has no child by me he shall hand the said thirty heifers over to her for her own property and use. If she has a child after my decease, he shall keep the heifers and their produce until the said child be arrived at the age of twenty-one years, selling any full-grown oxen and old cows, and investing the proceeds in land or English Government securities. The milk of the cattle and the use of the young oxen to be applied to the use of Teepoo and the child. At the end of eight years the child is to be removed from its mother and placed at a school for the time of ten years, either in the colony or in England, and, if a boy, shall be taught a profession, or enter her Majesty's service as a soldier. . . . In case Teepoo remarries or has any more children or conducts herself in an improper way, she shall be debarred from any participation in the heifers and shall give up the guardianship of the child at once to E. Rowland and shall receive ten yearly heifers only as a dowry. But in case she have no child by me at the expiration of the year, she will be at liberty to do as she likes, and will receive the thirty heifers as before mentioned. And Ragnassie, her father, shall receive eight young heifers as dowry, and thereby relinquishes by Bechuana law all command over Teepoo and the child.

In token my hand, C. Bethell.

Which can, if necessary, be verified by the Standard Bank (Limited)."

Christopher Bethell never mentioned this marriage to any of his family, although he constantly communicated with them. Nor did it appear that he had ever spoken of Teepoo as his wife to any European. One of the witnesses stated that he always called her "that girl of mine."

Pearson, Q.C., and G. Williamson, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

Hastings, Q.C., and Byrne, Q.C., for the infant child, argued that, as a rule, a marriage is valid if celebrated according to the lex loci: Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hag. Consist. Cas. 54; Brook v. Brook, 9 W. R. 461, 9 H. L. Cas. 193; and that that rule applied although the marriage took place in an uncivilized country or in one where polygamy prevailed: Sastry Velaider Aronegary v. Sembecutti Vaigalie, 6 App. Cas. 364; Conolly v. Woolrych, 11 Lower Canad. Jur. 197; Johnson v. Johnson, 30 Mis. State Rep. 80. The other side must show that in every case marriage according to the ceremonies of a country in which polygamy prevails is necessarily not a marriage according to English law. This marriage was not polygamous. An Englishman who marries anywhere according to the local ceremonies intending to keep one wife does not make a polygamous marriage: Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. & F. 488; Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 89, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 16. These cases show that it is not conclusive that in the country of the marriage there is a possibility of polygamy: Harvey v. Farnie, 31 W. R. 433, 8 App. Cas. 43. The observations in Hyde v. Hyde, 14 W. R. 517, L. R. 1 P. & M. 130, do not apply to the case of a domiciled Englishman; they were addressed to the case of a man who was a polygamist by creed.

They also cited In re Goodman's Trusts, 29 W. R. 586, 17 Ch. D. 266; Andros v. Andros, 32 W. R. 30, 24 Ch. D. 637; Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hag. Consist. Cas. 371.

Pearson, Q.C., and G. Williamson, for the plaintiffs, contended that in England, as in all Christian countries, marriage means the exclusive union of one man with one woman for the whole of their lives. [They referred to Armitage v. Armitage, L. R. 3 Eq. 343, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 88; Collins v. Hector, 23 W. R. 485, L. R. 19 Eq. 334.] The judgment of Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde is conclusive.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.

Stirling, J., after stating the facts as above set forth, proceeded:—I have now to inquire what is the law applicable to this case. In Warrender v. Warrender Lord Brougham said: "Marriage is one and the same thing substantially all the Christian world over—our whole law of marriage assumes this; and it is important to observe that we regard it as a totally different thing, a different status from Turkish or other marriages among infidel nations, because we clearly should never recognize the plurality of wives, and consequent validity of second marriages, standing the first, which second marriages the laws of those countries authorize and validate. . . . Indeed, if we are to regard the nature of the contract in this respect as defined by the lex loci, it is difficult to see why we may not import from Turkey into England a marriage of such a nature as that it is capable of being followed by and subsisting with another—polygamy. These being the issues of the contract." This statement of the law was acted upon by Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde, who—dealing with a Mormon marriage—held that "marriage as understood in Christendom may be defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others." Having regard to those authorities, I am bound to hold that a union formed between a man and a woman in a foreign country, although it may there bear the name of a marriage, and the parties to it may there be designated husband and wife, is not a valid marriage according to the law of England unless it be formed on the same basis as marriages throughout Christendom, and be in its essence "the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others." Now, it is plain that C. Bethell intended that Teepoo should have a status different from and higher than that of a mere concubine, he intended that the relationship between himself and her should be that of husband and wife in the sense in which those terms are used among the Baralongs. To begin with, the cohabitation between C. Bethell and Teepoo lasted only a few months. During that time both resided in the Baralong country. Bethell, although he kept up communication with his relatives at home, never mentioned his marriage to them. He never introduced Teepoo or spoke of her to any European as his wife. In short there is an absence of that reputation of marriage (in the Christian sense) which has in many cases shown weighty evidence of the actual existence of such a union. Next, it is to be observed that Bethell refused to marry Teepoo in church, not on the ground that there was any difficulty in finding a place of religious worship where the marriage ceremony might have been performed, but upon the allegation that he was a Baralong and wished to marry according to Baralong customs. I think the inference is that he meant to enter into no other union than that which, between members of the tribe, was regarded as a marriage. This is confirmed by the document of December 3, 1883. If Bethell regarded his union with Teepoo as a marriage in the sense in which it is understood among Englishmen, and the child referred to in that document as legitimate, he would scarcely have made such provisions as are therein contained for the maintenance, education, and advancement of the child. He was in receipt of an income of £600 a year from an estate in Yorkshire; he knew of the provisions of his father's will, under which a legitimate child of his would succeed to the property; yet he directs his child by Teepoo to be maintained and educated up to the age of twenty one on the proceeds of thirty heifers to be purchased out of the proceeds of a sale of his property at Mafeking to be effected by his friend Mr. Rowland, who was a resident among the Baralongs. It is true that he speaks of the "marriage" of Teepoo, and makes provision for the "dowry" to be received by her, and her father; but, in my opinion, he used these terms in the sense in which they were understood among the Baralongs, and his instructions were directed simply to insure the fulfilment of obligations which he conceived to be cast upon him by their laws or customs. Finally, Teepoo herself has given no testimony in this case; there is nothing to show that she regarded herself as entering into any other union than such as prevails among the tribe to which she belongs. I am, therefore, of opinion that the union between C. Bethell and Teepoo was a marriage in the Baralong sense only, and not a valid marriage according to the law of England. In the view which I have taken it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion on any of the numerous points relating to the law of marriage which were discussed before me, but I ought, perhaps, to refer to the two cases which were cited in support of the contention on behalf of the infant—viz., Johnson v. Johnson and Conolly v. Woolrych. These decisions are not, of course, binding on me, but they are entitled to most respectful consideration, and in the absence of direct English authority might exercise a weighty influence on my decision. The former of these cases was decided in 1850, before Hyde v. Hyde; in the latter, judgment was given on July 9, 1867, but Hyde v. Hyde (decided March 20, 1866) was not referred to. I am not sure that the learned judges who decided those cases took the same view of the law as is expressed by Lord Penzance, to which I consider myself to be bound; but in both cases the facts were very different from those in the present case; and circumstances were proved which might, in my judgment, lead to the conclusion (consistently with the doctrine laid down in Hyde v. Hyde) that the marriages there under consideration were valid according to the law of England. The summons must be dismissed, but the costs will come out of the estate.

Practice—"Motion to stand to trial"—Costs of action—Costs of motion included.

In a patent action a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiff for an interim injunction, but not heard on the merits, the order made being "motion to stand to trial." No mention was then made as to costs. On the trial judgment was given for the defendant, with costs; but nothing was said as to the costs of the motion, and the master, in drawing up the judgment, refused to include them.

Held, that, where a motion is adjourned or stands over to the trial, and no mention is made as to the costs of it then or at the trial, the judgment carries the costs of the motion.

Motion.

In this case the plaintiff sued the defendant for infringing a patent, and a motion for an interim injunction was made before Chitty, J., but the merits were not gone into, and the motion was adjourned to the trial, counsels' minutes being indorsed "Motion to stand to trial." No motion was made of costs, and no order was made as to them. The order that the motion was to stand over to the trial was not drawn up. The action was subsequently transferred for trial to Kekewich, J., and judgment given for the defendant, with costs on the higher scale. Nothing was said then as to the costs of the motion. The registrar, on drawing up the judgment, declined to include the defendant's costs of the motion, though requested to include them in the costs of the action. The defendant now moved that the order as drawn up should be varied by including his costs of the motion with the costs of the action.

Barber, Q.C., and Carpmael.—Where an order is made simply that the motion shall stand to the trial, the costs of it will be taxed by the taxing master without any further direction. The rule is that it is only when costs of a motion are reserved to the trial that they must be then dealt with.

Aston, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady.—Costs of a motion must be expressly mentioned at the trial in order to entitle either party to them.

Kekewich, J., after stating the facts, said:—This motion raised a small, but important, question of practice. I thought it right to consult the taxing masters, and I stated the matter for their consideration, and their opinion is as follows: "We should, in taxing costs under a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's action, allow the defendant the costs of a motion of the plaintiff's, which was adjourned or stood over to the hearing, but not brought on."

Acting on this opinion, I direct that the judgment carries the costs of the motion, each party bearing his own costs of this motion to vary the minutes.

Childs v. Cox. (a.)

Parliament—Registration—Borough rate—Notice of objection—Ordinary course of post—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 17, 100.

Notices of objection addressed to voters residing in barracks were posted on August 20, in time to be delivered, in the ordinary course of post, at places in the borough other than the barracks on the same evening. There was no postal delivery at the barracks, but the letters were called for by orderlies. The letters were called for on the evening of August 20, and were distributed, some the same evening, and others on the following day.

Held, that the notices of objection were not delivered in the "ordinary course of post," within the meaning of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 100.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Woolwich.

The appellant objected to the names of Robert Dendy, Frederick Francis Johnson, and others being retained on the general occupiers' list of voters for the parish of Woolwich in the said borough.

The following facts had been proved:—

Notices of objection addressed to Robert Dendy, 43, Staff-Sergeants' Quarters, R.A. Barracks; Frederick Francis Johnson, C., Field Officers' Quarters, C. & T.C. Barracks; and to the others, at similar addresses, were posted at the Woolwich Post Office shortly before 6 p.m. on the 20th of August, 1887.

Letters posted at that time would, in the ordinary course of post, be delivered at places in Woolwich other than the barracks the same evening.

There is no postal delivery into the barracks respectively inhabited by the said voters, but the letters are called for by orderlies from the barracks in accordance with military regulations and arrangements made with the postmaster.

On the evening of the 20th of August two orderlies called at the post office and received the letters for the barracks. Those for the officers were distributed the same evening. It was proved that some of the letters for the non-commissioned officers and men were delivered the following morning, and there was no clear evidence as to when the rest were distributed.

(a.) Reported by J. W. Greig, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. K. Paley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The revising barrister held that there was no evidence that the objector had given the required notice of objection, as it did not appear that there was any ordinary course of post within the meaning of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 100, by which the notices would have been delivered on the 20th of August.

Asquith, for the appellant.—Either the orderly must be regarded as the agent of the objector, and then the notice was "left" at the voter's address within the meaning of section 17 of 6 Vict. c. 18, or it was delivered in the ordinary course of post within the meaning of section 100. It is submitted that where a letter is delivered in the ordinary course of delivery according to arrangements made with the post office at any particular place, it is sufficient: Lewis v. Evans, 23 W. R. 244, L. R. 10 C. P. 297; Hornsby v. Robson, 26 L. J. C. P. 55, 5 W. R. Dig. 231.

Channell, Q.C., and Rentoul, for the respondent, were not called on.

Pollock, B.—The only question here is whether the notices were properly delivered according to the statute. Section 17 and section 100 give two different ways in which the notice of objection may be served. The latter section throws upon the objector the onus of proving that the delivery of the notice was "in the ordinary course of post." It appears that in this case there was no delivery at the voter's address by the ordinary course of post. The arrangement by which the orderlies called for and received letters at the post office and distributed them at the barracks was in substitution for the "ordinary course of post." I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the orderly is regarded as the agent of the objector, there is insufficient evidence to show that the notices were delivered on the same evening. I do not, however, think that he can be regarded as the objector's agent, and the only question is whether there has been a sufficient service under section 100 of the statute. The case shows that no "ordinary course of post" existed which made the notices deliverable on the 20th of August. It is not alleged that it was the duty of the orderlies to deliver them the same evening, and I think, therefore, that there is no evidence that the notices were served on that day.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Reg. v. Directors of the Great Western Railway Co. (a.)

Coroner—Jurisdiction to quash inquisition for irregularity—Power of amendment—Coroners Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71), s. 20.

A coroner's inquisition stated that the jury "say upon their oaths that the directors of the Great Western Railway Co. did feloniously kill and slay" the deceased.

Held, that the jurisdiction of the High Court to quash irregular inquisitions has not been affected by section 20 of the Coroners Act, 1887, which gives power to "the court having cognisance of the case" to amend defects in inquisitions; and that, on an application for a writ of certiorari, such inquisition could not be amended, but must be quashed.

Order nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and to quash a coroner's inquisition.

The inquisition purported to have been taken at the parish of Phillack, in the county of Cornwall, on the 30th of January, 1888, before G. P. Grenfell, one of the coroners for the said county, on view of the body of Theophilus John George, upon the oaths of twelve jurors, who, being charged to inquire when, where, and in what manner the deceased came to his death "say upon their oaths that the directors of the Great Western Railway Co., on the 28th of January, 1888, did feloniously kill and slay the said Theophilus John George." The deceased had been run over by a train and killed while passing over a level crossing on the line of the Great Western Railway Co.

The order, which was obtained at the instance of one of the directors, on the ground that the inquisition did not state the names of the persons who were charged with manslaughter, called upon the coroner, the public prosecutor, and the next of kin of the deceased to show cause why the inquisition should not be quashed by the High Court, and quashed on the ground that it was bad on the face of it.

Poland, for the Public Prosecutor.—The court has power to amend defects in an inquisition. Section 20 of the Coroners Act, 1887, says:—"If, in the opinion of the court having cognizance of the case, an inquisition finds sufficiently the matters required to be found thereby, and where it charges a person with murder or manslaughter, sufficiently designates that person and the offence charged, the inquisition shall not be quashed for any defects, and the court may order the proper officer of the court to amend any defect in the inquisition." The court has cognizance of the case, and it ought to exercise the power of amendment by substituting the names of the directors.

Asquith, for the next of kin.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the directors, were not called upon.

Mathew, J.—There can be no doubt that this inquisition is irregular. And the recent Act does not affect the jurisdiction of the court to quash an inquisition which is irregular upon the face of it. Section 20 seems to refer to the court before which the inquisition comes for trial, and confers upon it a discretionary power to amend mere formal defects. I am of opinion that this inquisition must be quashed.

A. L. Smith, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the original jurisdiction of the court to quash irregular inquisitions is not touched by the Act of last year. But even if it were, I am not satisfied that so serious a defect as the present ought to be amended by any court. The section says that where an inquisition charging a person with murder or manslaughter sufficiently designates the person and the offence charged, any defect in the inquisition may be amended. But it is certainly a serious question here whether this inquisition can be said to sufficiently designate the persons who are charged. I therefore think the inquisition must be quashed.

ARROWSMITH v. DICKENSON. (a.)

Poor law—Liability of children to maintain mother who has married again—43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 56.

The children of a pauper woman are not relieved of their liability to maintain her under the Poor Law Acts by the fact of her marrying again.

Case stated by justices of the county of Chester under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

A summons was issued against the respondents, James and Thomas Dickenson, under 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 6, 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 26, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 56, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 36, on an information preferred by the appellant, acting on behalf of the Guardians of the Poor of Northwich Union, which alleged that Ann Egerton was poor and unable to maintain herself and was then chargeable to the union, and that the respondents were her sons, and were of sufficient ability to maintain her. On the hearing of the summons it was proved that the respondents were the sons of Ann Egerton, by a former marriage, and that she and her present husband, Samuel Egerton, were both in receipt of outdoor relief from the union, and that the respondents were single men living with their mother and step-father, and earning about twenty-two shillings a week. The justices dismissed the summons. The question was whether the respondents were, under the statutes, liable to maintain their mother while she remained the wife of Samuel Egerton and lived with him.

Marshall, for the appellant.—The justices ought to have convicted the respondents. The statute of Elizabeth enacts "that the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children of every poor, old, blind, lame, and impotent person, or other poor person not able to work, being of a sufficient ability, shall at their own charges relieve and maintain every such poor person." The statute of George III. empowers justices in petty sessions to make orders for the relief of such poor persons upon and by the father, grandfather, mother, grandmother, or child of any such poor person. Then section 56 of the Poor Law Act, 1834, says that all relief given to a wife shall be considered as given to the husband, but provides that nothing therein contained shall discharge the father and grandfather, mother and grandmother of any poor child from their liability to maintain such child. Section 57 makes a man liable to maintain the children of his wife by a former marriage. Although section 56 says that relief to a wife is relief to the husband, it is still for some purposes relief to the wife also: Reg. v. Inhabitants of Kevington-cum-Gresty, 17 Q. B. 48. The object of the enactment is shown by Reg. v. St. Mary, Islington, 21 L. J. M. C. 233, 10 W. R. O. L. Dig. 64. See also Rex v. Inhabitants of Walthamstow, 6 A. & E. 301.

Joseph Smith, for the respondents.—The cases cited do not support the contention of the appellant. The respondents are relieved from their responsibily to maintain their mother, who has married again, by section 56 of the Act of 1834. That section makes any relief given to a wife relief to the husband; and the respondents are not bound to maintain their stepfather. And the proviso to that section omits the words "or child" after "grandmother," which occur in section 26 of the Act of Geo. 3, and also in 43 Eliz. c. 2. The words must have been left out intentionally, and the court cannot insert them.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the appeal must prevail. The respondents are called upon to satisfy their liability to maintain their pauper mother. They answer that she has married again. But the obligation is positive. And section 56 of the Act of 1834—that is, the first part of the section—leaves the obligation as it was before. Reliance is laid on the proviso; but it is not the right way of construing a section to look at the proviso first. The proper way is to look at the main words first. I think that the main words leave the obligation remaining, and that the proviso has no bearing on the present facts. The order ought to have been made.

GRANTHAM, J., concurred.

BEAL v. TOWN CLERK OF EXETER. (a.)

Parliament — Registration — Borough vote — Residence during qualifying period—Right to exclusive use of room—2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 31.

The claimant had the exclusive use of a separate bedroom in his father's house at Exeter, but, for the six calendar months during which residence is required by section 45 of 2 & 3 Will. c. 45, he was engaged in an occupation which would prevent him from actually residing at Exeter, except for a few days at a time.

Held, that this was not sufficient to constitute "residence" within the meaning of the above-mentioned section.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Exeter.

In January, 1887, one Louis Robins, who had previously resided continuously in his father's house at Exeter as a member of the family and with the exclusive use of a separate bedroom, went to London to seek employment.

During the six months before the 15th of July, 1887, he returned at intervals, when he was out of employment, to his father's house and occupied the same bedroom in the same manner as before; for the greater part of this period, however, he was engaged in a situation which required his continual presence in London, and made it impossible for him to return to Exeter, except occasionally from Saturday to Monday.

The revising barrister decided that there had been sufficient constructive residence in Exeter for six months before July 15, 1887, to satisfy 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 31.

The objector appealed.

J. A. Foote, for the appellant, cited Powell v. Guest, 13 W. R. 274; Ford v. Drew, 28 W. R. 137.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed. We have to put a construction on the meaning of "residence during six calendar months." It is very difficult to define exhaustively what residence is. It is a question of good sense to be decided upon the facts. I think that the mere power or intention to return per se is not sufficient to constitute residence, for both might be consistent with three years' actual absence from Exeter. There is nothing of the nature of a constructive residence. An officer ordered on foreign service might, no doubt, claim a constructive residence by his wife, but such a case bears no resemblance to the present one. Here a constructive residence is claimed, not through a wife, but by the claimant himself, who is a single man actually residing in London, and unable, consistently with his occupation, to return to Exeter.

Kaye v. Sutherland. (a.)

Practice—Ord. 11, r. 1, paragraph (b)—Service out of the jurisdiction — Tenant-right — Custom of the country.

An action by an outgoing tenant in Yorkshire to obtain compensation for tenant-right according to the custom of the country is an action to enforce "a contract, obligation, or liability affecting land" within paragraph (b) of ord. 11, r. 1, and service of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction will be permitted in that behalf.

Agnew v. Usher, 33 W. R. 126, 14 Q. B. D. 78, distinguished.

Appeal from Charles J., at chambers, who had given leave for service of a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiff claimed on the indorsed writ "for tenant-right and tenant's compensation in respect of a farm situate at N., in the county of York, and for breach of an agreement to pay tenant-right and tenant's compensation." The plaintiff was the outgoing tenant of the above farm, and claimed compensation under the custom of the country upon the expiration of his tenancy. The defendant was his landlord, whose ordinary place of residence and domicile were in Scotland, and who had no residence within the jurisdiction.

R. O. B. Lane, for the defendant.—The writ has been issued out of the jurisdiction under paragraph (b) of ord. 11, r. 1; but that paragraph does not apply here, for the action is not in respect of a contract affecting land, but is in respect of a mere personal obligation binding on the landlord. There is nothing in this contract which affects the property, or possession, or status of land, as explained by Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Agnew v. Usher, 33 W. R. 126, 14 Q. B. D. 78.

J. L. Walton, for the plaintiff.—On the ground of convenience alone it is desirable that the plaintiff should be able to sue in England, instead of in Scotland. But it is submitted that the obligation, being founded upon custom, does affect the land, and is, therefore, within paragraph (b) of ord. 11, r. 1. The custom casts upon the landlord as an incident of his ownership of the land the obligation to pay tenant-right. This liability arises from the land, not from a personal contract: Mansel v. Norton, 31 W. R. 325, 22 Ch. D. 769. "A custom is the lex loci, an ancient local law in some known district as a hamlet, town, or manor." Co. Litt. 110b; Jones v. Robin, 10 Q. B. 620. Agnew v. Usher turned upon the right of the plaintiff to sue the assignee of a lease for rent, and is distinguishable from this case.

R. O. B. Lane replied.

Stephen, J.—With regard to the question of convenience I accede to the argument that it would be a hardship to the plaintiff if he were compelled to sue in Scotland for compensation in respect of tenant-right according to the custom of the country; his farm being situated in Yorkshire. The hardship, however, would be just the same if the plaintiff had to bring his action within the jurisdiction for breach of a similar contract made with respect of land in Scotland. But the question of law which we have to decide is one of some difficulty and importance; it is whether this case falls within paragraph (b) of ord. 11, r. 1, or not. In my opinion it clearly falls within the terms of the first part of paragraph (c), but as the defendant ordinarily resides in Scotland, the exception at the end of that paragraph precludes service out of the jurisdiction being allowed. In Agnew v. Usher the court held that an action to recover rent due on a lease of land in England was not within paragraph (b); but is the present case covered by that decision? I think not. Lord Coleridge, C.J., said that he did not intend to give an exhaustive account of all possible proceedings "affecting land" which would probably fall within paragraph (b). The court only determined in that case that the action (which was to obtain payment of rent from the assignees of the lease) was not an action to enforce "any contract, obligation, or liability affecting land." Lord Coleridge also observed that, as a general rule, "actions of ejectment and of the like kind, when the land of which the property, or possession, or claim is disputed is English land, should be brought in England." The words on which the present case hinges are the words "affecting land," and I am of opinion that this is an action to enforce a contract, obligation, or liability affecting land within the meaning of paragraph (b). The plaintiff alleges that the land was let under a contract made subject to the custom of the country in respect of paying compensation for tenant-right; and that custom applies to all contracts made within the district subject to it, unless it is expressly excluded by the parties. The contract therefore affects a certain definite portion of land in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff's farm. It is true that the custom of the country is not so strong a case of land being affected by a custom as is the custom of gavelkind or of borough English. It appears to me however that this custom holds a middle position between contracts made subject to gavelkind or borough English on the one hand, and contracts to pay rent on the other. The land is affected in the sense that it is held under a contract which is subject to a custom of that part of the country.

A voter who has been placed on the Parliamentary register for a borough as an inhabitant occupier by virtue of the service franchise under 48 Vict. c. 3, s. 8, is not thereby entitled to be placed on the burgess roll under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 9, which requires occupation "as owner or tenant" in a legal, and not merely physical, sense.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Brighton.

At a court holden by me, as revising barrister for the borough of Brighton, on the 23rd of September, 1887, an objection to the name of the appellant being retained on division 1 of the occupiers' list for the parish of Brighthelmstone came on and was heard by me.

1. The name of the appellant appeared on division 1 of the occupiers' list for the parish of Brighthelmstone as Parliamentary voter for the Parliamentary borough of Brighton, and as a burgess for the municipal borough of Brighton, and he was objected to in respect of his Parliamentary and municipal vote.

2. The entry on division 1 is—McClean, Matthew, 14, Islingword-street, Brighton. House, 22, Carlton-hill, successive, 14, Islingwood-street; and the entry in the rate-book is—Owner, Mr. Reason; occupier, Matthew McClean, premises, house and clubroom, with one rating for the whole premises.

3. Mr. Reason is the owner of the premises 22, Carlton-hill, and the tenants are an association or committee of gentlemen, who have taken the premises for the purposes of a coffee-house. The premises consist of a single house, with entrance in front and at the rear.

4. The appellant was placed in the premises 22, Carlton-hill by the committee as manager, and he, with the assistance of his wife and daughter, was in charge of the premises, served the customers, took payment for the articles supplied, and accounted weekly with the committee for the receipts. For these services he received food, coal, lighting, and four shillings a week. He also inhabited with his family a portion of the premises. He paid no rent, but the furniture in the part inhabited by him was his own.

5. The rent and the rates for the whole of the premises 22, Carlton-hill were paid by the committee.

6. There was no separate rating for the part of the premises 22, Carlton-hill inhabited by the appellant and his family, but the whole of the premises were rated in his name, and the receipts for the rates were made out in his name.

7. It was admitted by the appellant and the respondent, Thomas Pritchard, respectively that the appellant had inhabited the premises 22, Carlton-hill by virtue of his service or employment as manager of the said coffee-house, and that the appellant was entitled to be placed on division 2 of the occupiers' list, under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.

8. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was also entitled, under the circumstances above stated, to be enrolled as a burgess of the said borough of Brighton.

9. I held that the appellant was not entitled to be enrolled as a burgess of the said borough of Brighton, and I accordingly erased his name from division 1 of the said occupiers' list.

10. I held that the appellant had established his right, under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, to be placed on division 2 of the said occupiers' list, and I accordingly inserted his name to division 2 of the occupiers' list.

11. If the court should be of opinion that I was wrong in removing the appellant's name from division 1 of the said occupiers' list, his name will be restored to division 1, and removed from division 2.

Clough, for the appellant.—The voter is entitled to be put on the burgess roll because occupation and rating are the only qualifications required by the Municipal Corporations Act (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 9, and it is admitted that he occupied and was rated for the house. The words in the Representation of the People Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), that the person should occupy as "owner or tenant," do not occur in the municipal Acts. If there is actual physical occupation it is, therefore, sufficient. The provision in the Representation of the People Act (48 Vict. c. 3), s. 8, extends the rights of a servant as an inhabitant occupier.

Newson, for the other side, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The claimant is rightly placed on the Parliamentary list, but he is not therefore entitled to be enrolled as a burgess. Within the older cases it is clear that he is not an "occupier" of the house, for he is not in occupation either as owner or tenant. The Representation of the People Act of 1884 only applies to the Parliamentary franchise.

BRIDGES v. MILLER. (a.)

Parliament — Registration—Borough vote — Notice of objection—Defect or mistake—Power of amendment—Reform Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 32—Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-section 2.

By the Reform Act, 1832, s. 32, no freeman of a city or borough may be registered as a Parliamentary voter "unless he shall have resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July (now altered to the 15th of July) in such year" within such city or borough or seven statute miles from the polling place.

A notice of objection was served upon a freeman of Norwich, stating the ground of objection in the following words:—"That you do not reside at 12, Clifton-street, Norwich." The revising barrister held that the notice was sufficient, but he allowed an amendment to be made as follows:—"That you have not resided at 12, Clifton-street, Norwich, for six calendar months next preceding the 15th of July last, and that you have not throughout that period resided within the city of Norwich or seven miles thereof."

Held, that the notice was bad, and that the revising barrister had no power to amend it, as the defect was not a "mistake" within 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 18, sub-section 2.

This was a case stated by a revising barrister for the city of Norwich.

Henry Bridges, a freeman of Norwich, was objected to as not being entitled to be registered as a Parliamentary voter. The notice of objection was addressed to "Mr. Henry Bridges, of 12, Clifton-street, Norwich," and stated as the ground of objection "that you do not reside at the above address." Evidence was admitted to prove that the appellant had not resided at the address in question, nor within seven miles of Norwich, for six calendar months next previous to July 15, 1887.

It was contended for the appellant that the notice was bad as it did not refer to the qualifying period of six calendar months.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The revising barrister held that the notice was sufficient, but he allowed an amendment to bring it within the exact words of section 32 of the Reform Act—namely, "that you have not resided at the above address for six calendar months next preceding the 15th day of July last, and that you have not resided within the city of Norwich, or within seven miles thereof." He then struck out the name of the appellant from the list of voters and seven others who were objected to in a similar way.

The case stated that if the court should be of opinion that the notice was originally bad, and could not be amended, the names of the appellant and the other seven were to be replaced on the list.

Asquith, for the appellant.—The notice was bad because it stated no statutory ground of objection at all. It is no ground of objection under section 32 that the voter is not residing at a particular place at the time of the notice. The question, therefore, of non-residence for six calendar months was not raised before the barrister, and evidence ought not to have been received upon it. There was no power of amendment, for the defect was no clerical error or mistake, it is a substantial deficiency and not a mistake within 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 28, sub-section 2.

R. S. Wright, for the respondent.—The revising barrister has merely inserted into the notice words which it was evidently intended to contain. Objection on the ground of "residence" can only refer to six months' residence, and would have been so understood by the persons objected to. The amendment dealt, therefore, with a mere formal mistake and ought to be allowed.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that the notice of objection was bad. In order to be registered as a Parliamentary voter a freeman of Norwich must have resided within seven miles of the city polling-booth for six months, which are now computed from July 15. The Reform Act makes such residence indispensable. An objection, therefore, on the ground of non-residence should, if it is to be valid, state that the freeman has not lived within this distance for this period. This objection, which is dated August 12, simply says, "You do not reside at 12, Clifton-street, Norwich." Take it that Clifton-street is in Norwich, and that the non-residence imputed is proved, there is still nothing to show that the freeman either has or has not resided for the six months required by law. The objection, therefore, is no objection at all. It has been amended by the revising barrister; but there are limits to his statutory power of amendment. He can "correct" a "mistake," but the defect in this objection is in no sense a "mistake." The objection is accurate enough in point of expression; its fault is that it is bad, and the revising barrister in making it good has exceeded his power of amendment.

This appeal must be allowed.

Pollock, B.—I also think that the appellant must succeed. I find nothing in either the letter or the spirit of the enactments with respect to a Parliamentary registration which can be supposed to give a revising barrister such an extensive power of amendment as the respondent has contended for.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. The error of the objector probably arose from a mistaken view of the law as to residence. Clearly, however, the revising barrister had no power to correct the notice.

Appeal allowed.

Humphrey v. Earle. (a.)

Parliament — Registration — County vote — Notice of objection — Objector's place of abode — Registration Act, 1885 (48 Vict. c. 15), s. 18, schedule 2, Form I., No. 2.

A notice of objection to a county voter was signed as follows:—"G. C., of Churchyard, on the list of Parliamentary voters for the parish of Petersfield."

Held, that the notice was bad, as the objector's place of abode was insufficiently described under 48 Vict. c. 15, s. 18.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Petersfield division of the county of Hants.

William Humphrey, the appellant, and sixteen other persons, were objected to as not entitled to have their names upon the occupiers' list for Hambledon. The notice of objection was signed as follows:—

"George Chapman,
"Of Churchyard,
"On the list of Parliamentary voters for the parish of
"Petersfield."

The objector's proper address was Churchyard, Petersfield.

It was contended for the appellant that there was not a sufficient description of the objector's place of abode, but the barrister held that the notice was good, and he accordingly erased the names of those objected to under it.

If the court should be of opinion that he was wrong the names were to be restored.

J. A. Foote, for the appellant.—The notice is bad because it does not follow the form given in the schedule to the Registration Act, 1875, which is ordained by section 18 of the Act. The word "Churchyard" is not a proper description of the objector's abode, and the word "Petersfield" cannot be supplied from what follows, because the objector might be on that list for a property qualification without residing in Petersfield.

He cited Woollett v. Davis, 4 C. B. 115; Sheldon v. Flatcher, 17 L. J. C. P. 34; Norris v. Felcher, L. R. 4 C. P. 417; Jones v. Pritchard, L. R. 4 C. P. 414.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong. The description of the objector's place of abode, as given in the notice of objection, is not sufficient. There is, it appears, a churchyard at Petersfield, but the notice does not say "the Churchyard," and the objector need not live at Petersfield. The point is technical, but were we to decide against it we should, I fear, be opening a door to the very looseness which the Act was intended to prevent. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed.

Pollock, B.—I am of the same opinion. The words "on the list of Parliamentary voters for the parish of Petersfield" tell the voter nothing as to the objector's address. Unless he were on some list of voters for the county division in which the parish is he could not legally object, but he may be on the list for the parish of Petersfield in Hants, and may yet live anywhere in England. The words "of Churchyard" are also perfectly vague. They may refer to any parish or hamlet whether in Petersfield division or elsewhere. As my lord has said, the point is technical; but on the other hand it is important that these notices should strictly follow the statutory form, and I think that the court ought not to establish a kind of cy-près doctrine for the benefit of careless objectors.

(a.) Reported by Cecil Chapman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. The form under the Act requires the place of abode of the objector to be stated in the notice of objection. Here the words which purport to comply with this requirement are "of Churchyard." These words are followed by the Parliamentary qualification of the voter "on the list of Parliamentary voters for the parish of Petersfield." Were the franchise and the power of objecting limited to persons residing in Petersfield, it might, perhaps, be possible to supplement the description of the place of abode out of that of the qualification, so as to make up an address. But as persons living in all parts of England may be on the Petersfield list of voters, there is nothing to connect the statement as to the place of residence with that as to the Parliamentary qualification.

"The Prinz Heinrich." (a.)

Action in personam to enforce salvage agreement—Circumstances in which shipowners were held liable to pay an amount agreed to be paid by shipmaster in respect of salvage of ship, freight, and cargo.

A steamship which, when laden with cargo, had stranded on a rocky coast in the Gulf of Tartary and there received injury, was towed off the shore by another steamship. Before these salvage services had been rendered, the master of the stranded steamship entered into a salvage agreement, whereby he agreed to pay the master of the salving steamship or his order, in the event of the stranded steamship being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of the agreement, £2,000, with an additional sum of £200 for every day the salving steamship remained in attendance. On reaching port the cargo of the salved steamship was discharged, and the salved steamship, before being repaired, was sold for the sum of £3,500, £2,200 of this sum being deposited in the hands of third parties in London pending the settlement of the claim of the salvors. On the discharge of the cargo of the salved vessel, a bond for general average was given to the shipowners by the owners of the cargo. Subsequently the owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel brought an action in this court for money due under the above agreement, and for a declaration as to their rights with respect to the deposited sum of £2,200 against the owners of the salved steamship and the persons with whom the £2,200 was deposited. Before the hearing of the action the £2,200 was paid into court.

The court pronounced the sum of £2,200 in court to be due to the plaintiffs for the salvage services rendered, as specified in the agreement; and ordered that, unless an appeal was brought from its decision within a fortnight, the £2,200 brought into court should be paid to the plaintiffs in satisfaction of their claim.

Observations as to the construction of agreements by shipmasters to pay money in respect of salvage services.

This was an action in personam instituted on the 7th of April, 1887, on behalf of the owners of the steamship Fei Lung against the Anglian Steam Navigation Co. and Alfred Edwards and Arthur Holland.

The writ of summons in the action was indorsed as follows:—"The plaintiffs' claim is for remuneration for salvage services rendered to the steamship Prinz Heinrich in the Gulf of Tartary in the month of June, 1886, and for money due under an agreement with regard to such services, and for a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to the sum of £2,200 deposited in the joint names of the said Alfred Edwards and Arthur Holland, or that the rights of the plaintiffs therein may be ascertained and declared." Appearances were entered both for the owners of The Prinz Heinrich and for Alfred Edwards and Arthur Holland, and as the two last-named defendants had only been made defendants as the parties in whose hands the sum of £2,200, mentioned in the indorsement of the writ, had been deposited, the judge in chambers, on the 23rd of July last, by consent of all parties ordered that such sum should be paid by them into court, there to remain on the same terms as it was held when deposited, and that, upon paying the said sum into court, the said defendants should be discharged. The sum of £2,200 was thereupon, in pursuance of this order, paid into court, and the suit was subsequently carried on against the owners of The Prinz Heinrich alone.

The statement of claim alleged (inter alia) that The Fei Lung, a British steamship of 1,180 tons register, on the 29th of June, 1886, came up with the German steamship Prinz Heinrich near Castrace Bay, in the Gulf of Tartary, when the latter vessel, with a cargo worth £14,000 on board, was fast ashore on some rocks which had pierced one of her ballast tanks, and that an agreement was then entered into between the two masters in the following words:—"Memorandum of agreement entered into this day between Robert Crawford, master of the steamship Fei Lung, on the one part, and Harmann Reinmann, master of the German steamer Prinz Heinrich, on the other part. Whereas the said Robert Crawford, master of the steamship Fei Lung, agrees to stand by and assist by towing to remove the said steamer Prinz Heinrich from her present position, for which services, duly performed, Harmann Reinmann, master of the German steamer Prinz Heinrich, agrees to pay Robert Crawford, master of the steamship Fei Lung, or his order the sum of £200 (two hundred pounds sterling) per day of twenty-four hours, dating from noon, June 29, 1886, and for every day or part of a day the steamship Fei Lung is engaged in attendance, or, if necessary, absent obtaining stores or fuel to enable her to carry on the contract, until the vessel is got off, or has been given twenty-four hours' notice that the services of the steamship Fei Lung will no longer be required. And in the event of the stranded steamer Prinz Heinrich being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of this agreement, the sum of £2,000 sterling over and above the aforesaid £200 sterling to be paid to Robert Crawford, master of the steamship Fei Lung, in same manner and at same time as daily pay."

The statement of claim further alleged that afterwards The Fei Lung stood by The Prinz Heinrich and ultimately succeeded in towing The Prinz Heinrich off the rocks and into a place of safety; that the owners of The Prinz Heinrich had taken a bond from the owners of the cargo of The Prinz Heinrich to secure the latter's share of the £2,200, the sum acknowledged by the master of that vessel to be due in respect of the services rendered by getting The Prinz Heinrich off the rocks, and that negotiations had then taken place with the defendants for referring the settlement of the salvage claim of the plaintiffs to arbitration, but without result, in the course of which negotiations the above-mentioned sum of £2,200 had been remitted to the manager in London of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation with instructions to hold the same to the disposal of the arbitrators of the said salvage claim.

The defendants in their defence, whilst admitting the making of the agreement that The Fei Lung had attempted to tow The Prinz Heinrich off the rocks and that the defendants had taken a bond for general average from the owners of the cargo of The Prinz Heinrich, alleged that The Prinz Heinrich had floated off the rocks without assistance; that the master of that vessel had no authority to enter into the agreement on behalf of the defendants, the said agreement being wholly unjust and inequitable and, as to the sum of £2,000, wholly unreasonable; and that the plaintiffs were seeking to recover against the defendants in respect of services rendered to ship, cargo, and freight, though the defendants were liable in respect of ship and freight only. And, further, that The Prinz Heinrich had been sold without being repaired, and of the proceeds of the sale £2,200 had been stopped by the plaintiffs in the hands of the purchasers, and had been deposited, as stated in the statement of claim, after negotiations for arbitration not carried out.

Jan. 18, 19.—The case was now heard before Mr. Justice Butt, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes, for the plaintiffs, contended that the court ought to enforce the agreement, as a reasonable agreement which the master had authority from the defendants to make, binding them to pay the actual sum there specified: The Cumbrian, 6 Mar. L. C. 151; Anderson v. The Ocean Steamship Co., 10 App. Cas. 107; and, further, that the defendants had so conducted themselves as to lead the plaintiffs to alter their position with regard to the cargo-owners of The Prinz Heinrich, and that the defendants were, therefore, equitably liable to pay the entire amount agreed on.

They also referred to The Medina, 25 W. R. 156, 2 P. D. 5.

Myburgh, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants.—A shipmaster is only the agent of the shipowner to bind him to pay for salvage services either rendered to his property or for his benefit; and in this case it is clear that £2,200 is an exhorbitant sum to award as salvage for saving the ship and freight alone. Further, the master is the agent of the cargo-owner where a necessity exists for procuring salvage services to be rendered to the cargo, and there is nothing on the face of the agreement to show that it ought to be construed as solely made by him in his capacity of agent for the ship-owner, and not also as agent for the freighters. In support of this proposition they referred to The Raisby, 33 W. R. 938, 10 P. D. 114.

BUTT, J.—There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether The Prinz Heinrich floated off the rocks in consequence of the jettisoning of the cargo without the assistance of The Fei Lung. I do not really think that is a very material question, because the agreement between the two masters is that the sum of £2,000 should be paid, not in the event of The Fei Lung getting The Prinz Heinrich off, but in the event of The Prinz Heinrich being got off or coming off the rocks. It is not easy to say which is the true version. On the whole, I confess I lean to the belief that The Prinz Heinrich was towed off. The hawser had been made fast the night before. The density of the fog rendered it very prudent for The Fei Lung to have her anchor down so that she might not herself get on the rocks. In any case, I cannot help thinking it was a valuable service. The Prinz Heinrich had no anchor out at the time. She had had a kedge out, which kept coming home as they drew on it, and but for the hawser of The Fei Lung The Prinz Heinrich might just as well have gone further on to the rocks instead of coming off. The question I have now to decide is whether the agreement in this case is so unreasonable and inequitable that it cannot stand. The sum absolutely secured by the agreement was only £200, for if on the evening of the day on which the services began The Prinz Heinrich had filled with water so that she could not have been moved, the present salvors could have recovered £200 only. What, again, was the position of the vessel? She had been on the rocks for three days, two or three large pieces of rock had gone through her bottom, and were projecting into the ship. The water ballast tank had been pierced, the top having been forced up so that the water flowed into the forehold and rose to the level of the surrounding water. In that position there was some strain from the weight of water as well as from the working of the ship. There must have been a strain on the bulkhead, and if that had given way and the next compartment had filled, it was possible that the ship also might have filled. Again, too, it is clear from the entries in the log that the vessel was thumping on the rocks. The coast, too, was rather a barbarous one, and few, if any, ships were passing. The elder brethren consider that this vessel was in a serious and pressing danger, and that a prudent master would not have hesitated to have made this agreement. I agree with them, and I hold that it is neither unreasonable nor inequitable. It has been argued on behalf of the defendants that they are not liable to pay this amount, because it is one agreed on for the whole of the salvage remuneration, and that the shipowners have only to bear the same proportion as £3,500, the value of the ship, bears to £14,000, the value of the cargo. To that proposition I could under no circumstances assent. Even if my opinion were different, I consider that the owners of The Prinz Heinrich have so conducted themselves as to make themselves liable. I refer to the negotiations, the appointment of arbitrators, and the deposit of the sum of £2,200 specified in the agreement in a bank, all of which circumstances would tend to make the defendants now liable for the entire sum if they were not originally so liable.

The result has been to put the plaintiffs to rest in this matter, to lead them to believe that this claim was safe. It is wholly unreasonable to expect them, some two years after the services had been rendered, to obtain the larger part of the reward by arresting such portions of the cargo as they might chance to find after this lapse of time. But, further, I am of opinion that when the captain of a ship reasonably and properly enters into an arrangement for the salvage of the ship for a particular sum, he binds the shipowners to pay the agreed amount. The cargo is on board, and the shipowners need not part with it till they have obtained security for any payments which they may have to make or have made in respect of it. In this very case the shipowners took a bond from the owners of the cargo for the payment of the amount stated in the agreement. It is said that the case of The Raisby is opposed to this view, but I am of opinion that it is inapplicable to the facts of the present case. In The Raisby Sir James Hannen points out that the so-called agreement did not purport to extend the liability of the shipowners, and that it did not carry the matter further than if the captain of The Raisby had simply accepted the services of the salving ship. The distinction is thus drawn between an agreement generally to tow or to salve a ship, and one for a salvage service for a particular sum. Moreover, there are dicta in Anderson & Co. v. The Ocean Steamship Co. in favour of the view I am now expressing. Therefore, I am of opinion that this ground of defence fails, and I give judgment for the amount claimed, with costs.

The following minute was subsequently entered in the registry:—The judge pronounced the sum of £2,200 to be due to the plaintiffs for the salvage services by them rendered to the steamship Prinz Heinrich and her cargo, as specified in the agreement pleaded in the statement of claim, together with costs, and decided that, unless, before the expiration of a fortnight, the defendants filed a notice of appeal, the said sum of £2,200 heretofore brought into court by the defendants, be paid out to the plaintiffs in satisfaction of their claim, and he condemned the defendants in the said costs. The judge further, on the application of the defendants' counsel, directed the execution of the decree to be stayed for a fortnight.

SELWYN v. GARFIT. (a.)

Mortgage—Power of sale—Proviso restricting exercise of power—Notice to mortgagor—Waiver—Purchaser's protection clause.

A mortgage dated November 22, 1880, contained a covenant by the mortgagor to repay the principal money and interest on May 22, 1881, and contained a clause giving the mortgagee power to sell at any time after the expiration of six months from the date of the mortgage, but the clause was followed by a proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale by the mortgagee, "unless and until default shall have been made in payment at the time hereinbefore appointed for payment thereof of some principal money or interest, . . . and" the mortgagee "shall have given a notice in writing" to the mortgagor "to pay off the moneys for the time being owing . . . and default shall have been made in the payment of . . . such moneys for three calendar months from the time of giving . . . such notice." The mortgage also contained the usual clause for the protection of purchasers on any sale by the mortgagee purporting to be made in pursuance of the power.

In January, 1881, the mortgagee gave notice in writing to the mortgagor requiring payment of the principal moneys. In June, 1881, the principal moneys being then unpaid, the mortgagee sold the mortgaged premises, in professed exercise of his power of sale, to a purchaser for value.

Held, affirming Kay, J., in an action for that purpose instituted in March, 1885, by the executrix of the mortgagor, that the sale should be set aside, and should stand only as a transfer of the mortgage, on the ground that the power of sale had not arisen in June, 1881, and could not arise until at least nine months from the date of the mortgage.

Held, also, on the evidence, that neither the mortgagor nor the plaintiff, his executrix, had waived the benefit of the proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale.

Observations on the effect of the clause protecting purchasers with reference to waiver by the mortgagor of the restrictive proviso.

Appeal from Kay, J.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 22nd of November, 1880, Congreve Selwyn assigned certain personalty, subject to certain prior mortgages, to E. Green, his executors, administrators, and assigns, with a proviso for redemption on the payment by Selwyn to Green, on the 22nd of May, 1881, of the sum of £800 and interest. The deed contained a power of sale enabling the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, to sell the mortgaged premises "at any time or times after the expiration of six calendar months from the date" of the mortgage, with a proviso limiting the exercise of the power of sale as follows:—"Provided that the said E. Green, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall not exercise the said power of sale unless and until default shall have been made in payment at the time hereinbefore appointed for payment thereof of some principal money or interest, the payment whereof is intended to be hereby secured, and he or they shall have given a notice in writing to the said Congreve Selwyn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, to pay off the moneys for the time being owing on the security of these presents, or left such notice at his usual or last-known place of abode in England, and default shall have been made in the payment of the whole or part of such moneys for three calendar months from the time of giving or leaving such notice, or unless and until the whole or some part of some half-yearly payment of interest which shall become due . . . shall have become in arrear for three calendar months . . . ." There was also a proviso that, upon any sale purporting to be made in pursuance of the aforesaid power in that behalf, the purchaser or purchasers should not be bound to see or inquire as to the propriety or regularity of such sale, and that, notwithstanding any impropriety or irregularity whatsoever in any such sale, the same should, so far as regarded the safety and protection of the purchaser or purchasers, be deemed to be within the aforesaid power in that behalf, and be valid and effectual accordingly, and the remedy of the mortgagor for any breach of the stipulations aforesaid should be in damages only.

On November 30, 1880, Congreve Selwyn, the mortgagor, created a further charge on the mortgaged premises in favour of Judith Southerden.

On January 19, 1881, Congreve Selwyn was served with notice in writing by the mortgagee Green, requiring payment of the principal and interest due to him.

By a deed dated the 20th of June, 1881, after reciting the mortgage to Green of November 22, 1880, and that Green, in exercise of the power of sale contained in that mortgage, had agreed with Frances Garfit for the absolute sale to her of the mortgaged premises, Green, in consideration of the payment of £740, assigned the mortgaged premises to Frances Garfit, her executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely.

The mortgagor, Congreve Selwyn, died on the 22nd of May, 1882, and the plaintiff, Alice Selwyn, was his widow and executrix.

On the 15th of March, 1883, Southerden, the mortgagee subsequent to Green, issued a writ in an action against Garfit, Green, and Alice Selwyn, claiming to have the sale of the 20th of June, 1881, by Green to Garfit, set aside, either absolutely, or to have it declared a transfer only of the mortgage of the 22nd of November, 1880, and not an absolute sale. A defence to that action was delivered by Green on the 8th of August, 1883, but that action was, in June, 1885, dismissed for want of prosecution by the plaintiff Southerden.

On March 14, 1885, the present action was commenced by Alice Selwyn, as executrix of the mortgagor, Congreve Selwyn, against Garfit and Green, claiming to have the sale of the 20th of June, 1881, set aside altogether or declared to be only a transfer, on the ground that the power of sale contained in the mortgage of November 22, 1880, was not exercisable on the 20th of June, 1881, no proper notice requiring payment of principal and interest having been given as required by the mortgage of November 22, 1880, the period of three months not having elapsed since the moneys secured by the mortgage became due. Southerden, the mortgagee subsequent to Green, was also made a defendant to this action. Kay, J., held that the power of sale contained in the mortgage to Green of November 22, 1880, was not exercisable on June 20, 1881, and declared that the deed of June 20, 1881, should be set aside as a sale and stand only as a transfer to Garfit of Green's mortgage. The defendant Garfit appealed.

Millar, Q.C., and Simmonds, for the appellant.—On May 22, 1881, six months after the date of the mortgage to Green, the principal money due on that mortgage became payable, and the power of sale was then exercisable, as Green had given notice to the mortgagor requiring payment three months previously—viz., on January 19, 1881. The three months' notice can be effectually given within the six months period. The mortgagor, before the sale by Green to Garfit, knew that Green intended to sell in exercise of his power of sale, and raised no objection. The lapse of time, from June, 1881, to March, 1885, when this action was brought, is evidence of waiver and acquiescence. The appellant, as a purchaser for value from a mortgagee professing to sell under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, is not concerned with the validity or invalidity of the notice. [COTTON, L.J.—If, on the true construction of this power to sell, the mortgagee could not exercise the power till nine months after the date of the mortgage, the purchaser must have known at the date of the purchase that the power of sale had not arisen.] The power to sell became exercisable on May 22, 1881. The proviso as to the exercise of the power of sale is in the common form: Davidson's Precedents, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 277; Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 19 (1) i., s. 20 (i.).

They referred to Dicker v. Angerstein, 24 W. R. 844, 3 Ch. D. 600.

Marten, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the respondent, the plaintiff, were called on only with respect to the questions of waiver of the proviso relating to the non-exercise of the power of sale, and as to the proviso for the protection of purchasers.—First, as to waiver, the mortgagor was not in a position to waive the proviso as to non-exercise of the power of sale as he had at the time mortgaged the equity of redemption to Southerden, who had no notice of the intention of Green, the mortgagee, to sell to the appellant. Secondly, the appellant, the purchaser, through her solicitor, knew of the fact of the existence of Southerden's charge, and also that Southerden had no notice of Green's intention to sell.

They referred to Hoole v. Smith, 29 W. R. 601, 17 Ch. D. 434; Jenkins v. Jones, 8 W. R. 270, 2 Giff. 99.

Grosvenor Woods, for Southerden, the second mortgagee.

Millar, Q.C., in reply.—The mortgage to Southerden did not comprise the whole of the property mortgaged to Green. The point as to the existence of the mortgage to Southerden preventing a waiver by the mortgagor was not taken by the defendant Green in his defence.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., in an action to set aside a purchase from a mortgagee, by which he declared that on the true construction of the power of sale contained in this mortgage, the power of sale had not arisen, and that the sale accordingly should be set aside. Was he right as to the true construction of this power? I need not refer to the subject-matter of the mortgage, it is only necessary to look at the power of sale. [The Lord Justice read the words of the power of sale, and continued:—] The mortgagee is first of all given a power to sell at any time after the expiration of the six months term fixed for redemption; but then there is a proviso containing an express restriction on the exercise of that power. [The Lord Justice read the proviso referred to, and continued:—] In January, 1881, and, therefore, before the expiration of the six months term, the mortgagee served a notice on the mortgagor—not that after the expiration of three months, payment would be required, but that payment was then required. The money was not paid, and the mortgagee sold the mortgaged premises in June, 1881. Was that a good sale? Kay, J., held it was not, and I think he was perfectly right. A notice must be given, and there must have been default in payment for three months after the notice requiring payment has been given in order that the power of sale might arise. In my opinion the terms of the proviso are not complied with unless there has been a default in making payment for three months after the notice requiring payment; and there can be no default in not paying until that which is required to be paid has become payable, until then there is no obligation to pay. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee the power of sale and the proviso must be read together, and regard must be paid to the whole clause. Here, in my opinion, the power of sale could not be exercised until at least three months had elapsed after May 22, 1881.

As to the clause protecting purchasers, it is not intended to apply to a case where the purchaser, when making the purchase, knows that there has not been a compliance with the terms of the proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale. The purchaser cannot, in that case, rely on the protection clause. Other objections have been raised by the appellant here, though not pressed before Kay, J. It has been urged that the proviso restricting the exercise of the power of sale might be waived, and that there had been a waiver here, or that, at all events, the purchaser was entitled to assume there had been a waiver. But, in my opinion, the protection clause does not enable a purchaser to assume that a restriction on the exercise of the power of sale, the existence of which restriction the purchaser is aware of, has been waived by the mortgagor; and here the purchaser must be taken to have known of the existence of this restriction just as well as the mortgagee. Again, there is no evidence of waiver, in my opinion, in this case. It was said that the correspondence showed that the mortgagor and his wife knew this sale would take place, but some of the letters showed that they thought it was only to be a transfer of the mortgage. As a matter of fact the mortgagor, at the time of the sale, was not in a position to waive the restriction, as he had mortgaged his equity of redemption. I asked Mr. Millar what prejudice the purchaser had suffered by the delay of the plaintiff in bringing this action, and he could only suggest that the purchaser had been allowed to remain in possession of the premises as if they were her own. That is no prejudice. In my opinion, on these grounds, the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question as to the true construction of the power of sale I have little to say. I concur in the view taken by that by Kay, J., and Cotton, L.J. No sale of the premises could validly be made until at least nine months after the date of the mortgage. Kay, J., was perhaps a little hasty in as it were nonsuiting the purchaser when against him on the question of the construction of the power. I thought it was possible that the purchaser might have a right to uphold his purchase on the grounds that the mortgagor had waived his right to insist on the restriction. We have heard the purchaser on that point, and I am satisfied that there has been no miscarriage of justice, and that there could have been no waiver, on account of the fact of the existence of the subsequent encumbrance.

BOWEN, L.J.—On the broad question as to the construction of the power I have nothing to add. The other point I thought at first might have something in it. The delay and inaction of the mortgagor and the plaintiff an inference might primâ facie be raised of the fact of waiver. Delay or inaction, no doubt, does not of itself constitute a waiver, but it may be evidence of waiver, and if you can show that the mortgagor could waive and said nothing, and allowed the sale to go on, then—though silence is not the same thing as speech—it may lead to the inference that consent was really given to the sale. But here the mortgagor was not in a position to consent to the sale, as he had parted with the equity of redemption in part of the mortgaged premises on November 30, 1880. That made it clear to me that the omission to plead waiver was intentional and to save expense, and when Mr. Millar was asked whether he was willing to go back and be allowed to amend his pleading he was mute. Therefore the point as to waiver fails. As to the effect of the protection clause in favour of purchasers, I do not feel quite satisfied that it could not apply to a case where the validity of the exercise of the power of sale depends on a condition precedent contained in the proviso being waived, when the mortgagor could as a matter of fact waive it. The case of Parkinson v. Hanbury, 15 W. R. 642, L. R. 1 H. L. 1, which was relied upon by Kay, J., as conclusive on this point, seems to me distinguishable from the present case, because in that case the notice to sell, the giving of which was requisite, was not given, and could not possibly have been given. I should like, therefore, to consider the point, as to the effect of the protection clause in favour of purchasers, still open.

Solicitor—Delivery of bill of costs—Non-contentious business—Jurisdiction of Master of the Rolls—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), ss. 16, 34 (2)—Judicature Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 68), ss. 2, 24.

By section 37 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, power was conferred on the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls to order delivery of a solicitor's bill of costs where no part of the business contained in such bill had been transacted in any court. Application having been made to a judge of the Queen's Bench Division for such an order, Held (reversing the decision of the Divisional Court), by Fry and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting, that the effect of the Judicature Acts was to transfer this power to the High Court, and that it might be exercised by any judge of that court, but that since, by section 34, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873, matters under an Act of Parliament, by which exclusive jurisdiction in respect of such matters had been given to the Court of Chancery, were assigned to the Chancery Division, the application was irregular.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Stevens, Bawtree, & Stevens, solicitors, from a decision of Field, J., at chambers, refusing to order delivery by Mr. S. R. Pollard, solicitor, of a bill of costs. No part of the business in respect of which the delivery of the bill of costs was sought had been transacted in any court of law or equity. Field, J., was of opinion that a judge of the Queen's Bench Division had no power to make such an order.

(a.) Reported by A. H. TODD and A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

J. E. Bankes, for the appellants.—The learned judge had jurisdiction by statute and at the common law. The statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37, gives jurisdiction both to the Lord Chancellor and to the Master of the Rolls in such matters. The jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls has been transferred to the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 16, excepting as to certain matters connected with the records. By the Judicature Act, 1881, s. 2, the Master of the Rolls became a judge of the Court of Appeal. Apart from the Solicitors Act, 1843, the common law judges had jurisdiction to order officers of the court to send in their bills of costs: Clarkson v. Parker, 7 Dowl. 87; Smith v. Dunes, 4 Ex. 32. It would be very inconvenient if it were necessary to apply to the Master of the Rolls, who has no chambers, in such matters.

Murphy, Q.C., and S. Woolf, for Mr. Pollard, referred to In re Chaffers, 15 Q. B. D. 467. [They were stopped.]

POLLOCK, B.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Field, J., refusing to order the delivery of a solicitor's bill for the purposes of taxation, on the ground that all the matters mentioned in the affidavit as having been transacted by the solicitor consisted of business which had been done out of court. The question is, whether the judge had jurisdiction to make the order. We think he had not. There used to be a broad distinction between the office of solicitor and that of attorney, the former being an equity, the latter a common law, practitioner. They were admitted as officers in the courts in which they were to practise, and at common law no court had jurisdiction over a solicitor or attorney of a different court to order them to do anything. The Legislature altered that by giving to any one common law court power to deal with the officer of any other common law court. That was the Act of 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, which is treated of in Lush's Practice, vol. i., pp. 298, 299, where the learned author says that "it is clear that, to give a court jurisdiction, some of the business must have been done in court." Up to the Act of 1843 no power existed in the common law courts to order the delivery by a solicitor of a bill of costs to his client. The case of Becke v. Wells, 1 C. & M. 75, shows this to have been the case. The costs which have been incurred in this case are, as I have said, for no business transacted either in a common law or chancery court. Then the only right that the applicant has is to go before the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls. In Lush's Practice it is said that the Vice-Chancellors also have power to deal with such matters as delegates of the Lord Chancellor, and no doubt that statement is correct, because many Acts have been passed enabling the Vice-Chancellors to act as such delegates. But nothing has been shown to us to prove that this authority was given to the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls merely as judges of the court of equity, and the contrary would seem to be the case, because they are appointed to undertake such matters so nomine. The reason, no doubt, was that common law judges knew nothing about what is called family business, whereas most of the matters that came before the Court of Chancery are connected with administration and such matters. It has been argued that section 16 of the Judicature Act of 1873 transferred the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls as judge or master of the Court of Chancery to the High Court of Justice, with certain exceptions. But it does not follow that jurisdiction which had been given to the Master of the Rolls as such, by an Act which does not state that it has been given him as a judge of the court of equity, has been also transferred. The jurisdiction which is conferred in express terms by one statute must be taken away in terms as express by another, or we cannot hold that it has in fact been put an end to. The argument from inconvenience cannot prevail against the clear language of a statute.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Messrs. Stevens, Bawtree, & Co. appealed.

Crump, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for the appellants.

Murphy, Q.C., and Sidney Woolf, for the respondent.

The arguments were the same as in the court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case a summons was taken out before a master for an order for the delivery of a bill of costs by a solicitor, none of the business in respect of which the costs were incurred having been transacted in any court of law or equity. The master refused the application, and his refusal was upheld by Field, J., at chambers, and by a divisional court. The matter really depends on the true construction of section 37 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and on the effect to be given to the Judicature Act, 1873. It is necessary, I think, first to consider the position of the Master of the Rolls before the passing of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. He had two capacities and twofold duties. He was, in the first place, a judge of the Court of Chancery, but he had another capacity wholly distinct and independent from that office. He had a separate office such as was possessed by no other chancery judge. He had the custody of the roll of solicitors, and he had great and independent powers regarding solicitors. He dealt then, as he deals now, with questions as to the admission of solicitors, and then, as now, his jurisdiction in that behalf was subject to no appeal. The Petty Bag Office, where the roll of solicitors was kept, was subject to his jurisdiction alone, and he exercised his functions in respect of solicitors wholly independently of the Court of Chancery. As a judge of the Court of Chancery he had similar powers and jurisdiction to the Vice-Chancellors, although they were deputies of the Lord Chancellor, which he never was.

Such being the state of things before the Act of 1843, by section 37 it was enacted that, where delivery of a bill of costs was sought in respect of business no part of which had been transacted in any court of law or equity, or where any part of the business had been transacted in the Court of Chancery, the power to refer the bill for taxation was given to the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls. The section further provided for the reference of a bill for taxation by a judge of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, &c., where any part of the business in respect of which the costs had been incurred had been transacted in any such court. The latter part of the section provides that "it shall be lawful for the said respective courts and judges, in the same cases in which they are respectively authorized to refer a bill which has been so as aforesaid delivered, sent, or left, to make such order for the delivery, by any attorney or solicitor, of such bill as aforesaid . . . in the same manner as has heretofore been done as regards such attorney or solicitor by such courts or judges respectively, where any such business had been transacted in the court in which such order was made." I do not think that it was ever intended to designate the whole Court of Chancery by naming two individual judges of that court, and I think that to hold that the power bestowed by this Act on the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor was conferred on the Court of Chancery would be to misconstrue the statute. The jurisdiction was, in my opinion, given to the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls in their individual official capacities, and not as judges of the Court of Chancery. No doubt, since the Vice-Chancellors were appointed to assist the Lord Chancellor in his administrative functions, the powers bestowed on him by the Act were delegated to them, but they did not interfere with the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls.

As to business of which part had been transacted in the Court of Chancery, then the Court of Chancery had power to order the delivery of the bill; but when no part of the business was contentious, then the jurisdiction to order delivery of the bill was given to the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor only, and in their official capacity, not as judges of the Court of Chancery. This jurisdiction was always exercised by the Master of the Rolls. When the business was purely non-contentious petition was sent to the secretary to the Master of the Rolls, and was attended to by him. It is true that the subsequent part of the section speaks of courts and judges. I think those were the natural words to use. Courts have the power where part of the business was transacted in courts—the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor are referred to as judges. The power given by that section was invariably used down to the Judicature Act, 1873. Now does that Act alter the state of things? In my opinion section 16 only refers to the jurisdiction of the Master of the Rolls as a judge of the Court of Chancery, and does not affect his official character as Master of the Rolls. His jurisdiction as guardian of the roll of attorneys was not affected. How is his position affected by 44 & 45 Vict. c. 68? That Act preserves, by section 2, the duties of the Master of the Rolls excepting those as a judge of the High Court of Justice. In my opinion, therefore, his jurisdiction in his official capacity is still extant. Section 1 of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 68 assumes that he had duties other than those as a judge of the High Court of Justice. It is idle to say that those were solely his duties as head of the Record Office. Those other duties were his jurisdiction over attorneys. In my opinion that jurisdiction is still vested in him, and he still can order the delivery of a bill of costs where the business has been non-contentious. It is true that he has no longer a secretary, but the duties formerly performed by his secretary are delegated to the principal registrar of the Chancery Division. Therefore, whether I am right or wrong, the jurisdiction will be exercised by the same person in the same way. But I am of opinion that the Judicature Act was never intended to transfer any jurisdiction from any office then remaining in existence to any other office. There is absolutely no instance of such a transfer. I agree, therefore, with the court below, that a judge of the High Court has no power to order delivery of a bill, and I think that Field, J., and the Divisional Court were right in rejecting the jurisdiction. In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed.

Fry, L.J., read the judgment of Lopes, L.J., and himself:—

In this case persons alleging themselves to be clerks of Mr. Pollard, a solicitor, have taken out a summons in the Queen's Bench Division for delivery by him of a bill of costs in respect of business alleged to have been done for them, of which no part was transacted in any court of law or of equity. The Divisional Court have rejected the application, on the ground of the want of jurisdiction.

The application is made under the provisions of the 37th section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. By that section, on the delivery of a bill of costs, power was given to the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls to refer the bill to taxation in case the business charged for, or any part of it, had been (1) transacted in the High Court of Chancery or in any other court of equity, or (2) in bankruptcy, or (3) in lunacy, or (4) in case no part of such business had been transacted in any court, which is the case of the bill now in question. A similar power was given to the common law courts at Westminster and the Court of Pleas at Durham, or any judge of either of them, to refer bills relating to business now transacted in any other courts—i.e., courts not of equity, bankruptcy, or lunacy. The enactment went on to provide that the court or judge making such reference might restrain the solicitor from suing pending the reference; and, further (and this is the portion of the statute invoked by the present application), it gave "the said respective courts and judges," in the same cases in which they were respectively authorized to refer a bill delivered, power to make an order on the solicitor or attorney for delivery of his bill. This statute was only an enlargement of a jurisdiction over solicitors which existed previously, and certainly was exercised by the High Court of Chancery over solicitors, who, like attorneys, were officers of the court. In our opinion the powers thus given by statute were given to the Lord Chancellor and Master of the Rolls as judges; the clause vested in them judicial powers—e.g., of making orders and restraining actions, and any breach of these orders would have been a contempt of court; the clause vested in them judicial discretions—e.g., in respect of the discretions and conditions with and subject to which taxation was to be directed after a bill had been delivered for more than a month. Moreover, in the very words giving the powers of restraining actions, of imposing conditions on taxation after a month, and of ordering the delivery of a solicitor's bill, the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls are included in the general words "courts and judges," unless under the description of judges they never took any of these powers.

The jurisdiction thus vested in the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls was, before the passing of the Judicature Act, exercised in this way:—Orders under the section in question were divided into two classes—first, orders of course, where there was no dispute and no special circumstances requiring the exercise of a judicial mind; and, secondly, orders not of course, as where there was some matter in dispute or some special circumstance that demanded attention. Orders of course were made on petitions of course by the secretary of the Master of the Rolls. Special orders were made by the Master of the Rolls or any of the Chancellors (who, by their appointment, were bound to assist the Lord Chancellor in the discharge of his judicial duties) on summons in chambers: 2 Daniel's Practice, 1734, 5th ed.; In re Inderwick, 32 L. J. 541.

Thus matters stood at the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873. By the 16th section of that Act there was transferred to and vested in the High Court the jurisdiction then vested in or capable of being exercised by the Court of Chancery as a court of equity, including the powers given to the Court of Chancery, or to any judge of that court by statute. The jurisdiction and powers conferred by the statute 6 & 7 Vict. on the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls are, we think, sufficiently described by these words; and, consequently, we are of opinion that the power of ordering the delivery of a bill for business done in the Court of Chancery or not done in any court was taken out of the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls as judges of the late Court of Chancery, and was vested in the High Court, and in the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls as officers of that court.

If it were not so vested in the High Court, the judges of the Chancery Division would have no power to make orders for taxation of bills for business done in the Chancery Division or done out of court, and the orders of this kind which have been made daily are ultrà vires.

Thus matters stood till the passing of the statute of 1881, under which the Master of the Rolls ceased to be a member of the High Court, and, consequently, lost the power he had previously possessed of making original orders of the High Court, including the power of making such orders under the Solicitors Act. The 24th section of the Act of 1881 saved to him the disciplinary powers over solicitors which he possessed in common with the chiefs of the common law divisions, but contained no saving of the power to refer to taxation or to direct delivery of bills of costs.

Under the provisions of ord. 62, r. 18, the duties which were performed by the secretary of the Master of the Rolls when he was a judge of the High Court in making orders of course under the Solicitors Act are now vested in the registrar of the Chancery Division. The order sought in the present case, involving a question in dispute—namely, the retainer by the applicants—could not have been properly made by the registrar of that division.

For the reasons given we are not able to agree with the conclusions of the Divisional Court, that the original power to order the delivery of a solicitor's bill is still vested in the Master of the Rolls; on the contrary, we are of opinion that it has been transferred to the High Court, and may be exercised by any judge of that court.

But though we hold that the master and judge of the Queen's Bench Division had jurisdiction to make the order, we are of opinion that the application was irregular. Under section 34, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the business to be done under the Solicitors Act, so far as it had previously been exercised by the Court of Chancery, was assigned to the Chancery Division as a matter under an Act of Parliament by which exclusive jurisdiction in respect of the matter had been given to the Court of Chancery or the judge thereof.

The applicants were, therefore, irregular in their application, and, considering the well-known practice of applying for orders of this description to the judges of the Chancery Division, we think their conduct in applying to the master of the Queen's Bench Division blameworthy.

Under these circumstances we think that the proper course will be to allow the applicants to obtain the leave of the President of the Chancery Division within fourteen days from to-day to transfer the matter to the Chancery Division.

As the appellants have applied to the wrong division, we think that, notwithstanding the modified order which we give them, they ought to pay the costs of this appeal.

Order accordingly.

defendant from the plaintiff of a leasehold house, by which agreement the plaintiff undertook to make out a title to the house as leasehold. The defendant refused to complete the purchase, on the ground that the lease contained certain onerous covenants which were not usual covenants. The plaintiff contended that the defendant, having notice that the property was leasehold, must be taken to have notice of all the covenants in the lease.

The plaintiff, at the date of the agreement of the 13th of August, 1886, had an equitable right to demand the granting of a lease by the freeholder, but the lease had not, in fact, been granted. The defendant had no opportunity of inspecting the agreement under which the plaintiff was entitled to call for a lease, nor of ascertaining the provisions of that agreement.

At the trial of the action before Stephen, J., without a jury, the learned judge held that the defendant must be taken to have notice of all the covenants of the lease, but gave judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff had, at the time for completion of the agreement with the defendant, only an equitable interest, and therefore had not that which he had contracted to sell.

The plaintiff appealed.

Gully, Q.C., and H. A. Forman, for the appellant.—The purchaser of leasehold property has constructive notice of the contents of the lease: Grosvenor v. Green, 7 W. R. 140. In that case Wood, V.C., expressly distinguished a contract to purchase leasehold from a contract to take an underlease. This case could not be questioned but for the decision in Hyde v. Warden, 26 W. R. 201, 3 Ex. D. 72, in which case Grosvenor v. Green is cited with approval.

They also cited Martin v. Cotter, 3 Jo. & Lat. 496; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 426; Pope v. Garland, 4 Y. & C. 394; Walter v. Maunde, 1 Jac. & W. 181; Cosser v. Collinge, 3 M. & K. 283.

R. O. B. Lane, for the defendant.—The person who contracts to take an underlease has constructive notice of the contents of the original lease only when he has had a fair opportunity of ascertaining what they were, Hyde v. Warden; the reason being that restrictive covenants diminish the value of that which the under-lessee has contracted to take. The same reasoning applies to the case of an assignment of a lease.

Other points were raised in the argument which do not call for a report.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.) was delivered by FRY, L.J.—The plaintiff in the present action had, on the 11th of March, 1886, entered into an agreement with Mr. Roupell, the owner of a building estate in Kent, under which he was entitled to leases of certain plots of land when houses were built thereon.

On the 13th of August, 1886, the plaintiff and defendant signed two documents which constitute an agreement between them. It was at one time suggested by the defendant that these documents did not disclose all the necessary terms of a contract, and that they did not satisfy the Statute of Frauds. These objections were very properly abandoned by the defendant, and therefore require no further notice from us.

By this agreement of the 13th of August the plaintiff Reeve agreed to sell, and the defendant Berridge agreed to purchase for £615, a house which had been built on one of the plots of land for the residue then unexpired of a term of about eighty and a half years from the 29th of September, 1886, at a ground-rent mentioned. The vendor agreed to make out a title to the property as leasehold, a deposit of £20 was paid, and by the agreement the vendor agreed, on payment on the 29th of September then next, to execute an assignment to the purchaser, and it was stipulated that if either party refused to perform the agreement on his part he should pay to the other of them who should be willing to complete the sum of £100, exclusive of the deposit; and it was further provided that on completion the purchaser should enter into the usual covenants to indemnify the vendor against the rent and covenants of the original lease.

The defendant, on the 29th of September, refused to complete, and the vendor, the plaintiff, has sued him for the £100, the stipulated payment for default, and £50 received on account of the purchase-money in addition to the original deposit of £20.

The defendant has not only defended, but has by counter-claim asserted that he is entitled to the £100, on the ground that it is the plaintiff who has really refused to perform the contract, and to the £70 already paid on account of the purchase-money.

The learned judge who tried the case has given judgment for the defendant on both claim and counter-claim. From this the plaintiff has appealed.

Two points were argued before Stephen, J., and also before us. The plaintiff asserted that he was able and willing to complete on the 29th of September, the day named for completion. The defendant denied this, and contended, first, that the plaintiff could not make out such a title as he was by law bound to do by reason of the existence of onerous covenants in the lease, and secondly, that the plaintiff had not, at the time fixed for completion, any lease vested in him which he could convey, and that the equitable interest, which alone he possessed on the 29th of September, would not support his right to enforce payment from the defendant. The learned judge decided for the plaintiff on the first of these contentions, and against him on the second.

The first point arises in this way. The vendor was under his building agreement, to take the lease subject to certain onerous covenants, such as one against carrying on certain trades, which are admitted not to be usual or ordinary covenants; the vendor, therefore, proposed to assign to the purchaser a lease thus burthened. To this the purchaser objected, and said that he was entitled to a lease subject only to the ordinary covenants. To this the vendor replied that the terms of the contract itself disclosed the fact that the property was leasehold, and that the purchaser must be taken to have had notice of the lease, and of all its contents, and consequently that he is precluded from now raising any objection based on the existence of anything in the lease. It is plain from the facts of this case that the lease was in fact not in existence at the date of the contract, that the agreement between the vendor and Mr. Roupell was not in fact shown to the purchaser, and that no opportunity was offered to the purchaser of inspecting the agreement or learning any particulars with relation to its contents. The question, therefore, is how far the mere notice of the lease in the contract, without any opportunity of inspecting it, or the agreement for a lease, affects the purchaser with notice of all the contents of the agreement. This question appears to us to be really covered by the authority of the case of Hyde v. Warden. In that case the question arose whether taking possession of property agreed to be under-leased with notice of the existence of the lease, was a waiver of all objections based on the terms of the lease. The question, therefore, so far as regards the question of notice, was the same as in the present case, and the court was pressed to decide that notice of the lease was notice of its contents, and on the authority of various cases including Cosser v. Collinge, the court rejected the argument and said, "We think it may be considered as settled that the principle of that case can only be applied where (as indeed was the case in Cosser v. Collinge) the defendant had a fair opportunity of ascertaining for himself the provisions of the original lease": see Grosvenor v. Green; Smith v. Capron, 7 Hare, 185.

It was argued before us that the question in Hyde v. Warden arose on a contract for a sub-lease, whilst in the present instance the question arises with relation to a contract for the assignment of a lease. But we are of opinion that there is no substance in such a distinction, because in both cases alike the purchaser must know that his vendor can confer on him no interest except one, subject to the covenants contained in the lease, and the effect of notice must, therefore, be alike in both cases.

Criticisms on the case of Hyde v. Warden were also addressed to us, and, in particular, we were asked to hold it inconsistent with the case of Grosvenor v. Green, before Lord Hatherley when Vice-Chancellor. But in this court we are bound by the authority of Hyde v. Warden, and we cannot but observe that there is great practical convenience in requiring the vendor who knows his own title to disclose all that is necessary to protect himself rather than in requiring the purchaser to demand an inspection of the owner's title-deed before entering into a contract, a demand which the owners of property would in some cases be unwilling to concede, and which is not, in our opinion, in accordance with the usual course of business in sales by private contract.

Upon this point, therefore, we are not able to concur with Stephen, J., and we regret that the case of Hyde v. Warden was not cited to him.

The conclusion at which we have arrived on this point is sufficient to support the judgment of the court below, and it is therefore unnecessary to enter upon the inquiry as to the other objections to the vendor's title, on which Stephen, J., decided in favour of the purchaser. It was not argued that, if the plaintiff was really in default in performance of the contract on his part, the £100 could not be recovered. The appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Feb. 15.

In re Beard.

Simpson v. Beard. (a.)

Will—Construction—Partnership—"Share, right, and interest" in partnership business—Debt due from partnership to testator.

A testator, who carried on a partnership business, bequeathed to his wife all his personal estate not being partnership assets, property, and effects, and bequeathed to his son all his "share, right, and interest" in the partnership business, in trust for his wife for life, with remainder to his son and two daughters. There was due to the testator from the partnership a debt of considerable amount, on which interest was paid, in accordance with the articles of partnership and subsequent agreement between the partners.

Held, that the debt was not included in the disposition of the testator's share, right, and interest in the partnership business, but passed to the widow as part of the testator's personal estate.

By his will of the 23rd of December, 1878, Barnes Beard, of Coggeshall, in the county of Essex, after bequeathing to his wife all his personal estate, not being partnership assets, property, and effects, to and for her own absolute use and benefit, and also giving her certain freehold property, proceeded as follows: "I direct that as soon as conveniently can be after my decease my executors and trustees shall cause an inventory, account, and valuation to be made and taken by some competent person of all my share and interest of and in the real and personal estate and effects employed by me and my partner, William Bright, in our business of brewers, maltsters, and corn dealers, which shall be carried on by me at the time of my decease, and in such inventory, account, and valuation shall be included my share and interest in all ready money and money standing to the credit of the partnership at our bankers, but not my share of the goodwill of the said businesses, and for the purpose of avoiding any dispute or difference as to what shall be considered to be partnership real estate, I declare that all the real estate which shall have been conveyed to me and my said partner, either as co-partners, joint tenants, or tenants in common, shall, for the purposes of this provision, be deemed partnership real estate. I give, devise, and bequeath to my son, Frank Beard, all that my right, share, and interest of and in the goodwill of the businesses which shall be carried on by me in conjunction with my said partner, William Bright, and also my share, right, and interest of and in the brewery and premises in Stoneham-street, Great Coggeshall, aforesaid, and all public-houses and other real estate forming part of the partnership property, and also all debts, chattels, money, and personal estate forming part of the assets thereof" upon trust to carry on the partnership business with the surviving partner of the testator, and to retain out of the profits the yearly sum of £150, and pay the residue of the profits to the testator's widow for life, and after her death to pay one-third part of the amount of the valuation of the testator's share in the partnership business to his daughter, Emily Crompton, and one other third part to his daughter, Clara Griffin, and the remaining third part to his son, Frank Beard.

The testator died on the 26th of January, 1887, being at the time of his death in partnership with William Bright in the business of brewers, maltsters, corn dealers, in Great Coggeshall, under articles of partnership dated the 21st of October, 1856, which provided that the stock in trade of the business, with the sum of £722 7*s.* advanced by the partners in equal proportion, should form the capital of the partnership, and also by clause 20 "That it shall be lawful for either of them, the said parties hereto, with the consent in writing of the other of them, during the continuance of the said co-partnership to advance unto and bring into the said joint stock or trade any sum or sums of money for better carrying on the said joint trade, and at any time or times afterwards of the free will of the party having so brought in the same, and giving three calendar months notice in writing in that behalf to the other of them, or entering such notice in the co-partnership ledger, to withdraw from the said co-partnership business the sum or sums of money so advanced by him or any part thereof, and if either of them, the said parties hereto, shall so lend or advance any sum or sums of money, the same shall be immediately entered in the said co-partnership books as a debt owing to the party lending or advancing the same, who shall be entitled during the continuance thereof in the co-partnership business to interest thereon at or after the rate of £5 per centum per annum."

There was evidence by the accountants who had been employed to make up the partnership accounts that the partners did not accurately balance their books until the year 1881. In 1884 the partners came to an agreement, and signed an account according to which the capital of the partnership was to be taken to be £5,000 contributed by each partner, and the testator, who had more than that amount in the business, was treated as a creditor of the partnership to the amount of his surplus capital, which was regarded as a debt carrying interest under the 20th clause of the original articles of partnership, and the other partner, Mr. William Bright, who had less than the sum of £5,000 in the business, was treated as a debtor to the partnership with respect to the deficiency. The surplus due to the testator at the time of his death amounted to £3,866 11s. 10d.

By a memorandum of agreement dated the 21st of December, 1878, made between the partners, a further condition was added to the original articles of partnership for the purpose of enabling each partner to bequeath his share in the partnership business to his son, so that the son should be received as partner in his place.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executors for the determination of the question whether the debt of £3,866 11s. 10d. passed under the will to the testator's widow as part of his personal estate, or to his son, Frank Beard, as part of the testator's share, right, and interest in his business.

Swinfen Eady, for the summons, stated the facts.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and C. Lyttelton Chubb, for the widow and Frank Beard, son of the testator.—The debt due to the testator from the partnership business is not included in the disposition of that business. The word "debts" only included debts due to the partnership; and the words "share, right, and interest" in the partnership business do not indicate a debt due from that business to the testator. That debt, therefore, passed to the widow as part of the testator's personal estate.

Everitt, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the testator's daughters.—The debt due to the testator from the partnership business passed under the disposition of all the testator's "share, right, and interest" in the business. The testator had a lien on the partnership property for that debt, which is, therefore, included in his "share, right, and interest."

They referred to Earl of Dundonald v. Masterman, 17 W. R. 548, L. R. 7 Eq. 504, 513; Bevan v. The Attorney-General, 4 Giff. 361, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 124; In re Russell, Russell v. Ohell, 30 W. R. 454, 19 Ch. D. 432; 1 Lindley on Partnership, 680, 689.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—The question in this case is a difficult one. I do not feel at all satisfied what answer the testator would give if we could have him here and ask what he wished to be done. But I must do my best to arrive at the meaning of the words he has used. The conclusion I come to is that he did not intend this debt to pass to the son with the business and goodwill as a trustee for himself and the daughters. [His lordship read the words of the gift as set out above, and continued:—] The word "debts" there of course refers to debts due to the partnership, and has nothing to do with the liabilities of the partnership. The facts are shortly these:—[His lordship stated the facts and then read the 20th clause of the original articles of partnership as set out above, and proceeded:—] There is not the least doubt upon that clause in the articles under which they were acting, when in 1884 they came to an agreement that the capital of the partnership was then to be taken at £5,000 each, that the surplus over £5,000 belonging to the testator in the partnership at the time was treated as a debt due to that partner. The debt was slightly different at his death, but that is immaterial. The question is whether the amount th was due to him at his death as a creditor of the partner ship, and for which the partnership was indebted t him, passed by the disposition which I have read of hi share and interest in the partnership assets. It would ha taken very few words one way or another to turn the scal and make it perfectly clear either that it was intended t pass or that it was not. But, upon the whole, I com to the conclusion that it was not. First of all, I do no think it is accurate to describe a debt due to the partne from the firm as a part of his share and interest in th partnership assets. The words "share and interest" seem to me to be more addressed to his share an interest in something less than the whole, the othe share and interest in which would be in his co-partner and not to refer to a debt due from the partnership consisting of the two, to him as an outsider—not as outsider in one sense, no doubt because he could not compete with other outside creditors of the partner ship, but as between the partners on the one hand and the creditors on the other. The testator was a creditor, and not a partner, with respect to that debt, and his interest as a partner in the assets of the part nership and the interest of the other partner in the assets of the partnership could only be ascertained after all the liabilities to other parties had been discharged away, including liabilities to himself as well as to every other creditor of the partnership. The words, "share and interest in the partnership," seem to me addressed, therefore, to their share and interest in the clear ba proceeds remaining after the liabilities of the partner ship are cleared off.
